How uncertain are all things here on earth! In nine short months after these joyous celebrations, our honoured sister by illness was laid aside. Her health seemed fairly good till within a few weeks of her death, when a general exhaustion of all the powers of nature seemed to set in, which caused her often to express how tired she felt. The writer saw her twice during her brief affliction, and found her calmly reposing on the great atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ. Her pain she bore with patience, talked freely of the future, and retained her power of recognition to the last.

"Then came the latest breath
That rent the veil in twain;
By death she did escape from death,
And life eternal gain."

A memorial service was held in our Dogsthorpe village Chapel, conducted in the unavoidable absence of the writer, by the Revs. J. Pilling, R. Baxter and W. J. T. Scruby, and all that was mortal of our departed sister was laid in the Peterborough Cemetery on Friday, April 2nd, amid large numbers of sorrowing relatives and sympathising friends, where her sainted father and mother and many honoured Primitives are waiting the archangel's trumpet at the resurrection morn.

Primitive Methodism has lost a devoted member, her husband a loving wife, her son and grandchildren an affectionate mother and grandmother. But our loss is her present and eternal gain.

The Egyptians, with a strange fondness, embalm the body, but we would embalm the memory. The old Romans placed often a lamp in the tomb, but our deceased friend had no necessity for such accommodation; the Divine Word was a lamp to her feet and a light to her path along the journey of life, and the lamp of a Saviour's love was her guide through the valley and shadow of death to the realms of everlasting day.

It is striking evidence of the high esteem in which she was held, that her death was improved to large audiences in our two city chapels by Mrs. Pilling and the Rev. H. Carden, and in the village sanctuary at Dogsthorpe by the Rev. J. Pilling.

J. ASHWORTH.

MRS. J. CASE.

MARY CASE found her long sought rest on March 9th, 1897, and we interred her remains on March 12th, in the presence of a good number of sympathising friends, and none more richly deserved the respect which was shown, for she had been connected with our Jersey Society long before the present chapel had an existence, and from the very beginning it could truthfully be said she identified its interests with her own.

She sympathised most readily in all its difficulties—and they were not a few—and no one rejoiced more heartily in its prosperity. The secret of her conduct was this: from her earliest years she had accepted Christ as her Saviour, and her intense love to Him was the stimulus all along life's pathway; to her it was the greatest delight to be doing to the utmost whatever would be pleasing in His sight.

It was her constant aim also, to be of service to those who were in need, and to the best of her ability she succoured them. The sorrow of many homes was considerably lessened by her genial presence and practical sympathy; her kindliness of disposition won for her a warm place in many hearts, and a name which will not soon be forgotten.

She was exceedingly patient in her affliction, which was long, and at times very severe. She was not tired of life, was willing to live a little longer in the service of the Master, or to depart hence and be for ever with her Lord.

Her husband was ill at the same time, and when he saw that her end was near, he said: "My dear, this will be our last day together upon earth, let us sing;" and putting his hand in hers, these two old pilgrims among the eighties sang, "Jesus, Lover of my soul," and soon after she had entered into the immediate presence of her Redeemer and Lord.

Our sympathies go out towards the family, who naturally feel their loss most keenly, and, thank God, we can say to them, as well as to all those who have thus lost friends—

"What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust—hearts' loves remain,
Heart's love will meet thee again."

G. B. GLEGHORN.

Sympathy.

SWEET Sympathy, thou breath of the Divine,
I long for thee;
My soul encompassed round with darkest doubt,
Doth yearn for thee;
In time of need I ask no rest but thine—
I only ask that I may sheltered be
By thee, thou golden, silent Sympathy.

When death has won the day in mortal strife,
Our loved one gone;
'Tis much, if tenderly a friend shall say,
In trembling tone,
"Not Death—our Father gives His loved one Life!"
I tell thee, that is much; but all is this—
In silence, symbol of Eternal Peace.

Literary Notices.

The Voice of the Spirit. Literary Passages from the Bible, re-written, Idea for Idea, in Modern Style. Book III.—Uplifting-will-Strengthen (Ezekiel), and Song of Solomon. Book IV.—The Glad Message according to Matthew. The Letter of Paul to Galatians. With Notes on the Greek Text. By HOWARD SWAN, Principal of the Central School of Foreign Tongues, Temple. London. Sampson, Low, Marston and Co., Ltd., Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE writer of these remarkable volumes is evidently a scholar, a man of science, and one who can write with much literary skill. What is better, he does not run a tilt at Theology and the Churches, but writes with a fine glow of enthusiasm in the hope of making men and the world better. This being so, although his views, when nakedly stated, are such as to make us wonder how a man so cultured and endowed can seriously take up with them, yet the self-reliant reader will find much in these volumes to interest—much that is suggestive and that he can even appropriate. But what are our author's views? We labour under the disadvantage of not having seen Books I. and II. of "The Voice of the Spirit," but, confining ourselves to No. IV., we can gather thus much:—St. John is the writer of the four Gospels, and the story of the Christ is but "an embodiment, a Personification in a spiritual history." "By 'The Christos' (which, as we are several times told, has the same Greek pronunciation as Chrestos, meaning Good, Upright, Kind, etc.), is meant the Inner Light, that Higher Personality which seems to enter into, and take possession of, the body at its highest moments, and inspires it with the qualities of Kindness, Goodness, Justice, Truth and Love." John wrote four gospels to correspond with the various stages of development and consequent needs of men's inner life. "Why," asks our author, "were there four Gospels written, save that there are degrees in the power of this perception of the Presence? For the child, childish tales; for the man, manly ones; for the thinker, bold thoughts; and for the mystic, mystic truths." It will be seen from this that the belief that Christ came in the flesh, as well as the assured results of criticism as to the origin of the Gospels, at once go by the board. But whence did John gain the power to rise to the height of conceiving such a four-fold spiritual allegory as this, and by so doing create Christianity? It is evident Mr. Swan feels the inevitableness and the pressure of this question. He does not fall back on the statement—God inspired John; for God to him is but the sum of the cosmological forces. "If all manifestations of power—the circling motion of the universe, the light, heat, motion of the molecules, chemical, electrical, nervous, will, and love power—taken together are that great universal Power we call God, or the Universal Spirit, then in man, through man, may—nay, must—speak the Voice of the Spirit, that WORD which sways the moral world. The Spirit—in the form of motion, vibration, energy—exists everywhere outside man: but this Spirit is only 'moral' when acting inside man—outside him it is impersonal, non-moral; inside him it is personal, moral, and at its highest Divine." Our author may be described as a Cosmological Mystic; for him there is but one force, whether we call it love or electricity. The highest achievements of the intellectual and spiritual life are but so many exemplifications of the law of the conservation of force. We have done our best to give our readers some idea of what they will find in these volumes. We do not argue against the views set forth by their author: that would be to take them too seriously.

Key to the Apocalypse; or, The Seven Interpretations of Symbolic Prophecy. By H. GRATTAN GUINNESS, D.D. Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

DR. GUINNESS holds that the Apocalypse was written by St. John in the closing years of Domitian in the year 95 or 96 A.D., and that it symbolically foreshadowed events which were soon to have their beginning—events therefore which we can now in large part regard historically. He sees a close connection between the symbolic visions of Daniel and those of the Apocalypse. The vision of the colossal image of Daniel ii., supplies the outline of the course of history to the end of time. The parts of the image, made up as they were of discrepant materials, represented the successive flourishing of the great Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Greek and Roman empires; while the stone cut out without hands, that was to become a mountain, prefigured the origin and final ascendancy of the Kingdom of God. All this but paves the way for the main contention of the writer, viz., that in the symbolic prophecies of the Apocalypse the divinely interpreted prophecy of the seventeenth chapter puts into our hand the key by means of which we can interpret the rest. This is the chapter that relates to "Babylon the Great" and "the scarlet woman," and Dr. Guinness holds that it is irrefragably proved, alike by history and the word of God, that the Papal power is intended by all this imagery. For the detailed proof of this we must direct our readers to Dr. Guinness' book. Dr. Fairbairn, in his last book, speaking of the Romish Church, has said: "It is to us no creation of craft or subtlety, human or diabolical, no Man of Sin, Scarlet Woman, or shameless Antichrist, but a venerable creature of God, and manifest minister of His providence." It is thus plain to see that the two Doctors are at direct issue ; nor shall we attempt to decide between them.

Life of the Rev. Colin Campbell M'Kechie. By REV. JOHN ATKINSON. (2s. 6d.) Thomas Mitchell, 48-50, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C. PROBABLY no one in the ranks of the Primitive Methodist ministry deserves better, we doubt if any so well, to be regarded as a model, as Colin Campbell M'Kechie. Alike in the act of renunciation necessary to enter our Church, in the diligence with which he sought to develop his gifts and to acquire learning, in his marvellous power to read character, to understand all the circumstances of any situation, and to adapt himself to those circumstances, and lastly, in his success in all the departments of his work, he stands forth as an example which all our young ministers would do well to emulate. Those who know the special advantages enjoyed by a minister of any of the Presbyterian Churches and contrast his position with that of a Primitive Methodist minister to-day, to say nothing of the trials which the pioneers had to undergo, will be able to appreciate the heroism and self-denial involved in Mr. M'Kechie's determination to consecrate his life to the work of the Primitive Methodist ministry.

The fact that will impress the reader of the "Life" most of all is, Mr. M'Kechie's singular success as an evangelist. When he went to reside at Stanhope, in the Westgate Station, he found the churches feeble, and the moral condition of the people far from satisfactory. But in a short time, as the result of a great spiritual awakening, fifty members were added to the Church, most of them young men and women. The revival had not only added to the numerical strength of the Church, but had totally changed the character of its religious life. The old ease and indifference were gone, and a spirit of desire and expectation for the manifestation of God's power had taken possession of the minds of all. Even more remarkable was the spiritual awakening experienced when he was stationed in Allendale, where some 400 were converted, and of these quite 350 were added to the roll of membership, a striking testimony of the genuineness of the work. Once more, at North Shields, the churches under his care were blessed with a great revival.

How is this marvellous success to be accounted for? Something is to be attributed to his remarkable personality. He was a man of singular charm, and had in him the magnetism of a true leader of men. He owed much to his Highland ancestry, for, whilst he had all the judgment and logical skill of the Lowland Scot, he had much of the fire and imagination of the Celt. Then again, he was never deluded with the notion that scholarship and intellectualty need be divorced from true piety. This was indeed a notion, perhaps more common in his day than now, against which he persistently contended. He remembered that St. Paul, the most scholarly and philosophic preacher among the Apostles, was also the most successful as an evangelist. And he therefore felt he was equipping himself for his real work in reading the best books, and in seeking to expound the Scriptures in the most intelligent and scholarly manner he could. And his preaching was of every style, except, perhaps, the declamatory, topical, expository, and other. Perhaps he was mightiest in the exposition of some great theme in the poetical sections of the Bible like the Book of Job. These parts of the Word suited his rich imagination and fine spiritual insight, and generally, in those days, when there was no revised version, and the available commentaries were not models of correct exegesis, he succeeded in arriving at the real significance of obscure passages by the sheer force of his moral and intellectual insight. And, of course, all his gifts were sanctified and consecrated to the service of the Master. For the careful reader of this biography will note that he prepared his sermons with the special object of awakening spiritual feeling and securing the conversion of men.

Of Mr. M'Kechie's work in seeking the intellectual improvement of the younger ministers by founding Ministerial Associations, and by establishing the "Quarterly Review," we have no space to write. It should be noted, however, that to be in his company an hour, or to hear him take part in discussions at the associations, was enough to send young ministers home with the firm purpose of spending more time in their studies, and working harder when they were there. All this and a great deal more is made clear by the well-written biography Mr. Atkinson has given us. The writer has kept himself well out of sight, although himself, for many years, very intimately associated with Mr. M'Kechie, and has kept his subject prominently before his readers, with the result that we have a story at once interesting and inspiring.

PAMPHLETS.

WE have received a pamphlet entitled, "China, Anglo-America, and Corn." By MR. GRANVILLE SHARP. Hong-Kong: Daily Press Office. The pamphlet is the reprint of a lecture delivered at Hong-Kong at the beginning of the present year. We gather that Mr. Sharp has been a resident at Hong-Kong, actively engaged in commerce and banking, for the long space of forty years, and has therefore earned the right to speak concerning the present and future of China. He believes that China is a derelict empire; and fast breaking up. "It is idle to dream, talk, and write of its preservation. Neither is reinstatement, restoration, or amendment possible." The official class is fearfully and hopelessly corrupt. "What hope can any one cherish of the reformation of a man who, being entitled to draw a salary of five thousand dollars, manages to pocket one hundred thousand?" On the other hand, Mr. Sharp has a high opinion of the people. They are industrious, economical, possess high mental qualities, and love continuous and permanent employment. As a remedy for the sad state of things now prevailing, Mr. Sharp advocates "spheres of influence" as the prelude to occupation. He is no Little Englander, but a Christian Imperialist, and an enthusiastic advocate of co-operation between England and America. "God," says he, addressing the Americans, "sent Joseph to Egypt, and you to America, to preserve life. You want us, and we want you still more. You can do without our gold, we cannot do without your wheat." Hand-in-hand, therefore, the two nations should address themselves to the Chinese problem. This brochure is written in an admirable spirit, and has a distinct value at the present juncture.

IN "Fresh Light from the Holy Fields," the REV. JAMES KING, B.D., Vicar of St. Mary's, Berwick-on-Tweed, has given a popular account of the most recent and striking results of the investigations carried on under the direction of the Palestine Exploration Fund, for which he is a Lecturer. Most interesting is the section dealing with the discoveries relating to Solomon's Temple. It seems that at one spot in the eastern wall of the outer court near the Sheep Gate, one hundred and thirty feet of rubbish mask the real height of the wall, which still shows at two hundred feet. Surely Jerusalem must be pre-eminently the city of rubbish! The price of the pamphlet is sixpence, and any profits accruing from the sale will be devoted to the praiseworthy object referred to in the next item.

"Ten Years' Work in Shelters for the Poor." (6d.) By REV. JAMES KING, B.D. It seems there are waifs and strays in Berwick, and for some years past Mr. King has interested himself in their welfare. He has done it under difficulties, for even poor houses that could be used as shelters have been difficult to get. In this pamphlet he tells, in an interesting way, something of his experiences amongst these poor lads. Mr. King's church is the most northerly one in England, and he proposes to set up near it a Diamond Jubilee House of Mercy for Poor Lads. Towards this scheme any profit derivable from the sale of this pamphlet will be devoted.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

—The trustees of the Central Church, Derby Third Station, aided by the Church and congregation, and many friends in Derby and other places, have, after a long and arduous effort, placed their property in workable circumstances. These premises were built in 1878 at a cost of over £6,000. The undertaking was not begun under the most auspicious circumstances, and when completed, the debt stood at £4,500, and remained at that figure for some twelve years. During these years most of those who took an active part in the erection of these premises either left the neighbourhood, or passed over to the great majority, and the burden of debt had become increasingly difficult to manage, so much so that it developed into a grave difficulty. Efforts were made to reduce it, and between 1890 and 1897 some £800 were paid off. Still the debt was a crippling burden to the church, and a sad hindrance to progress. The aid of the Conference was invoked in 1894, and a deputation sent to investigate the case and see what could be done. This deputation invoked the aid of the General Chapel Fund Committee and the Insurance Company, and both agreed to assist. The Insurance Company promised £100 a year for five years, and the General Chapel Fund £50 a year for the same period, on condition the trustees and the Church, with the help of their friends, raised another £150 a year, and cleared off £1,500. At first this effort was only feebly worked, but ultimately the friends faced the difficulty resolutely, and under the guidance of the Rev. W. Evans, they realised during his superintendency £500 in cash and £900 more in promises, on condition that the debt was reduced by £1,700. When the present superintendent, Rev. I. Brentnall, took charge of the station last July, he entered heartily into this debt reducing project, and set himself to raise the £300 still needed. In this he has succeeded, finding more or less help in various parts of the Connexion, and now this valuable property is free from its oppressive difficulties, and placed in a position in which the debt can be reduced year by year without such general appeals for help as have been necessary for some time past. The trustees and their friends have been abundant in labour and sacrifice, and they have met with generous sympathy and aid. The trustees were fortunate in their secretary, Mr. A. Morgan, who has been unwearied in service, and who never lost heart and hope even when the day of distress was darkest. The church is now free to devote more attention to spiritual work, and we anticipate for it a future abounding in success.

—The Annual Meeting of the London Chapel and School Extension Fund was held a few weeks ago. The attendance was good, and considerable interest manifested in the object of this Fund; still, we share the feeling of the secretary, that it does not receive the support to which it is entitled. This Fund bears a local name, but it is practically more than a merely local Fund. What part of the United Kingdom stands unconnected with London? And what part does not annually contribute, either to the floating or permanent population of this vast city? The provinces all have an interest in London, but if the managers of this Fund wish to evoke the sympathy of the provinces in aid of it, they will have to get the stations in London and the neighbourhood to lead the way. What appeal can be made to the provinces with a response to the claims of this Fund by Metropolitan Primitive Methodism such as the report presents? That the London churches have heavy local claims goes without question, but still it should be possible by organised effort to raise considerably more than is raised in the Metropolitan area and district adjacent and closely connected with it. The annual subscriptions for the past year were given as £104 18s. od., donations £5 18s. od., collections in the circuits £44 2s. 10d. To these sums Mr. W. P. Hartley, ever ready to help any good work, adds ten per cent., bringing the income of the year up to £170, a mere apology for such purposes as this Fund contemplates. Let our Metropolitan friends make their £155 into £1,000 at least, and then they can look to the provinces with a good grace for further aid. They may rest assured that the way to evoke provincial sympathy is to show they are in earnest themselves in relation to this Fund.

—The Quarterly Meeting of the Missionary Committee which met at the end of April at Watford, devoted considerable time to the question of appropriating that portion of the Jubilee Fund which had been allocated to it. At the previous meeting in January it was decided that each District should receive from this allocation an amount equal to one-sixth of what had been raised by the stations within its jurisdiction, and that proposals respecting the use of the money should be sent to the April meeting. Ten Districts had not decided what should be done with the money, and, of course, these stand over for future consideration. A few wished to devote what might be assigned to them to evangelistic work, but as these proposals lacked the element of permanency they were not entertained, but returned to the Districts concerned for amendment. Other Districts desired to use the money in forming a Loan Fund, or a Sites Purchase Fund, while others again proposed to utilise the money in assisting to mission neighbourhoods in which the Connexion has no interest, by contributing to the erection of places of worship, and these proposals were accepted. In the main, the money will be used in the formation of District Loan Funds or Sites Purchase Funds, both commendable objects, and both likely to present some abiding memorial of this effort. We are still one-fifth short of the sum we set out to raise; but the effort has been educational, and when the time comes for the Centenary Fund to be raised it will, we judge, be found that the experience gained has been of some value.

—The Chapel Aid Association has now completed another year's work, and the accounts have passed under audit. The deposit account of the Association stands now at £225,873 18s. 1d. Deposits during the year amounted to £68,519 5s. 6d., but there was repaid to depositors £61,984 2s. 8d., so that only £6,535 2s. 10d. was added to the general account. The directors advanced in loans to trustees, £25,860, and they received in repayment from trustees, £16,188 14s. 9d., adding £9,671 5s. 3d. to the general loan account, which now stands at £216,323 1s. 11d. The revenue account shows a profit of £439 7s. 7½d. for the year. Since its formation in 1890, the Association has enabled trustees to reduce their liabilities by £63,025 17s. 10d. As the rate of reduction was necessarily small during the first few years, it may reasonably be expected that during the next nine years this sum will be more than doubled, if, indeed, it be not trebled. The present debt upon our chapel property is about £1,000,000. The Association has well nigh a fourth of that amount, and this is undergoing a gradual reduction. One great advantage the Association offers is this gradual reduction of debt, and this, combined with a moderate rate of interest and small legal charges, ought to induce all trustees whose liabilities do not exceed half the cost of their property, to place themselves under the Association. It is pleasing to know that the advantages of the Association are becoming increasingly appreciated, both by depositors wishing to place their money safely, and by trustees desirous of working down their liabilities.

—The balance sheet of the Orphanage is pleasant reading, and shows the deep hold this excellent Institution has upon Connexional sympathy. Every District in the Connexion has contributed to its support, and with few exceptions, the contributions have come from four sources: public collections, private donations, Sunday School offerings, and trustees' gifts. The Sunderland and Newcastle District still retains the premier position, but of the twenty-four Districts all save three have considerably increased their contributions, so that the revenue shows an encouraging advance upon the last year. The income for the year was £1,223 7s. 3d., which added to the balance April 1st, 1898, of £479 8s. 11d., placed £1,702 16s. 2d. at the disposal of the Committee. The expenditure, including a repayment of £264, amounted to £1,340 16s. 4d., leaving as balance, £361 19s. 10d. The health of the children has been good during the year, and there have been no vacant places. The anniversary was celebrated on Wednesday, May 17, when the friends of the Institution mustered in considerable force, and spent a day at Alresford, profitable alike to themselves and to the Institution.

—The Sleaford Station has for some months experienced a gracious and widespread revival, and great numbers, both young and old, have been converted. The town and country churches have alike shared in the visitation. The chapels have been crowded night after night, and the oldest members in the station say they have never witnessed an awakening equal to it. New life and vigour have been realised throughout the station generally, and there is great rejoicing in the better day that has dawned upon the churches.

—At the second half-yearly meeting of the Sunday School Union Committee, held in Hull, the Secretary was able to report very satisfactory progress for the year. The number of schools has increased by thirty-six in the Home Districts, an increase greater, we believe, than has been reported before for any one year. The income of the Union too was in advance of any previous year. One very pleasing part of the Secretary's report was, that in connection with young peoples' meetings which he had held in the various stations he had visited, upwards of two thousand young persons had decided to serve the Lord. The Secretary had their names duly entered by themselves in books he carried for the purpose. The churches should in years to come reap advantage from this work. The Christian Endeavour movement continues to spread in the Connexion, and there are now in the various Districts over a thousand of these Societies. Some discussion took place relative to bringing this movement in the Connexion more fully into line with the interdenominational movement, and on the recommendation of a sub-committee appointed to consider this matter, it was decided to adopt the latest version of the international pledge. Resolutions in favour of Local Veto and Sunday Closing were passed in connection with discussion on Temperance questions, and a vigorous protest was made against the Sunday newspapers, that we hope will not be allowed to simply remain in the journal of the Union, but will pass over into some form of effort to arrest the growing desecration of the Sabbath.

—In the February issue of this Magazine we made reference to an advertisement in a Brisbane paper of services held in that city by Primitive Methodist Churches. That reference has brought us an interesting communication from Queensland. So far as we understood, the advertisement related to three churches, but from the letter we have received it seems that more was meant by the advertisement than was expressed. Along with the letter just to hand we have the plans of two circuits, showing some eleven preaching places. A minister is in charge of each of the two stations, and on the one plan there are thirty-two local preachers, exhorters, and prayer leaders, and on the other thirteen. Regular services are conducted at the eleven places, and the six places of worship in the Brisbane Station afford accommodation for nearly one thousand worshippers. We have no information as to the number of members in these two stations at present, but we presume the number will be much the same as in 1897, and that was 325. If our informant is right, there is more of absorption than union in this Queensland movement, and no little amount of friction. We had some information respecting the recent Conference that seems to corroborate much that our informant says. A former Primitive Methodist minister, Rev. W. Powell, was elected President, but not without protest, and there was a significant absence of the names of former Primitive Methodist ministers on important committees. Evidently there are some in Queensland who do not mean to become Wesleyan Methodists. We shall be curious to know how the stand these brethren have taken will affect the property question in that Colony. Our informant says that the United Methodist Free Church has declined to be absorbed in Wesleyanism. The situation is one of some complexity, and will evidently need to be cautiously dealt with by the English Conference. Our Queensland informant says that the Wesleyan Conference recently held in Sydney, has rejected union, and if that is the case, union in that Colony is not likely to be consummated at any early period, if indeed at all, as our ministers and officials in New South Wales have been dissatisfied with the attitude and action of the Wesleysans for some time.

—The Book Room has done more business this year than in any previous year, and, of course, has realised increased profit. It is to be regretted, however, that the increase arises from trade outside our own serial literature, trade that yields less profit. The main source of profit in the Book Establishment is, of course, our own publications, and if our churches would only consider as they ought the object to which all profits are devoted, their support of our own literature would be more than quadrupled. We put it thus rather than refer to the acknowledged excellence of the literature.

—The report of the Primitive Methodist Insurance Company for the year is very satisfactory. The revenue for the twelve months is £3,318 1s. 10d., an increase upon the previous year of £51 1s. 9d. Considering that the Company insures only Connexional property this may regarded as a very fair increase, for, as a matter of fact, most of the property it is possible to place with the Company is insured with it, and increase can only be obtained by new buildings, most of which take the place of old ones, or by enlargements which necessitate an increase in the amount insured. During the past year the claims made upon the Company have been few and small, only amounting in the aggregate to £127 15s. 9d. This has enabled the directors to render increased aid to trust estates, and they have during the past twelve months contributed £1,616 13s. 8d. towards the reduction of trust liabilities. This makes altogether £12,141 3s. 8d. which has been contributed for this purpose since the directors were in a position to afford this aid. The Reserve Fund of the Company is now £27,623 18s. 1d., apart from the paid up capital. After meeting the claims made, and all working expenses, and giving the sum named above to trustees, the directors have been able to add over £1,000 to their Reserve Fund. Trustees who have not yet insured their property with the Company will do well to consider this report, and to remember that this Company is not worked for private gain, but for Connexional benefit.

The Wider Outlook.

—One of the most important Conferences of either this or any past century assembled last month at the Hague. It met on the invitation of the Russian Tsar, the master of the greatest army the world has seen, and met for the purpose of ascertaining if some mutual arrangement could not be agreed to by the Powers taking part in the Conference on three main issues. (1.) The question of disarmament and the reduction of armed forces during times of peace. (2.) The possibility of further mitigating the terrible suffering incident to war. (3.) To ascertain to what extent and in what way it might be possible to substitute arbitration for appeals to force in relation to national disputes. Other questions undoubtedly will engage the attention of the Conference, but these are the main questions to be considered. Four-and-twenty different nationalities are represented in the Conference, the sessions of which will probably extend over some weeks, and perhaps months. No one, however, will grudge any length of time if only something practical is the result. The two hemispheres meet in this Conference, and the Minor Powers of Europe join in the consideration of the questions at issue along with the Great Powers of the world, and have as much voting power, as each nation has only one vote if any question has to be decided by votes. Japan, China, Siam, and Persia, join with the United States, Great Britain, Russia, Germany, France, Austria, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Holland, Belgium, and the smaller States of Eastern Europe in this Conference. Each nation has sent its most trusted diplomatists, its men most conversant with international law, and men reckoned among its best military experts. The Hague has been selected as a place where the dominance of big armies is likely to be least felt. This selection is due to the Tsar, who had no wish for the Conference to meet in his capital, where bayonets and the evidence of armed force are met with at every turn. The Hollanders have given the Conference a hearty welcome, and its proceedings were opened by the Dutch Foreign minister in the name of the youthful Queen who occupies the throne of Holland. It may be some time before the result of the Conference is made public, as the sittings will be in secret, and only such information will be given to the press as may be deemed prudent, but possibly in this, as in some other cases during past years, more may be heard than the Conference in its collective capacity may determine. The sessions will be followed with expectation and hope that some conclusion will be reached that will abate the terrible burden which bloated and ever-increasing armaments have imposed upon the nations. The Powers which occupy and control the four Continents and the isles of the sea, cannot surely come together in this way in vain. Let the churches remember this assembly in their prayers, and beseech Him, in whose hands the hearts of all men are, to graciously vouchsafe His guidance to this attempt to make His world one in which life will be better worth living. It would be well for the Churches to appoint special seasons of prayer for this Conference, that the interests of peace and good-will among men, the burden of the angelic song over the plains of Bethlehem, the purpose of redeeming love, may approach nearer the long desired consummation when the pruning-hook shall take the place of the spear, and the plough-share the place of the sword.

—The Scotch Local Veto Bill was thrown out in the House of Commons on the second reading a few weeks ago, but either this or some other Government is bound to face the question, not only for Scotland, but for the whole of the United Kingdom. It is certainly strange that those who stoutly maintain that a measure of this kind is not needed, and that the people don't want it, should be so much afraid of an appeal to the people. If the people don't want it the people will say so, and there the matter will end till the people learn better. But these gentlemen who are so much concerned for the good of the people as to deny them an opportunity of expressing their opinion on Local Veto have a dread they do not express that the people will vote in favour of it. They fear the result of making licensed places for the sale of liquor subject to public control. The Conservative member for Oldham, Mr. Ashcroft, characterised the measure as "unreasonable, cruel and dishonest," though how these adjectives apply he did not venture to explain. What can there be either "unreasonable, cruel, or dishonest" in asking the people to settle for themselves this public-house question? It does seem an unreasonable, cruel, and dishonest thing to plant these houses thickly in a neighbourhood without the consent of the people. According to the statement of the chairman of the last Licensing Sessions in Newcastle-on-Tyne, a public-house was planted by magisterial decision in a suburb of that town, and some thousands were added to the value of the property, while the adjacent property suffered a corresponding depreciation. There does seem to be unreasonableness, cruelty, and dishonesty in a proceeding of this kind, where drink-shops are forced upon a neighbourhood, but no such epithets can attach to the expressed will of the people in a matter in which their welfare is so deeply concerned. The Scotch Bill contained what is known as the three options, and proposed to give the people the option of saying if they pleased, first by a majority of two-thirds of the voters in a parish or district, that all licences should be prohibited, or second, by a majority, that the number of licences should be reduced, and the third option gave the people the power to say at the end of three years whether the first or second option, whichever might be adopted, should be repealed. But moderate as this measure was, the Government could not afford to offend the trade, and so the majority at their command was used to quash it. However, this reform is a reform that has time on its side, and sooner or later will have to be dealt with, and the sooner the better for the general good of the nation.

—An agreement appears to have been reached with Russia in relation to affairs in China, which it is hoped will prevent any collision with that Power in the Far East. Both this country and Russia agree to maintain the integrity of China, whatever that may mean, and Great Britain agrees neither to undertake nor encourage the construction of any railway by English persons or others north of the Great Wall. This, of course, gives Russia possession of Manchuria, and in return Russia agrees to afford no encouragement to any persons in regard to the construction of railways in the basin of Yang-tzse. This seems like an agreement to recognise spheres of influence, though any such recognition is disclaimed. It is, however, difficult to consider such an agreement in any other light. Each Power agrees to afford no encouragement to any interference with the other within certain geographical limits, and plain folks see no difference between this and spheres of influence. France regards it in this light, and is by no means pleased that its Russian ally should have come to such an understanding with this country, for France has considerable financial interests in the Yang-tzse valley. Possibly such an understanding may be for the best, though it is difficult to see why the big European Powers should want to plant themselves in Chinese territory. One thing is certain, the good of the Chinese has nothing to do with the policy of the European Powers in the Far East. The benefit of China is with them a very secondary question.

—The Scottish Presbyterian Churches report a year of progress. The Established Church has added 6,673 to its roll of communicants during the year, but its income from voluntary sources shows a slight decline, due, in part, to fewer legacies falling due, and to diminished contributions for the augmentation of smaller livings. The United Presbyterian Church has added to its membership nearly 2,000 during the year, and increased its income by about £25,000, though possibly part of this increase in revenue is due to contributions made to the Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund. The Free Church reports some 3,000 increase in members, and a substantial addition to the Sustentation Fund. The value of voluntarism is seen in the fact that while the Established Church, with a membership of 648,476, has from voluntary sources an income of £487,275, the two non-established Presbyterian Churches, with a membership of 491,160, contribute for the maintenance of their Institutions and agencies, over £1,000,000—the Free Church raising over £600,000. State-supported religion does not show to advantage in the matter of liberality, and a distinct injury is inflicted upon any Church that stands in political relationship with the State.

—The Wesleyan Methodist Church will report an encouraging progress for the past year. According to statistics already published, the increase in membership is likely to approach near to 5,000, with more than 1,000 on trial, and over 1,000 in junior classes. This will rank as one of the four largest increases during the past twenty years. The increase is not confined to any particular locality but spread generally over the Kingdom. The London Missions report a very satisfactory state of things, and some of the old churches in the Metropolis hold on their way prosperously. Great Queen Street, for instance, reports over 1,200 members, an increase of fifty-one for the year. The West Central Mission now reports over 1,600 members, and the increase for the year is 101. The Manchester District, despite its dense population, reports decrease, though the Central Hall Mission in the cotton metropolis reports a membership of nearly 3,000, and an increase for the year of 226. The Central Mission in Leeds, on the other hand, reports a decrease of 172. Evidently from reports published, the Wesleyan Church is very much alive, and seems to be in a fair way to solve the problem of dealing with the congested condition of our large towns. Their most able men are taking the work of evangelism in hand, and devoting their energies to mission work where men are most densely congregated. This is the right course. Any kind of an agent will not do for evangelistic work in the great centres of population. What is needed is men of culture and of heart, who combine scholarly attainments with intense zeal and an enthusiastic devotion to the work of saving men; and men of this sort the Wesleyan Church is placing in charge of the mission work in large towns with the best results. Methodism is in some measure realising again, though in a different manner, that Evangelism is the great work of the Christian ministry, and in proportion as this is realised, with due regard to the altered social conditions of to-day, will Methodism succeed and accomplish wonders as great in the twentieth century as it did in the eighteenth century.

—The Wesleyan Twentieth Century Million Fund continues to grow. It has now reached 634,405 guineas, and a considerable number of circuits have not as yet made any pledge, and no effort has yet been made in connection with the schools of the Connexion. There seems to be every likelihood that the sum contemplated, and even more, will be promised ere this year closes; and as the time in which the promises have to be paid in is not great, it may be reasonably expected that the failures will not be many. It is not prudent to extend an effort of this kind over a great length of time, and our Wesleyan friends have acted wisely in limiting it to a couple of years, the first to securing the promises, and the second to realising them. If imitation may be said to be the best form of flattery, certainly our Wesleyan friends must feel very highly flattered, for their movement has found numerous imitations in this country, and some even across the seas.

—The Synods of the Non-established Presbyterian Churches of Scotland have no more serious question under consideration than that of union. In this matter it is felt that the surest haste is to proceed slowly. The Presbyteries of both the U. P. and the Free Church have had the question under consideration in one form or another for some time, but a recent effort has been made to ascertain with some definiteness through the Presbyteries the mind of the Churches in relation to it. The general result may be stated as a willingness for union, but no very great enthusiasm respecting it. In the United Presbyterian Church the Presbyteries have given a unanimous Yes in favour of union, while out of seventy-five Presbyteries of the Free Church, seventy-one have pronounced in favour of it. The United Presbyterian Church has gone a step further and remitted the question to the consideration of the local sessions, with the result that out of 583 sessions, 527 have reported favourably, and only two or three have indicated disapproval. There is, then, in this Church as near an approach to unanimity as can be reasonably expected. The Free Church does not send the question beyond the Presbyteries, and in this Church there is some slight show of opposition in the Highlands, though possibly it may pass away. It seems more than probable that a Uniting Act will be drafted, and if not considered by the assemblies this year, will undergo careful legal revision with a view of presentation to the assemblies in May, 1900, and in that case union will not become an accomplished fact before 1901. It does seem, however, probable that before other three years pass, the non-established Presbyterianism of Scotland will form one powerful and influential Church, and so another step will be made towards that visible unity in the Church of Christ, which to many seems so desirable.

—The main difficulty in the way of union has been largely removed by inquiry as to what was the practice in each of these two Churches. The United Presbyterian Church, of course, stood for pure voluntarism, while the Free Church was not indisposed to accept State aid under certain conditions. It now appears that in both Churches grants are accepted in the mission field for instruction exclusively in purely secular branches of education. This narrows the difference between the two Churches. The Free Church accepts grants in aid of its training colleges, but these are not made in respect of religious instruction, nor does the acceptance of them involve any contract with the State in respect to religious teaching. So that in respect to the question of State aid there does not appear to be the difference in practice that was supposed. As regards other matters, such as the length of the future theological curriculum, provision for the ministry, and financial arrangements relating to the Sustentation and Augmentation Funds, now existing in the two Churches, it has been wisely resolved to leave them for final settlement in the light of such experience as may be gained after the union is effected.

—The contents of the two reports proceeding from the two sections into which the Royal Commission on the Drink Traffic has been divided are now known, and the difference is not so great as might have been supposed. Division in this Commission was inevitable from the first. In fact, it seems to have been constituted with a view to division. It consisted of twenty-four members—eight representatives of the traffic, eight representatives of Temperance opinion, and eight supposed neutrals. It was, in fact, a sort of court of arbitration in which both sides were represented, and an umpire appointed to decide between them, only in this case the umpire was divisible, and the neutral eight did not act together. A surer device for producing no practical result can scarcely be imagined, and undoubtedly it has in some measure served the purpose of the Government and staved off any immediate discussion of questions affecting the drink traffic. The Commission has, however, gathered a quantity of evidence in relation to the traffic that may be useful in educating public opinion if judiciously applied, and lead to some effective reform in the future. The two reports deal with the number of public-houses, and both agree they are too numerous, but they differ as to the practical effect of an excessive number of licences. The minority report—that of the Temperance section of the Commission—states that the excessive number of licences is a factor of the first importance in encouraging drunkenness; while the majority report states that the evidence does not sustain this conclusion. But those who live in localities where drink-shops abound, know too well on which side the truth in this matter lies. However, both sections agree that the number of public-houses should be reduced. In relation to the method of reduction, the question of compensation of course comes in, and though both reports are favourable to compensation, yet they are favourable to it on different grounds. The majority hold that the disestablished publican, or brewer, has an indefeasible right to full compensation for the loss of his licence,—in fact, claim that it is real property, as much so as land he has bought, or house he has built. The minority, however, dissent from this doctrine, and maintain that such a claim cannot be sustained, as there is by law no property in a licence, but on the ground of expediency they are willing for compensation to be granted, and for this purpose suggest that for seven years a fund should be accumulated by a tax on all public-house licences, and that out of this fund, after the expiration of seven years, a moderate compensation should be paid to those publicans whose licences would then be taken away, and that during the five years following the seven, the number of houses should be reduced to one for every 750 persons in towns, and to every 400 in the country, and that after the five years expired no further compensation should be allowed for houses closed. This may pass as a paper scheme, but as a practical measure it is valueless. In fact, compensation, though provided by the publicans themselves, is unjust. A publican holds his licence for a year, and pays for that, and if he gets what he pays for, what claim has he for anything more? Evidently none. To concede compensation in any form is to give the whole case away. The publican either has a right to be compensated, or he has not, and if he has not, as the minority in their report maintain, why, then, should he be paid that to which he has no claim? To compensate a publican when he has held his licence for the term for which it was granted would be an injustice from whatever source the funds came.

—In relation to tied houses the two reports do not seriously differ. The majority think that this system does not increase drinking, while the minority are of opinion it does, as its precise purpose is to push the sale of drink, but both consider the abolition as impracticable, though for what reason is difficult to conceive. The minority suggest that in order to regulate this class of houses, magistrates should show less consideration for the property of brewers, a likely thing, truly, as the Bench is at present constituted. Both reports recommend some change in the licensing authority; the majority think a committee selected by the justices would meet the case, while the minority would make the licensing authority to consist of County Councillors, or, at any rate, of one-half nominees of the County Council. Reforms these of small moment. Neither report deals in any way effectively with the sale of drink to children, or with bogus clubs, and neither report favours prohibition or the local veto. There is one important and significant difference between the two reports, the report of the minority—that is the Temperance section—supplies evidence in support of suggestions made, while the report of the trade section of the Commission evidently think that evidence is best omitted, and hence none is supplied. The work of the Commission, save for the evidence it has gathered, is valueless, as nothing practical will follow from it, but in this respect it does not differ from Royal Commissions in general, they are simply devices for removing awkward questions out of the path of Governments.

WILLIAM GLASS, ESQ.; C.C.,
CHAIRMAN OF THE METROPOLITAN MISSIONARY MEETING.

William Glass, Esq., C.C.,

CHAIRMAN OF THE METROPOLITAN MISSIONARY MEETING.

R. W. GLASS is one of nature's noblemen. The elements are so mixed in him that all who know him pronounce him a born gentleman. He may lack the smartness that comes of mingling with the crowd, but as to the real grit of his nature there is no question.

Some men require paint, so poor is their quality; Mr. Glass is of the substance that will polish. In the loins of his ancestors he hails from the Borders, and he has all that regard for sober thoughtfulness that is characteristic of men reared in quiet places. Publicity is the last thing he would think of; at the same time anything like self-centredness is most foreign to the whole man. There are few men whose lives have been so full of kindly thought and loving deed.

If we mistake not, Mr. Glass was born in the county of Durham, and he has spent the whole of his life within the bounds of the present Thornley Circuit. His parentage was humble but honest. Both father and mother were most industrious people; and they brought up their family with the same appreciation of the value of hard work.

As an employer of labour Mr. Glass is one of the increasing number of gentlemen who hold their position as a trust from God for the promotion of human weal. The work-people of "Richard Glass and Sons," are regarded as human beings, with kindred sympathies and desires, sensitive to the struggle of life, and having their own burdens. There is no set system of profit-sharing at the "Wellfield Brick and Tile Works" that we are aware of, but such is the general considerateness for all the rights and interests of the employees that the relations between employers and employed are most cordial.

Mr. Glass is no ardent politician. He is reckoned among the Liberals on the Durham County Council, but the general estimate of his fairness is seen in that he was requested by both political parties in the electorate to become the representative of his Division in that Council; and he was elected unopposed.

But it is in church work and in the secret service of true philanthropy that Mr. Glass is most at home. We have heard that he became a Sunday School Secretary when he was but fifteen years of age; and though now about sixty he has ever since been in office in the Sunday School. For the last forty years he has been connected with the school at Wingate; and we question whether ever a superintendent was more intimate with the young people under his charge. A striking feature of our premises at Wingate is the extensive accommodation for school work. Here you have an indication of the influence of Mr. Glass. The Church and schools were erected some three years ago, at a cost of over £2,000; and in order that the schools might be as replete as possible, the superintendent generously contributed £1,000. Mr. Glass is leader of a Society class, but his Catechumen class is equally dear to him. Scarcely a Connexional Scripture Examination is held without a prize going to Wingate. Here again, Mr. Glass is felt. For weeks previously he will meet the candidates, posting them up in all sorts of possible questions. Few societies do more for the Missionary funds than that at Wingate, as may be seen by the Missionary Report for any year; the fact that Mr. Glass encourages each collector every year by the gift of a suitable book may afford some explanation. Thornley Circuit generally secures honourable mention in the District report for the Orphanage; Mr. Glass himself manages that part of circuit work. It will be judged that Mr. Glass is beloved by the young people, that feeling found expression recently in the provision of a new school banner, with a striking likeness of the superintendent on one side, and a picture of the Good Shepherd on the other.

As to Mr. Glass' delicate charities, who can write of these? they are known only to Him who seeth in secret. But some of the richest benedictions of his life must be the thankful tears of the widow and the fatherless.

As Circuit Steward Mr. Glass is a tower of strength. A fine Christian temper pervades all he does.

The greatest honour the Connexion has bestowed on Mr. Glass, that of Vice-President of Conference, is the position that he would most willingly have missed; but having accepted, "to please the brethren," as he says, he has given himself most loyally to it. It is perfectly safe to say that of the numerous applications for service from all parts of the Connexion, he has never refused one, if he had the date clear. His only regret is that owing to the delicate health of Mrs. Glass, she has not been able to accompany him on his journeys. We feel sure that our readers will all join in praying for them both a happy eventide and a bright resurrection morn.

A STORY FOR THE TIMES.*

By JOSEPH HOCKING,

AUTHOR OF "THE BIRTHRIGHT," "MISTRESS NANCY MOLESWORTH," "ALL MEN ARE LIARS,"
"THE STORY OF ANDREW FAIRFAX," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

"ALL ROADS LEAD TO ROME."

RUTLAND had no companion on his journey to the home of the Vatican. Some of the members of his congregation had hinted that if he would wait a few weeks until they could make arrangements they would accompany him. But he did not encourage their advances. He wanted to be alone, wanted to be free from all prying eyes as he studied the Papacy at its centre. The local paper had announced that he intended taking the journey, and so all the town knew of it, and a number of people came to the station to see him off when he started for London, the first stage of his journey.

Among these were Matthay Bray and Jonas Dixon.

"Naa see that thaa comes 'ome wi' a bit o' colour i' thee faace," they said.

"I'll try," said Rutland, with a wintry smile.

"'Appen as aa the Pope 'ev 'eerd on thee, and 'appen 'e'l want to see thee. If 'oo does, tha tell 'im as aa us Lancashire foak want nowt of his tribe."

"All right."

"And look 'ere," said Jonas Dixon, "see that thaa doesn't pick up wi' ony Italian lasses. Thou'lt find nowt there as good as we 'ev i' Lancashire. Eh, but thou ought to 'ave 'ad a wife to tak' care o' thee!"

"I'll promise to keep clear of them all," said Duncan.

"Yi, that's right. I tell thee, lot o' th' Tudor lasses 'ave 'ad wet eyes while thou'st bin i' bed. Ef owt 'appens to thee a'l th' town 'll go into mournin'. I main it. Thou mayn't think it, 'cos we doan't say over mich; but we think a lot o' thee. I'm tellin' thee naa. Us be a bit rough, I reckon, but ther'll be 'undreds o' foak prayin' for thee," and Duncan saw the tears in the old weaver's eyes.

"Yi, and that ther' will," said old Matthay Bray. "But tak' keer o' thysen, Mester Rutland, I've 'eerd as aa the Italians carry knives wi' 'em, and that they fair 'aate th' Protestants."

"I'll be careful," said the young man.

The express train came in, and scores of people thronged around him. Youths and girls, men and women, a'l waiting to shake his hand and wish him God speed.

"We'll be rare and g'ad to see ye back," they said, "God bless yo'."

* Copyright in the United States of America;

The train swept out of the station, and left the crowd on the platform.

"Eh, but yon's a grand lad," they said one to another. "Ther's never been his equal i' Lynford. It 'ud be a sad day for Tudor if he left it."

"Yi, it would," said another. "Oo's been a rare defender o' th' faith."

Meanwhile Duncan sat in the carriage thinking of the future. He was still weak, and had arranged to do the journey in easy stages. He had received a letter from Lady Neville, containing kind expressions, and the fervent hope that he would soon be restored to health, and also recommending him to a comfortable hotel. Unknown to him, moreover, Father Ritzoom had written to several of his friends in Rome, telling them of his hopes concerning him, and asking them to show him every courtesy.

Each day since the doctor had given his consent for Duncan to read, the young man had been studying books on Rome, and trying to get an insight into the condition of the city. He had become much interested in the endeavour of the Popes to try and retain temporal power, and had often looked at the picture of St. Peter's and the Vatican, and had noted the windows of the room where the aged Pontiff spent his days. Popular rumour had it that Leo XIII. often stood at that window and looked out over the city which was lost to him. It was also said that he indulged in dreams of the time when the Papal States should be restored to the Vatican, and he should have Imperial as well as spiritual power. When the train had left the manufacturing districts, and drew nearer to London, the purpose of his visit to Rome became clearer to him. The people of Tudor had no idea why he had chosen Rome rather than Cairo or Algiers, but it was painfully real to him, and presently he was able to review the situation clearly.

Sometimes he wondered whether he was behaving quite worthily; but he really could not see how he could have acted differently. He could not help himself, neither could he have controlled the order of events. He could not accept the teachings of the Catholic Church; but he could not resist being impressed by the picture of the Church which Ritzoom had brought before his mind, neither could he help feeling the beautiful atmosphere of that Catholic home at the Priory. Had he not been brought into contact with Alison Neville and Father Ritzoom, his life would doubtless have been different; but both had come across the pathway of his life, and both had impressed him. They had made him feel the greatness, the grandeur of the Catholic Church, had appealed to his love for the beautiful, the stately, and had caused him to see visions of a great united Christianity all over the world. After all, it could not be God's will to see the Church split into sections, and each party glorifying its own little sect. Surely God meant His Church to be one. Well, had not the Roman Church remained true to this idea? She was the same all over the world. True, he recognised the fact that the Reformation had given religious liberty, but had not that liberty degenerated into license? Besides, even a man like Goethe had condemned the work of Luther and his followers. There could be no doubt that liberty degenerated into licence? Besides, even Erasmus and Luther, but could it not be reformed from within? and could not even now a great reunion take place? Rome was no longer what it once was; she had been represented as a great loving mother waiting to welcome back her wayward children, and she had purged herself from the corruptions which were once destroying her. Again, if there was anything in Apostolical succession, doubtless the Romanists had the advantage of it, for all true Protestants had discarded it as a baseless dream. There was something in the idea of an infallible church; something wondrously fascinating in the thought that poor, tired souls could rest on her great bosom and give doubts and fears to the wind.

All this Ritzoom had made him feel, and now that he was weak and ill, weary and worn from long weeks of studying and struggling and fighting, he longed for rest and peace.

But perhaps these things would not have affected him so much had not a great overmastering love for Alison Neville come into his life. He felt instinctively that her life was pure and beautiful. She appealed to all that was holiest and best in him. And she had given him hope. The only thing that seemed to stand between them was the difference in their faith. He did not think of the bitter opposition which Lady Neville would offer, if he made known his wishes to her. He had no idea of the power of caste, and how one in her position would never give her consent for her daughter to link her life with such as he. Lady Neville had expressed such liberal opinions, and had received him with such kindness that it seemed probable that she would overlook the difference between their birth and training. After all she must recognise the truth of Burns' words, that the rank was but the guinea stamp, and that the man was the gold. Perhaps, too, the difference in their religion, which had been urged by Alison as the reason she could not think of loving him, had seemed so great, that it overshadowed everything else. And surely he owed it to her, to himself, to do all in his power to remove the obstacle that stood between them. They were fellow Christians. Both believed in God, and Christ, and in the great fundamentals of Christianity. It was only a difference in detail which divided them. He had no doubt about his own relation to God, no doubt about his right to preach the Gospel, but, then, if the Catholic idea of the Church was true,—well, at least, he ought to use every means to investigate it. Books had altogether failed to convince him. Newman had driven him further away from sacerdotalism; Purcell's "Life of Manning" had destroyed many illusions. All the same he would see Rome, study the effect of this wondrous system where for fifteen centuries its power had been almost supreme. And then—well, he would follow the leadings of God.

He had told his church nothing of this. It would have done harm rather than good had he done so. The people would not have understood. And he had done his duty at Lynford. On all hands it was admitted that he had done the work of two men; on all hands, too, he was told that never had a minister been so successful.

If he were ever led to resign Tudor—well, he must face the fact fairly. In any case he must do his duty.

He stopped one night in London, another in Paris, another at Turin, another at Genoa, and at each stage of the journey he felt himself gaining strength. It was a wondrous change to him. At Lynford the sky was black, murky, the air was smoke-sodden, and winter reigned supreme. In Italy the sky was cloudless, the air was clear and soft and balmy. He had arrived at Genoa at noon-day, and after he had lunch he went out into the town. Everywhere the evergreen trees glinted in the sunshine. He stood in the square where the statue of Christopher Columbus stands and gazed around him. Ah, it was glorious to be away from the smoke and grime, beautiful beyond words to breathe the pure air of the sunny south. He walked slowly around the town, and by-and-by reached the suburbs. Here the gardens were filled with orange trees, and the luscious fruit was ripening beneath the warm, bright sun. He went towards the sea, where the waters of the Mediterranean lapped the shore. Behind him stood the mountains. Away, away, as far as the eye could reach they lifted their giant peaks into the clear, blue sky, beneath and beyond him were the waters of the Mediterranean. Italy seemed to him like a land of dreams, of fair visions.

He was tempted to stay at Genoa, but he wanted to be in Rome, whose name had for two thousand years been a synonym for civilisation, for art, for culture. As a boy he had dreamed of going there, as a man he had longed to go, and now he was on his way. Somehow he felt that his life's destiny lay in Rome, so the next day at noon he started on the last stage of his journey.

Prudence told him to stay at Pisa, and rest the night there. He was still languid and weak—a few weeks before he had been at the very portals of death. He ought to rest there, and not overtax his newly returning strength. But he was too eager to be in Rome, too eager to see those sights which he felt would mean the turning point of his life.

He drew near Rome shortly before midnight, after a weary ride through a wide stretch of dreary country, and as he looked out of the carriage window he saw the lights of the city.

Rome! Rome! He grew excited. This city, hoary with age, and laden with mystery, was near at last. He thought of Romulus, who 700 years before Christ, founded a mighty empire, thought of the great heroes who succeeded him, thought of the old Romans who conquered the neighbouring peoples, of the republic that was formed, and of the Cæsars who sat on the Imperial throne. Rome! the city to which Paul came, and where he was persecuted and killed; the city, too, where, legend had it, Peter came, and was crucified. Here, too, Constantine came and bent before the conquering cross, to Rome also came Charlemagne, and handed over kingdoms to the Pope. Rome! Rome! there was music, mystery, romance in the word. He seemed to see the sweep of centuries as he sat back in the carriage-seat and closed his eyes. He pictured one Pope after another reigning there. He saw Hildebrand scheming to make the world kneel to him, he pictured Huss coming to Rome to tell his dream to the Pope, saw Leo arranging for the erection of St. Peter's, and beheld Luther coming barefooted and alone to the Eternal City. Then he pictured it after the Reformation, and thought of Pius, and Paul, who, with stern relentlessness, sent out their edicts concerning heretics. He thought of the findings of the Council of Trent, of the rise of Ignatius of Loyola, and the founding of the Jesuits. He fancied Gregory on his way to St. Peter's to thank God for the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and thought of St. Ignatius longing to come to Rome, but hesitating until he saw a vision of Christ, who told him that He would be with him. Then the history of Rome's decay appeared before him. He saw the power of the Vatican lessening year by year, until the Popes began to tremble for their own safety. England and Germany, instead of returning to the Latin Church, drifted further and further away, while France, the eldest daughter of Rome, plunged into mad orgies and wild revolt against organised religion. Then Napoleon came, and played with the Pope as he played with the rest of the world, until the power of the Vatican was but a thin shadow of its former greatness. He thought of the schemes of Mazzini and Garibaldi for the Unification of Italy, and how, after heroic struggles and much bloodshed, the nation was re-born, and every state, with the exception of Rome, became united according to the dream of the Italian patriots. He fancied the French army defending this one Papal State against Italy, and then saw the French soldiers march away only to be crushed by the Germans. How the pride of Pius IX. must have suffered! And still this man, while yielding outwardly, held tenaciously to his opinions and demands. The dogma of Papal Infallibility became the faith of the Church, and afterwards the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. Then Pius IX. died and Leo XIII. sat on the Papal Chair; and this poor old man, after years of scheming and waiting, still hoped and longed for Imperial power. He fancied Leo XIII. standing at his window at night and looking over the city thinking of the time when it belonged to the Church, and dreaming of that day when it should be again governed from the Vatican. Poor old man! It was a pathetic thought, and yet there was something sublime in it. The Church, so Father Ritzoom said, never legislated for a day, a century, but for eternity, and Leo would claim to be a link in the Eternal Chain of the Church. Cardinal Manning had said that it was the work of the Church to bow the neck of an Imperial race, the English race, to the claims of Rome. Would this ever come to pass, would the dreams of Leo be ever realised?

His thoughts and fancies were dispelled by the cry of "Roma! Roma!" and he alighted from the train to see an excited throng. Giving his luggage to a porter, and telling him the name of his hotel, he followed him until they reached the hotel 'bus, and a few minutes later he was on his way to the Grand Hotel de Russie, where he had arranged to stay.

Although the day had been warm, the night was cold, and Rutland was glad on his arrival to find that the dining room had been heated, and a good supper provided. He was still excited, and he had no desire to sleep, but he remembered his recent illness, and soon found his way to his bedroom, where he immediately fell fast asleep. He was up betimes in the morning, but he did not intend to start sight-seeing for a few days. He desired rather to wander around the city, and become acquainted with its streets and squares before visiting the churches, and studying the life of the people. There was no need for him to hurry. The doctor had told him that he must on no account return under two months, and the church had requested him to stay until his health was perfectly restored. A letter had also reached him from the manager of one of the Lynford banks, telling him that arrangements had been made whereby he could, by applying at one of the Italian banks, obtain enough money to cover a much larger expenditure than he was likely to make. The manager assured him that this sum was deposited at his own bank by a friend (who desired that his name should be unknown), in his, Rutland's, name, and for his use, and that he must not hesitate to take advantage of the arrangement. The young minister was much moved by this expression of kindness, at the same time he determined not to benefit by it. He had a little private property, and as he had not spent the whole of the salary his Church had given him, he knew that he had no need to trouble about money.

He determined not to hurry himself therefore, and for three days he simply walked around the city, threaded its main thoroughfares, and watched the throngs of people who passed by, without in any way troubling about the purpose of his visit. These three days were not without their effect upon him however. It is impossible to be in Rome without being impressed, impossible to see the old and the new, the Pagan and the Christian struggling together without being moved to wonder. During those three days he traversed Rome from side to side, and familiarised himself with the names and positions of streets and squares; he wandered among the ruins of the Forum, traversed the Corso, watched the Tiber in its sweep towards the sea, and saw the mighty dome of St. Peter's, and the great irregular buildings which comprised the Vatican. He had not sought to understand the inwardness of all these things, he had declared that he would not seek to study anything for at least a week, and yet Rome stunned him. He could not help marveling at its revelation; sometimes he felt as though he was but dreaming a strange dream, from which he would soon be awakened. And yet, although he knew it not, he was adopting the best method of seeing Rome, he was preparing himself to see the wonders which would be revealed to him later.

At the end of three days, however, just as he was thinking of trying to discover some man who knew the history of Rome, who might be willing to explain to him some of the sights, a waiter came to him and handed him a card.

"Who can wish to see me?" thought Rutland. "As far as I am aware there is not a soul in Rome who knows me."

He glanced at the card and read the name.

"Rev. Richard Matthew, S.J.," he read, "who can he be, I wonder?"

He followed the waiter into the drawing room, where he saw a young priest.

"Excuse me for calling," said this young man, "but some English friends of mine told me you were here, and I thought I might be of service to you. I have lived in Rome a good many years, and know the city well."

He seemed rather nervous, but he had a kind, frank face, and Rutland felt drawn to him immediately.

"Sit down, will you?" he said cordially.

CHAPTER XX.

THE HOME OF THE PAPACY.

THE young priest accepted Rutland's invitation, but both soon discovered that it was impossible to converse with any degree of comfort. All around them was a crowd of people talking and gesticulating. It reminded Rutland of the tower of Babel; French and English, Germans and Russians, Italians and Spaniards were jabbering incessantly, and all seemed bent on making quiet conversation impossible. So Rutland led the way into the billiard-room, which was quite deserted. He then ordered coffee and cigars, and having drawn two arm-chairs close together they were enabled to talk.

"This is indeed kind of you," said the young minister heartily. "I have been longing to find ordinary routine of my life, and if we can go around together for a few days I shall be more than delighted."

"Do you mean to say," cried Rutland, "that you can accompany me around the city?"

"If you will have me," said the priest. "Father Ritzoom has great influence with my superior here, and knowing that the ordinary guide is worse than useless, he requested that I should be your companion in your peregrinations. You see, almost every church here has an interesting history, while every square, every column, and every bit of ruin is associated with romantic incidents. Besides, I can give you an insight into the life here, and I can enable you to see things altogether out of the reach of the ordinary tourist."

"Why, this is charming of you!" said Rutland. "I know something of the ordinary guide, and had determined to avoid him. I know just a little of Italian, but only just enough to make me exasperated at my own ignorance. You speak the language well, I expect?"

"Oh yes, I have lived here for years! I am Irish by birth, and was partly educated there, but I speak Italian as well as I do English. By the way, you would, perhaps, like to see Father Ritzoom's letter to my superior," and he passed some papers on to Rutland.

The young man read eagerly. It was full of friendly expressions towards himself, and expressed the hope that Father Rizzio would be able to spare young Father Matthew to show Rutland the sights of Rome, and explain to him those things in which he might take a particular interest. The letter, moreover, spoke of Rutland as being on friendly terms with Lady Neville, and a young man of considerable influence in the town of Lynford. It gave no hint as to what position he held, or of the part he had taken in the controversy in the town.

"This is very kind of Father Ritzoom," said Rutland; then with characteristic frankness he continued, "but I think you ought to know, Father Matthew, that I am a Protestant, and what is more, a Protestant minister of religion."

"Are you?" said the young priest cordially, "then we shall have more interests in common. Pray do not think that what you have said will make any difference. Of course, I presume Father Ritzoom was acquainted with this fact when he wrote."

"Oh, perfectly," said Rutland. "I wonder that he did not mention it in the letter."

"I suppose he did not think it worth while," said the Jesuit. "He knew it would make no difference to us. Besides, do you know I am in some way related to the renowned Father Matthew, the great apostle of Temperance, and I should be libelling my name if the fact of your being a Protestant made me less willing to serve you," and there was a frank, kind expression on his face which made Rutland believe his words without question.

"HE DREW NEAR ROME SHORTLY BEFORE MID-NIGHT."

someone who knows Rome well, and you come as a sort of Deus ex Machina. But who told you I was here?"

"I had a letter from Father Ritzoom," said the young priest; "he told me that you were acquainted, and that you would probably be lonely here. He asked me to call on you, and offer you any help in my power."

"I am just a bit lonely," said Rutland. "Of course, I have just begun to have a speaking acquaintance with a few people, but then I know no one. Most of the visitors here have their own circle of friends, and I am quite alone. I feel very grateful both to you and Father Ritzoom."

"As to that," said Father Matthew, "I am inclined to think the advantage is not all on your side. I am as glad as a bird to get away from the

"And do you know anything of the life of the Vatican?" asked Rutland.

"Oh yes, I know something of it. Of course, as a Jesuit, we never aim at a position of honour in the Church. Our vows practically preclude all ambitions for high places. Still Father Rizzio has great influence with the Holy Father, and is naturally much connected with the Vatican. Would you like to see his Holiness?"

"Yes, I should like to see him very much. Of course I should not think of an interview with him, but it would be interesting to see him, and to note the impression he makes on the people."

"Oh, that can be managed. I will speak to Father Rizzio about it, and he will arrange for you to see his Holiness. By the way, when do you wish to start?"

"What, sight-seeing?"

"Yes."

"I should like to begin at once. I am quite strong enough now. Do you know I have been very ill? But I feel quite able now to take any amount of exercise. The air is so pure here, so clear, and crisp, and exhilarating, that I can eat like a farm labourer. Perhaps the best plan would be for me to hire a carriage by the day, and then go from one place of interest to another."

"Yes, that would be all right; but you had better have some system in seeing Rome. It is not like an ordinary city."

"I have seen that; but what would you suggest?"

"Well, it depends. You see there are three Romes. There is ancient Rome, there is Rome as the capital of Italy, and there is Rome as the head of the Church. Which do you wish to see?"

"Oh, Rome as the head of the Catholic Church, but, then, are not the three connected? Can one understand one without studying the other?"

"Then I'll tell you what I suggest," said Father Matthew. "The best way will be to begin by studying the plans and Ideals of the Church. I will introduce you to Father Rizzio, and he will give you an idea of our missionary work, and I can obtain interviews with the heads of other departments of our work. After that you will be prepared to see our churches, and to know something of their history. You see every nation in the world is represented here. Every nation has its Church, and every Church has its history. The Jesuit Church is simply a wonder, while the Church for the English Catholics is wondrously fascinating. It contained the head of John the Baptist for about a thousand years. I happen to know something of the history of all the principal Churches, and I shall be delighted to tell you about them."

"But this will take a long time," objected Rutland, "I am afraid I shall be a great nuisance to you."

"Oh, nonsense! Father Rizzio has placed my services at your disposal, and I shall be delighted to go with you. Will you see Father Rizzio in the morning?"

"Yes, I shall be delighted."

"Good. I will call here at ten o'clock then."

When Father Matthew was gone Rutland thought of what had been said. Once he wondered whether Father Rizzio had some secret purpose in making such arrangements for him; but he dispelled the suspicion as unworthy. Besides, what room had he to doubt? He had come to see Rome, and to see it through the eyes of those who understood its divine meanings. What better opportunity could he have than that presented by the young Jesuit? It was more than he had ever hoped for, and he felt grateful to Father Rizzio for his great kindness. After all, he had greatly misjudged these Catholics. Although he had been their greatest enemy in Lynford, they had forgiven him freely, and had heaped kindnesses upon him. He thought of Alison too. He had not seen her for months, never, in fact, since September, and it was now the beginning of February, but his love for her had seemed to grow stronger every day. He had every reason to think well of those belonging to her faith, for was not she the embodiment of womanly beauty and purity, was not she the one woman in the world to him?

During the next week he saw little of Rome from the outside; instead, he accompanied Father Matthew to the dwelling places of those who were the moving forces in the Catholic world. After he had made a few visits he was simply staggered at what he saw. Of Rome as a city he knew next to nothing, but of Rome as a great centre of enterprise and religious activity he learnt much. After all, it was no wonder that these Catholics were proud of their history. Father Rizzio described to him the work of the Jesuits in the mission field, how ever since the days of Ignatius, they had gone from land to land, and establishing the Church everywhere. He told him of their schemes for establishing the faith in heathen lands, of the progress they were making, and of the length of time he expected it would take to dethrone heathenism, and enthroned Christianity in those regions they had marked out as peculiarly their own. After he had spent some hours with Father Rizzio, he was introduced to the General of the Order of St. Dominic. The stern strength of the founder of this great army was revealed to him, and how, in days of lethargy and darkness, he established a great order of preachers. He was told how they had swept across vast districts like a mighty avalanche, and how everywhere the Dominican monks had planted the standard of the Cross. The General, who was a man of great personality, told him of his present plans, and how the monks of St. Dominic were going into the darkest regions of the earth, and establishing the faith. Vast as the organisation was he seemed to know every detail of its working, and was cognisant of every scheme for the advancement of the Church. Both among the Jesuits and the Dominicans there seemed a perfect system of work. No army ready for battle could have a more clearly defined plan of campaign, no regiment could be more perfectly disciplined than were the priests.

The same was true in relation to the Franciscans, only they appealed to him in a different way. Like the Jesuits and Dominicans, the Franciscans had taken the Vow of Poverty, Chastity, and Obedience, but they seemed to regard it more strictly. Rutland had always been a great admirer of St. Francis, and had spent many hours in poring over the history of his career. The way in which he and his followers had gained such ascendancy in the Western Church had seemed to the young minister as little short of miraculous, and so it was with a feeling akin to awe that he spoke to the representative of an order which had existed for seven hundred years. He noted, too, the extreme simplicity of the life of the monks, and listened with wonder as he was told of the hardships they endured. St. Francis had conceived in the far back past that the essence of Christianity lay in poverty, and through the centuries the monks had carried out their founder's ideals. It is true he remembered the strife which had existed between the Franciscans and the Dominicans, but this seemed but as nothing as he talked with the General of the Order. He was for the time so much impressed by the spirit of St. Francis that he forgot those things which the critic of the order would naturally advance. He saw these men going out, like the apostles of old, "having nothing, yet possessing all things," taking with them neither scrip nor purse, trusting in God for their daily bread, and everywhere proclaiming the good news of God. He saw, too, something of the greatness of their ideals, and of their plans of winning the world to the Church.

He also saw the heads of the Orders of the Trappists, the Benedictines, the Passionists; he had a conversation with the Mother Superior of the Poor Clares, those sisters who went everywhere on their errands of mercy; in short, he saw the great societies of the Church in their spiritual aspect, and for a time he was stunned. Never had he dreamed of such perfect organisation, never had he thought of such far-reaching efforts to establish the Catholic Church.

"Of course, you have only seen but a very little," said Father Matthew to him, "but enough to form some idea of what is represented here at Rome. Enough, too, to prepare your mind to visit some of the churches. I think now, after looking through two or three of the principal colleges, we had better attend the Church of St. John's Lateran, where an ordination service takes place in a few days."

"Very well," said Rutland, "I shall be delighted."

"Have you been pleased with what you have seen?"

"Oh yes, it is very wonderful. Your Church has some tremendous organisations."

"Yes, but in reality they are all one. Of course, it is natural that our enterprises should appear colossal to you. A Church which has existed for nearly nineteen centuries, and has spread all over the world, cannot be easily understood."

"No, it cannot. But I have been greatly interested. I should never have seen these things but for you."

"I am glad to have been of service to you; but I ought to tell you that for the next two days I shall be engaged. To-morrow is Sunday, and I have much to do. On Monday I have to go to Frascati, but after that I shall be able to accompany you again."

"All right," said Duncan. "To be frank, I shall be glad of a little rest. During the fortnight we have been together I have seen what I never dreamed of, and Rome has become a new city."

"I daresay it has," replied the priest. "The truth is the ordinary visitor to Rome sees practically nothing, because he understands nothing. He goes around with a guide-book in his hand, and stares at the churches and the monuments, he reads certain commonplaces, and then fancies he has 'done' Rome. Of the real inwardness of the place he knows just as much as he knew before he came. Of course, you have only had a glimpse of the inner life of the Church. You have seen, in bare outline, something of our scope and purpose. You have heard explanations of what has been done, and what is being done, and can now faintly get an idea of the vast army of priests who are engaged in winning the world to the subjection of the Holy Father. Presently you will understand more; because you will see, as far as Rome can show you, how our ideals will be translated into facts."

The young priest spoke with the utmost assurance, he had no apparent doubt of final victory, and Rutland, who was under the spell of the men with whom during the past fortnight he had been conversing, was influenced by his words. Up to the present he had not given much time to studying what he had been told. He had been simply listening, and storing up in his memory the words he had heard.

They were standing on the steps of St. Peter's as they spoke, while Rutland's eyes were traversing the windows of the Vatican.

"It's a wonderful building, isn't it?" said Father Matthew, noting his attitude. "Look, that is the window of the Holy Father's apartments, the third from the end there."

"I suppose so," said Rutland. "It is a wonderful place; but only a prison after all."

"Yes, of course, the Pope is a prisoner, although a voluntary one. But that will all be changed. Leo XIII. may not live to see it; but his successor will. In God's time, all Italy will come back to subjection to the Vatican, ay, and so will England and Germany, and the rest of the Protestant nations."

"You think so?"

"There can be no doubt about it."

Rutland could not help smiling.

"Ah, you will see by-and-by. But I must be going now. On Tuesday I will see you again."

The time was about five o'clock in the afternoon, and Rutland started to walk towards his hotel in the Via del Babuino. He made his way across the Piazza St. Pietro, and then, noting a restaurant, stopped for a cup of tea. After the waiter had brought it, he sat for a long time looking at the great church, and watched it as it stood out boldly against the glow of the western sky. St. Peter's stands on the outskirts of the city, and from no part of Rome can it be seen in the light of the rising sun. If one wishes to see this magnificent pile at its best, one must watch it as the day is dying. It was in this light that Rutland saw it on that bright February evening. All around men were working, digging up the grass which grew between the paving-stones, while the shadow cast by the great dome grew darker and darker. Little by little the square became empty. One by one the visitors entered the conveyances, and rode away, and still the young man looked.

"Everything tells of what has been," thought Rutland, "everything seems dying, nothing pulsates with the breath of a new life. All these grass-grown pavements, and all these sleepy-looking priests speak of what has been, nothing tells of a future. Yonder old man, who lives behind those windows, seems a kind of symbol of the faith he represents. It is old, decaying. There is majesty, but it is the majesty of age, and not of new-born life. Now I come to think of it, the Generals of those Orders I spoke to, did not represent young life, but simply a vast machinery. There is no youth in it at all. Everything is so old, so very old. There is the same adherence to rule everywhere. Nothing is the outburst of new ideas, new impulses. They are all old men too. Strong they are, but none of them seem to possess the strength of youth. Everything is cold, calculating. Every man works according to a well-worn plan. Nothing is done without precedent. It seems a huge machinery, this Roman Catholic Church, and the machinery is nowhere managed by young men. But I must see more before I draw conclusions."

The evening grew cold, and he started to walk again. There was plenty of time for him to get back and dress for dinner, so he did not hurry. He made his way across the Tiber, by one of the many bridges by which it is spanned, resisting the appeals of the shop-keepers, who begged him to buy ornaments, asking nearly double the price they expected to get, until he reached Via di Ripetta, and finally, the Piazza del Popolo. For a moment he stood looking at the busy life of the Corso, and then found his way to his hotel.

"It is rather lonely at the hotel," thought the young man, "I scarcely know anyone yet, and I am afraid the next day or two will hang rather heavily. Still, I am glad of the rest, for this last fortnight I seem to have been working very hard. To-morrow morning, however, I'll go to high Mass at St. Peter's, and in the afternoon I will——"

The porter opened the door of the hotel to him, and then he started back in astonishment, while the blood rushed madly to his face. Standing before him with outstretched hand was Alizon Neville.

CHAPTER XXI.

WHAT ALIZON AND DUNCAN SAW AT ST. PETER'S.

"YOU seem surprised to see me," said the girl with a laugh.

"I am, indeed," he replied. "I had no idea that you thought of coming here."

"No! Well, everything has been very sudden. It is less than a week ago since mother decided to come. The truth is she has not been very well, and as winter does not come to an end in Lancashire till the end of April, the doctor ordered her South. She has not been to Rome for many years, while I had never been at all, so she decided that we should come here. Of course, you can imagine how delighted I am to come and see this, the great centre of our faith."

"Oh yes," replied Rutland, "and I am gladder than words can say to see you here. I hope her ladyship is better."

"Yes, she is better, but she is far from strong. The doctor advised Italy, while Father Ritzoom, who has been staying at the Priory, persuaded her to come to Rome. He says it is one of the healthiest cities in the world."

"I should judge that he is right," said Rutland. "Of course before the Italian government took possession Rome was a fever-trap, but now it is wonderfully clean and health-giving."

"And are you better?" asked Alizon kindly.

"Oh yes, I am better."

"It seems such a long time since I saw you. Why, it was last September when we last met, nearly six months ago."

"Yes, it is a long time. It seems six years."

"Does it? And you have been very ill too. I— I was very anxious about you. We often made inquiries."

"You are very kind," replied the young man.

"We heard once that you were dead," said the girl, "and—and mother immediately sent a special messenger to your lodgings. I—I was so relieved to know that the report was false."

"Thank you," replied Rutland. "I suppose at one time the doctor thought I had breathed my last. But there—it's not worth talking about now. I am worth a host of dead men. I'm not going to die yet."

"But what was the cause of such a serious illness?" asked Alizon. She seemed excited, and there was a tremor in her voice.

"The doctor said it was overwork and worry that brought on the brain fever," replied Rutland, gazing steadfastly into her face.

The girl's eyes dropped. "I—I am so glad you are better," she said.

"Thank you, I hope I shall see much of you," he added hesitatingly, "but there is the first bell, I must go and dress for dinner."

When Rutland entered the dining room, he saw Lady Neville sitting at one of the small tables near a window.

"This table is big enough for three," said her ladyship. "I hope you will sit with us. I don't like those long tables, and yet I don't care about dining in my rooms, so I arranged for us to be together, if you are agreeable."

The young man's heart beat fast with delight. Rome had ceased to be merely the centre of the Papacy, and one of the most wonderful cities in the world—it was a veritable Paradise, and at that moment his wildest dreams seemed possible.

During dinner Lady Neville proved a delightful companion. She related some of her former experiences in Rome, how as a girl she had an audience with Pope Pius IX., what he had said to her, and how he had impressed her.

"I was here on my honeymoon with Sir Charles," she said gaily, "so naturally everything appeared to me in the brightest of colours. Besides, the Holy Father was very kind; so were some of the Cardinals. At that time there was a great movement towards Rome. As you know, Newman and Manning brought a troop of converts with them, and it appeared as though the whole country was coming to bow the knee to the Holy Father. It seemed to atone for the loss of Imperial power in the State."

"But Rome has changed since then," suggested Rutland.

"I suppose it has, doubtless it has. But tell me what you have been doing here. Father Ritzoom told me he had written to Father Rizzio asking him to render you any service in his power. I hope he has done so."

Thereupon Rutland told her what he had seen. How he had been led from the head of one organisation to another, and how he had been astounded at the vast magnitude of the machinery of the Church.

"And were these men interesting?" asked her ladyship, her eyes beaming with pleasure and satisfaction.

Thereupon Rutland spoke of the services which had been rendered him in no sparing terms. He extolled very highly the learning and intellectual power of the men with whom he had been brought into contact.

"The Church occupies a different position here from what it does in England," said her ladyship.

"Yes, in a sense the Church is almighty," replied Rutland. "The wealth of the world has been poured into this city. Everything astounds one."

"I am so glad you came here," she replied, "Father Ritzoom feared it might give you a wrong impression, and—" She hesitated a second as though she had said more than she had intended, "You see," she went on, "Rome is not like other cities. It cannot be understood from the outside. It is like a church window. You cannot see its beauty from the outside, you must go inside, and look out towards the light."

"I think I understand, Lady Neville," he replied, but he did not understand at all.

"I am afraid I am not well enough to take much exercise while I am here," said her ladyship. "The doctor has ordered me perfect rest; but I am anxious that Alizon shall see everything. You say that Father Matthew is accompanying you?"

"Yes," he replied, "and—and," he stammered almost painfully, "if Miss Alizon can accompany us—I—I shall be delighted."

"That will be capital," responded her ladyship.

"To-morrow and Monday Father Matthew will be engaged," went on Rutland, "and I had decided to wander around by myself. To-morrow morning I thought of going to high Mass at St. Peter's."

"Oh, mother, I should like to go," said Alizon eagerly.

"Well, why not?" responded her ladyship, "that is if Mr. Rutland will encumber himself with you."

They sat talking during dinner, and then Lady Neville invited him to her private drawing room, where they passed the evening most pleasantly.

On the following morning the two started for St. Peter's. They had allowed themselves plenty of time, and so were able to walk quietly. The sky was clear and bright, the air was crisp and exhilarating. When they reached the Piazza Del Popolo the morning sunlight fairly flooded the square, while up above them in the gardens of the Pincio the evergreens glinted in the light of the bright sun.

"This is lovely," cried the young man, "I never dreamed of such happiness yesterday."

"I am awfully excited," said the girl. "I have often dreamed of being in Rome on a Sunday, and longed to attend high Mass at St. Peter's. Haven't you?"

"No, I cannot say that I have," replied Rutland.

"Oh, I forgot! I do pity you, Mr. Rutland!"

"I pity myself," responded the young man. "This is the Corso," he continued, as they walked down the long thoroughfare. "This afternoon, indeed, on all afternoons, it is crowded with carriages. So is the Pincio above. Yonder is the house which Dumas had in his mind when he described Monte Cristo watching the carnival," and he went on pointing out objects of interest as they went down the thoroughfare.

On their way they passed a group of Italian priests. They were dirty, unshaven, unkempt, greasy and disreputable to a man.

"What horrid-looking men!" said the girl involuntarily.

"Yes, they do not look attractive."

"And what terrible faces they have!"

"Yes, they do not seem desirable acquaintances."

"But what are they doing here in Rome?"

"Oh, the city attracts them, I suppose! I am told that there are many hundreds of these plebeian clergy in Rome who hang around in the hope that they can get a couple of francs for saying a mass."

"But are they not attached to some Church?"

"I suppose not. They are mendicants. I am told that many of them spend much of their time at wine-shops in the poorer parts of the town. Anyhow, the city is full of them. There are cassocks of all colours here, and most of those worn by the lower order of priests are ragged and dirty."

The girl seemed about to say more, but she checked herself, and remained silent.

Just before they reached the Piazza Colonna, Rutland pointed to a building just discernible from the Corso.

"That is the General Post Office," he said, "close by is the Church for English Catholics—the Church of San Silvestro. It is said to have contained the head of John the Baptist for about one thousand years."

"Indeed! How interesting!" but Alizon spoke coldly, as though she were thinking of something else.

Presently they turned in the direction of St. Peter's, and a little later crossed one of the bridges which spanned the swift-moving waters of the Tiber.

"It is a fine river," said the girl, "the stone embankments look new."

"They are. They have been built since Rome was taken from the Church."

"And before that?"

"Very little was done to it, and its banks were the home of disease."

Again Alizon was silent; but presently broke into a cry of delight, for St. Peter's stood before them.

"Isn't it grand, glorious?" she cried enthusiastically.

"It is indeed," replied Rutland, "it is simply a marvel."

As they walked across the square outside the Vatican buildings, Alizon spoke never a word. She seemed entranced at the sight of the great building. The figures of Christ and His Apostles standing on the great front of the church, looking solemnly across the city, filled her mind with many thoughts; the ground on which she walked was to her holy.

When they came to the massive bronze doors, which were opened only on great occasions, she felt a shiver pass through her frame, then she followed Rutland to a smaller entrance, where a dirty Italian lifted a heavy pad which hung across the doorway, and then held out his cap for alms.

"Starving beggars on the steps of St. Peter's," she murmured as she passed in.

Such thoughts were dispelled, however, when she stood beneath the roof of the most renowned church in Christendom. She saw at a glance that untold wealth had been poured here. Statues, pillars, decorations, all represented incalculable riches.

Duncan made his way towards the Gregorian Chapel, where high Mass was being celebrated. It is only a small building, capable of holding perhaps two or three hundred people. Very little accommodation was allowed for worshippers, however. A few forms were placed, calculated to seat forty or fifty people, but beyond that, nothing. About a hundred and fifty people were gathered, nearly all of whom were standing. At each end of the chapel sat a number of priests chanting. There were eighty in all, forty at each end of the building, who sat in the stalls provided. But few worshippers appeared to be present, nearly all were spectators. Both Alizon and Duncan noted that all the priests belonged to the higher order of clergy. Bishops, Canons, Monsignori, and other dignitaries participated in the service. All of them wore magnificent robes.

Alizon looked around for a place whereon to kneel, but noticing that all remained standing and looked towards the clergy, she did likewise. Presently she found herself studying their faces. She remembered that all of them belonged to the aristocratic portion of the clergy, some were even princes of the Church, and yet she failed to be awed. There was scarcely a fine face among them. Most of the priests were fat, corpulent men. As she watched she saw them yawning while they chanted the words from the books they held, as though they were weary, and longed for the ceremony to come to an end. A cold, disappointing feeling came into her heart. She expected to be awed by this service, she had dreamed of kneeling down on the floor of St. Peter's, while a great hush filled the hearts of the multitude. Here, however, all was different. There was no reverent atmosphere pervading the place. Presently a feeling of indignation came into her heart; for while the officiating priest stood on the altar, and was handling the sacred elements, she saw that the crowd of clergy who sat in the stalls were taking their snuff-boxes from beneath their garments, and deliberately using snuff in the presence of the amused spectators. Involuntarily she looked towards Rutland and noticed a smile playing around his lips, a smile partly of amusement, partly of derision.

She continued to watch, however. She had intended to fall on her knees at the elevation of the host, but even while the officiating priest was engaged in what she believed to be the most sacred part of his duty, the changing of the elements into the very blood and body of Christ, she saw these prelates of the Church whispering to each other, yawning, and deliberately taking snuff. At that moment she felt someone tugging at her skirts, and looking down, she saw a poor Italian woman on her knees, and was trying to make her two children kneel likewise. It was in doing this that she had accidentally pulled Alizon's dress. The sight of the woman aroused in her a sense of duty, and so she knelt down, and tried to think the thoughts appropriate to the solemn occasion. But it was impossible. As she read the book before her, she thought of those dignitaries of the Church, there within the very walls of St. Peter's, yawning, and indulging in a habit which she despised, even while they believed that the very body and blood of Christ were elevated in their midst. She did not condemn the habit so much in private life, but that they should indulge in it within those sacred walls, on such an occasion, seemed to the English girl the veriest sacrilege.

Presently the service came to an end, and she had to move nearer Rutland, while a dozen or more priests entered, followed by boys. Then a procession was formed. The officiating priest carried a receptacle containing the sacred elements, over this was placed a canopy borne by four men, while others bore candles, and thus they paraded around the church. She had enjoyed these processions in England, they had seemed to her picturesque and stately, but here everything seemed mechanical, unreal. All was so different from what she expected.

"What does Mr. Rutland think of it, I wonder?" she asked herself, but she did not ask him, somehow a weight seemed on her tongue.

Presently they found themselves wandering around the church. Many hundreds of people were within its walls, but it appeared almost empty.

"Is it not stupendous?" said Rutland.

"Yes, it is immense," she replied quietly; "but I think I like smaller churches best."

They looked at the faultless carvings which decorated the walls, they examined the figures of saints and heroes which surrounded them in wondrous profusion. Both of them noticed, moreover, although neither mentioned it, that most of the carvings were Pagan in conception, that here in St. Peter's the heathen ideas of the Leo who did much to build the church, dominated the gorgeous decorations. Everything was immense, stupendous; the wealth of the nations had been poured here like water, but the feeling of reverence, of awe, which Alizon longed for, did not enter her heart.

"I suppose St. Peter was crucified here," she said presently.

"Opinion seems divided," replied Rutland. "Some say it was under the dome here; others think it was outside the walls in Nero's gardens. Nothing is known. But look, there is his statue yonder."

They walked towards the bronze statue of St. Peter, which strangely reminded Rutland of one of the old Roman deities. The figure was seated on a chair of more than life size, around its head a bronze nimbus was fixed. The right foot was extended, and the big toe, bronze though it was, was made smooth by the kisses of the faithful.

"Is this supposed to be like St. Peter?" asked Alizon.

"It is said so," replied Rutland. "I wonder whether he ever dreamed of his statue being placed on a pedestal while the crowds came to kiss his toe?"

A laugh came to the girl's lips, she could not help it; but she checked it instantly. Such mirth was surely a sin.

Two Italian artisans came up, took out their handkerchiefs, wiped the toe, kissed it and passed on. Then some women came and followed the example of the men. While they waited, some thirty or forty people kissed the foot of the bronze figure. Some crossed themselves. But all wiped the toe, some with the sleeves of their coats, some with their handkerchiefs, and all kissed it. Many beslavered it with kisses, and rubbed their foreheads against it as though it could impart a blessing.

They noticed that both the handkerchiefs and the coat sleeves were far from clean, and Alizon, Catholic though she was, felt no desire to kiss the lifeless thing before her.

They continued to wander around the church. At many of the chapels a priest was mumbling a mass, before some of the altars a solitary man or woman was kneeling, while the smell of incense pervaded every part of the great building.

"We must come here many times before we can realise its wonders," said Rutland presently. "Some of the most wondrous works of genius in the world are here. They cannot be seen in one visit."

"Must we?" said the girl; "but let us go out now. It is very cold. I want to feel the warm sun."

They left the church standing in all its cold but gorgeous grandeur. In after days they understood it better; then, however, it seemed only a stupendous mausoleum, the grave of the ideals of past centuries.

Outside, under the very shadow of the Pope's apartments, and in spite of the efforts of the secular government, the beggars gathered and clamoured.

"You see those windows there at the left?" said Rutland, pointing to the Vatican buildings.

"Yes."

"The third from the end belongs to the Pope's private apartment."

"Indeed."

"Report has it that he often stands there at night-time, and looks out over the city, grieving at its loss, and dreaming of a time when he will not only reign over Rome again, but over all the world."

"And do you think he ever will?"

"No, he never will," replied the young man quietly.

She seemed about to reply but somehow the words died on her lips. Why she could not tell.

"What do you think of the Church and the service?" asked Rutland presently.

"St. Peter's is terribly imposing," she replied, "only——"

"Only what?"

"I do not know why, but—but it feels like a gorgeous vault."

"Do you feel like that too?" asked Rutland.

"Oh, do not mistake me," said the girl impulsively. "It is all very grand. Such a church ought to be. When I have gone again and again I shall understand it better. But I have never been in Rome before, and I seem to be stunned."

"Yes, I can quite understand you."

They walked quietly back to the hotel, scarcely speaking a word. They took a circuitous route, passing the Pantheon and the Piazza Venezia on their way, Alizon constantly looking around with an expression of bewilderment on her face.

"It's wonderfully grand," she said presently.

"That is the word," replied Rutland.

"It will take me a few days to get accustomed to it all. At present I am sure I do not see things as they ought to be seen," and she sighed as though she were disappointed.

Presently they came to the Piazza Di Spagna, which was glittering in the sunlight, and where flower-sellers had brought their beauteous wares. Bright-eyed Italian girls followed them, beseeching them to buy, using all the English words they knew.

"I like this part of Rome best," cried Alizon, "it seems more like home."

"But not like home on a Sunday," suggested Rutland.

When they reached the hotel Lady Neville met them with news which set Rutland's heart beating. And yet he could not tell why it moved him so.

The Circuit Chest.

MOST commonplace in appearance, garret-stained and dusty, yet, in the estimation of the genial steward, of priceless worth, was the circuit chest.

"Surely, sir, you know our circuit was formed as early as 1818, and its history is almost contemporaneous with that of modern democracy."

"And have you the circuit reports from that date?" we ask.

"This box," gently tapping it, "contains, I believe, reports as early as 1820, and we can show you a plan of 1822," was the reply.

"I can also furnish you with a list of the ministers who have travelled on this circuit since 1821. Among these were W. Sanders, the poet, William Jefferson, the author of 'The Lion of Judah,' and Thomas King. Sixty-nine years ago Charles Lace travelled here, but during the years few men have been more popular than Samuel Antliff—I suppose I should say Doctor. He filled the chapel for week-night services. But the old ones are nearly all gone. Most of my ministerial friends are in heaven," and the old man sighed. "Not all; there is the Venerable—, we used to call him orator and philanthropist, and several others who await the summons home. Oh, sir! I'm never lonely, for day by day I recall the men of other days—their personality, sermons, and the like. My brain seems like a phonograph—yes, that's the word—"

The pathos of the old man with the far-away look in his eyes we cannot forget. His recollections were supplemented by traditions. Of Wedgwood and Benton, and Father Hugh himself, he had much to say.

"Did not Hugh Bourne preach in this town, and will his 'blue, blue flames,' and 'white-robed angels' be forgotten easily?" Sister T. relates:—

"But a few miles from here my mother, then a girl, was with others awaiting the coming of the 'Ranter,' when a drover-looking person passed through the crowd, took up his stand at the cross, and began to preach—and with effect too. My mother was saved, as were many others. The preacher informed her that curls were unbecoming a Christian girl, and forthwith she consented to have them cut off."

"Is that in the box?" we asked.

"No, no! there are many interesting facts, episodes, etc., not recorded, but in the lives of the saints and God's book of remembrance. But to possess some of the documents of the early days of the Connexion is a matter to be proud of. And that box contains them," said, with vigour, the old man.

To believe in the Divine origin of Primitive Methodism, as of the Apostolic Church, is one of the things we were early taught.

In our childhood we found a (Primitive Methodist) Church in the home, and consequently have found our home in that Church.

That the power-loom, spinning-jenny, steam engine and the Primitive Methodist revival are in time closely related is, we believe, not a mere coincidence.

At a grave crisis in the industrial and domestic life of the nation Primitive Methodism was instituted.

We have never doubted that during this progressive century it has directly made for saner morals, greater freedom, widening knowledge, and purer love of truth as truth. It has been an important factor in effecting that change in public opinion without which political and social reforms were impossible. Has not its service to civilisation, in its moral and material development, been underestimated? That these secondary blessings were not regarded as the chief ends of the Christian Gospel and of Christian enterprise by our fathers, there is ample proof. But there is evidence that they were anxious that men who were Christians should realise in their political and social and business life, Christ's own conception of what their life should be. The early documents show their great concern for ethics. And to-day no Church contributes more, in proportion, to the restraint of the thoughtless revolutionist, or over-reaching man of greed; to the inspiration of the patriot and conscientious worker; to the just regard of capital for labour, and of labour for its rights. In mining England, as in rural England, it is unquestionably one of the most potent factors for good. "Methodism is simply anxious to make men Christians," some one has said, and, thank God, it has succeeded in making men Christian citizens, patriots, workmen, masters, legislators and rulers.

But to the circuit chest:—

Browned with age were some of the documents, and, alas! of baldest description. Beyond names of places—and there were thirty-seven places in the circuit, situated in five counties—and items of chapel finance, they contained little of importance. We wonder if the evolution of the circuit report and chapel schedules be indicative of the growth of Connexional usefulness. How concise were the early reports! They were written evidently by earnest men who were first of all preachers. What time had they for literary exercise? the world needed salvation. Whatever else suffered, they must preach. How much the character of the preacher counted for, it would be difficult to estimate. The circuit report was chiefly occupied with a statement respecting the man, personal and official; his sermons, long or loud; his success—were sinners saved?

"Bro. T. (1830), ill of prevailing epidemic, influenza. This illness not brought on by long or loud preaching."

"Bro. B. is not a piece-sermoner."

"Piece-sermonising" was strongly condemned. The preacher must aim at souls, preach for souls, live for souls. He was supposed to have a message for that time and congregation. Serial-sermons were incongruous with the work and purpose of the times.

Some items amused. That a preacher should be reprimanded for staying to take supper after the service seemed preposterous. It is recorded that, "Brother P. left in the preacher's house an empty cradle!" An empty cradle indeed! Well! well!

"T. W. has read the rules generally, but cannot say he has read every sentence quarterly, as he has committed some part of the rules to memory."

How conscientious! How seriously they took life! How jealous lest the honour of the Church should be impeached! Their censures were many, they were not compromised of evil, their zeal for Christ and His Church was unquenchable.

"That Bro. S. (1830) be censured by note for the steps he has taken relative to matrimony."

"That the Committee meet at seven o'clock, and those who neglect to attend be fined sixpence, and those who come late also be fined."

They were ever intolerant of idleness. From village to village, "week in, week out," they, in true Apostolic fashion, went "everywhere preaching the Word."

"Mr. G. visited Sow, near Coventry, where he met with great persecution."

"Mr. B. went into Northamptonshire."

The proud capital of the county; the aristocratic pork-pie town, and some half-a-dozen more towns were missioned from this centre. More than a dozen circuits have been made out of this, which after Tunstall and Nottingham, is one of the oldest in the Connexion.

Tradition supplements the records of the "chest," and tells of the saintly characters, fervent spirit, praying power, earnest and successful preaching of the good men and women who would start at midnight to fulfil their appointments and—but their works, are they not all written in the book of the kings and priests of the Most High God? Upon the spot where one of them fervently prayed for the success of the Word there now stands a commodious mission-hall. In the village from which the sainted Mrs. S. was driven by the mob, there now is an aggressive Church. How many are the monuments of their toil and victories! Streams have appeared in the wilderness, and fruitful places in the desert. Alas! how seldom we think of the difficult preparatory work without which the fruitful present would have been impossible. The history of our Church is an emphatic attestation to the truth of the Word, "It shall not return unto Me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please; and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."

But to the chest!

"1820 was a year of great prosperity. Our Quarterly Meeting was a season of much good. Our souls were filled with joy. When the business of the day was over the travelling preachers made a covenant with each other to set apart a portion of each day for prayer that the work of God might revive. We accordingly wrestled with God from day to day; there was a general quickening and the next quarter we added 300 members to the circuit membership."

Forty years after, it is recorded, "We are not prosperous, we have tried extra means, and published on the plan for special prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. But to the present with little result."

That there were periods of great prosperity alternating with periods of trial, opposition and strife is abundantly testified. But their faith faltered not, and in work they continued diligently.

"Perpetual sunshine wastes the lovely green,
And spreads disaster o'er the wide terrene;
Perpetual storms impede the tender growth,
And rob the fields of comeliness and worth.
By frequent changes, yon extensive plain
Is made to yield its golden sacks of grain;
To scenes unvaried nature stands opposed,
By clashing processes are her charms disclosed."

Of "clashing processes" our fathers had ample experience. At one time the finances were so reduced that they could not pay for the "single preacher's lodging."

In 1845 it is recorded, "Previous to last March we had some extensive revivals which have been succeeded by great falling away. We have removed 209 from the books." Yet the preachers continued steadfast. Of more than seventy, only one left the Connexion for another Church. He became a missionary of the Church of England.

In the seasons of struggle and depression, the poverty and consequent unrest of the people is mirrored. But the circuit records have no direct references to the social and political struggles of the century. Upon unmistakable testimony we know that certain—very few—officials were Chartists; all joined in the cry for cheap bread, but, as a rule, they were very cautious citizens. Theirs was a robust manhood, and when principle was at stake, they were inflexible. Generally, they seemed—we speak now of the preachers—detached from human affairs, impelled only by the religious motive. They believed the Gospel was a remedy for all evils, and they lived to preach it.

In 1836 it is recorded, after minutes which embody a momentous decision, that, "The meeting founded their decision on the voice of the people." This is the exception, their concern was to voice the will of God to the people. "They looked upon the perpetual flux of human affairs from the everlasting hills. Their thoughts did not wander through eternity—they dwelt there."

It may be of some interest to note the following minute passed more recently, 1867, viz., "It is the opinion of this meeting that the Connexion ought not to receive Government aid for our day schools."

We fear we have already trespassed upon the space allotted to us by the Editor, but can hardly close the lid without bringing to light a reference to a marvellous camp-meeting held July 30, 1820.

"It opened with a short impressive sermon, preached from Acts xvii. 6, during the delivery of which many were convicted and began to cry for mercy. After a praying service, we endeavoured, by the exertion of the human voice and the sound of a horn, to assemble the large multitude to attend preaching. But in vain, for in one of the praying companies the cries of penitents were so affecting that it was vain to persuade the praying company to break up. They did not break up for dinner, but continued to pray without intermission from 10.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. Hundreds were saved."

"Haste again, ye days of grace."

ELPHIDOS.

Courage.

THE truest courage lies
Not in unseeing eyes—
Owning no danger, blindly rushing on,
But in the eye that sees
To grasp the golden keys
Of power and circumstance, and make them one.

True courage does not war
With the decrees that are—
With laws immutable and fixed and sure—
But to the highest turns,
And in that Presence learns
How grand it is to patiently endure.

Then, be thou strong, my soul,
And, where 'tis possible,
Bend the unconquered to thy human will.
If vict'ry be not thine,
Trust, then, the Will Divine,
And in defeat remain courageous still.

MILDRED McNEAL.

LINLITHGOW PALACE.

The Homes of Mary, Queen of Scots.

SCOTLAND can boast of the ruins of many ancient palaces and castles, possessing historical associations, but the most interesting are those which are closely connected in one way or another with the life of Mary, Queen of Scots, and the history of her times.

This unfortunate lady was born in December, 1542, at Linlithgow Palace, a very fine building, quadrangular in shape, situated about sixteen miles from Edinburgh, and covering nearly an acre of ground. Several castles were built on this site. Of the one erected by Edward I. only portions of three or four towers now remain. The castle seems to have been a favourite residence of the Kings of Scotland, and, as such, became the scene of many events of importance in the national history of Scotland. The fountain in the centre of the Quadrangle was constructed by James V., and the palace presents, on the whole, a very imposing appearance. On the east side is the celebrated Lyon chamber, and on the west side are the bedroom of James III. and the room in which Queen Mary was born.

At the age of five, Mary was removed to Inchmahome, an islet in Lake of Monteith, in Perthshire. Here she remained some four or five months prior to her departure for France, where she received her education. At Inchmahome are some very fine Spanish chestnut trees, said to have been planted by the Augustine Friars more than 600 years ago. Here also are the ruins of an ancient monastery, and the tourist will be interested in Queen Mary's Bower, an oval space, with two rows of boxwood, marking out the place where the child-queen was wont to take her walks.

At the age of sixteen, Mary married the Dauphin of France, who eventually became king under the title Francis II. After the death of her husband, she returned to Scotland and took up her residence at Holyrood, a palace well-known to every visitor to Edinburgh. The suite of apartments occupied by the Queen, and the furniture used by her are still to be seen. In the chapel at Holyrood, of which a portion of the walls and some of the pillars are still standing, Mary and Lord Darnley were married. The Dressing Room was the scene of the murder of David Rizzio, at one time the musician, but afterwards secretary to the Queen. On the 9th of March, 1566, Mary was at supper with Rizzio and others of her attendants, when the door was suddenly opened, and Darnley, accompanied by several armed men, of who took up their abode in the vicinity of Craigmillar Castle. The castle consists of a square keep, an inner court, and a quadrangular wall, surrounded by rampart and moat. Portions of it are probably as old as the beginning of the fifteenth century, but large additions were made in 1661. Here the celebrated conference took place at which Argyle, Bothwell, Murray and others, first ventured to suggest the advisability of Mary's divorce from Darnley.

In 1567, Darnley, who had played so prominent a part in the murder of Rizzio, was himself assassinated, and Mary's marriage to Bothwell, who was responsible for the deed, is generally held to be one of the greatest mistakes of her life. They were married in the chapel at Holyrood, and subsequently visited Borthwick Castle, perhaps the most magnificent of Scottish castles. It is beautifully situated some thirteen or fourteen miles from Edinburgh, and was the home of the Borthwicks during the fifteenth century. The form is nearly square, whom Lord Ruthven was one, entered, and commanded Rizzio to step forward. The Queen sprang to her feet, and Rizzio, clutching her garments, called for her protection. Lord Darnley roughly seized his wife's arm and held her firmly, while Ruthven and the other conspirators dragged Rizzio away, stabbing him in many places. They dragged him into the dressing-room, and there administered his death-blow. He was found to have been stabbed in upwards of fifty places.

Crookston Castle, where Darnley and Mary spent the first few weeks after their marriage, is situated in Renfrewshire, about three or four miles from Paisley, and is a fine old ruin. In the twelfth century it was the property of Robert de Croc, and passed into Darnley's possession about the middle of the sixteenth century. The Castle stands on a slight eminence, and formerly consisted of two towers and battlements, of which one tower, some fifty feet high, alone remains.

Craigmillar Castle, now a magnificent ruin, stands a few miles from Edinburgh, and was a favourite residence of Mary, Queen of Scots; in fact, according to Croome's "Gazetteer of Scotland,"—an excellent work, to which we are much indebted for some of the facts mentioned in this article—the neighbouring village of Little France, derived its name from the members of Mary's French retinue and the walls fourteen feet thick at the bottom, about six feet at the top, and ninety feet high. The great hall is fifty feet long, twenty-five feet wide, and about thirty feet high. A fine view of the surrounding country is to be seen from the roof, and the whole structure is of a most imposing appearance.

While Bothwell and Mary were at Borthwick, the castle was attacked by Morton, Mar, Lindsay, and others, accompanied by about 1,000 horse. Bothwell managed to escape, and the Queen afterwards followed him from the castle in male attire, dressed as a page. Then followed the memorable battle of Carberry Hill, the result of which was disastrous to Mary. She surrendered, was conducted, amid considerable insults, to Edinburgh, and eventually conveyed to Loch Leven Castle, in the county of Kinross, and kept prisoner by the Confederate Lords. The courtyard was surrounded by high walls, with towers at each corner, the great tower probably dating from the fourteenth century. It was at this castle that Queen Mary was compelled to sign the deed of abdication in favour of her son.

The Queen on one occasion attempted to escape in the clothes of her laundress, but the attempt was frustrated. She eventually succeeded, however, in effecting her escape by persuading a simple lad about the place to steal the keys, which, after having used, she threw into the loch. Sir Walter Scott graphically describes the scenes at Loch Leven Castle in his "Abbot."

Yet another castle is associated with the Queen, for after her escape from Loch Leven, she was conducted by Lord Seton to Niddry Castle, near Winchburgh, in Linlithgow. The castle, which possesses a strong, square tower, is now the property of Lord Hopetoun, Baron Niddry. From Niddry Castle Mary sent her messenger to Elizabeth soliciting the Queen of England's protection. The result is well-known history: she was kept in confinement for many years, and suffered death upon the scaffold in her forty-fifth year.

Devotional Reading.

LIST OF BOOKS.

LETTER TO A YOUNG MINISTER.

Y DEAR SIR:—

You ask me what books I would recommend for devotional reading. The "Still Hour" is usually occupied with meditation, prayer, and Scripture. But there are other books beside the Bible, so inspiring and so profitable spiritually, that if any time is left for them after these exercises, they will not be found out of place. Probably, however, most will find it expedient to separate their devotional reading from the hour of prayer and take it apart as a portion of their ordinary reading. The time which they can afford in that hour for reading will all be required by the Bible, read as it should be read—the Bible with perhaps the addition of one of our noble hymns.

Devotional reading gives us the company of the wisest and best men in their happiest, most communicative moods. We might have had personal intercourse with them by means of conversation when they would have had nothing important to say to us, or if they had, would not have said it well. It is also an advantage of their writing over their conversation, or even their preaching, that it can be read again and again as often as we choose, and at each repetition will be found as complete and correct as ever, the printed page being a faithful custodian, so superior to memory.

We may truly say that in these times when the printing press is such a power, a great part of the work of preaching and teaching is performed by means of books and periodicals. Readers, instead of being shut up to what they hear in church, are able, as they sit by their own firesides, to summon into their presence the noblest preachers known. They can secure the instructions of the most enlightened and earnest men of their time, and even of times long since gone by, and detain them as long as they wish. They can, as it were, fetch them from their graves to say over again what they said when they were alive.

I have drawn up a list of books which I think would be useful to you in the culture of the Christian life, and in the practice of private prayer. I might have made it much longer, but I wished to confine it to such books as I have myself read, and to this rule I have for the most part adhered. The list is very defective, very meagre. It is as if you had been invited to meet a party consisting of persons in your town well known and specially worthy, and to your disappointment, when you got there you found it to be composed of people very excellent indeed, but only of such as were personal friends of your host, the circle thus being somewhat limited, and excluding many whose acquaintance you would have been glad to make.

LIST OF BOOKS.

St. Augustine's "Confessions," and his "City of God."

"The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas a Kempis.

"Practice of the Presence of God," by a Monk, (published by Longman's).

This list is drawn from many sources, and even wise heathen are contributors. "The saints in prayer appear as one": Catholic and Protestant, Established and Free, Calvinist and Arminian, kneel side by side and blend their voices in perfect harmony. Our Hymn books are widely representative, and it must be the same in any adequate list of books for devotional reading. We draw the pleasing inference that the spirit of piety is broader than any particular creed. We see that it has refused to confine itself to a single sect, and has created a spiritual bond of union between men who were widely sundered by circumstance, form and opinion.

I would advise you to supplement my list with another from some one whose reading has lain in a different direction from mine.

Yours in Christian bonds,

SENEX.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

V.—CROSBY HALL PRESBYTERIAN MEETING-HOUSE.

By REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

HE seventeenth and eighteenth century Metropolitan Nonconformist meeting-houses and dissenting chapels were far more numerous than is generally supposed. Nearly all of these old-time buildings, with their Puritan memories, have disappeared for street improvements, or by being forsaken by their worshippers in their migrations to the fashionable suburbs. The old meeting-house of Crosby Hall in Bishopsgate Street, happily, has survived all the changes of the centuries. In the year 1674, the dwelling-houses adjoining the hall were completely destroyed by fire, but fortunately, Crosby Hall itself remained uninjured. The Great Hall is a spacious room forty feet high, with a minstrel's gallery at the south end. For some time it was known as Richard the Third's Chapel, because the "Crookback" happened to lodge there, and within its precincts he planned some of his villainous schemes.

As a building Crosby Hall is equally interesting to the archæologist as well as to the student of Free Church history. It is one of the finest of the few remaining specimens of domestic architecture of the perpendicular period to be found in the City of London. Since it was used as a meeting-house by the Presbyterians it has passed through many humiliating changes. In turn it has been used as a warehouse for the East India Company; as a workshop by a master-carpenter for the making of packing cases; and by a wine dealer for the selling of intoxicants. In 1831, Miss Hackett purchased the building, and thus saved it from the hands of the spoiler. From 1842 to 1860, Crosby Hall was employed as a Literary and Scientific Institute, and at the present time it is used as a city restaurant.

It was built about the year 1470 by Sir John Crosby, who was a city grocer and woolstapler. The site was leased from Dame Alice Ashfield, the prioress of St. Helen's Convent, at a yearly rental of £11 6s. 8d. It is generally supposed that this historic house was composed of two spacious quadrangles, separated from each other by the great central hall. The entire frontage to Bishopsgate Street was one hundred and ten feet. It was constructed of brickwork, interspersed with stout timber. At the time of its erection it was the highest and most imposing domestic building in London, which would make it a source of attractiveness to the admiring citizens. Unfortunately, Sir John only lived for four years after its completion to enjoy the comforts of Crosby Hall.

The widow of Sir John sold the magnificent mansion to the notorious Duke of Gloucester, who afterwards became King Richard III.; and Crosby Hall was raised by him to the dignity of a city palace. Shakespeare was fully acquainted with the beauties and magnificence of Crosby Hall, for he was frequently a welcome guest at the hospitable table of the Dowager Countess of Pembroke during her tenancy of the mansion. Evidently England's greatest bard took a delight in immortalising this famous city dwelling. In his drama, "Richard III." he has three distinct references to Crosby Hall. In this building Richard was offered the royal crown by the Mayor of London. There he persuaded Anne to await his return from the funeral of the murdered King Henry. To Crosby Hall the news was brought him of the cruel execution of the two helpless princes. In June, 1483, King Richard III. left Crosby Hall to take up his residence at the Royal Palace of Westminster. At the dawn of the sixteenth century, Princess Catharine of Arragon was entertained at Crosby Hall by Sir Bartholomew Reed, Mayor of London. From its festive precincts this unfortunate lady went to the bridal altar, where she espoused the short-lived Prince Arthur.

For seven years Crosby Hall was tenanted by the distinguished Sir Thomas More, Lord High Chancellor of England. The learned Erasmus compared More's house "to the academy of Plato," or more correctly, to "a school and an exercise of the Christian religion," where all the attendants devoted "their leisure to liberal studies and profitable reading, although piety was their first care. No wrangling, no idle word was heard in it, every one did his duty with alacrity and not without a temperate cheerfulness." In the year 1523, More sold Crosby Hall to Antonio Bonvici, a wealthy merchant of Lucca, to whom some twelve months later he sent his farewell letter, written the night before his execution with a piece of charcoal in the gloomy dungeon of the Tower of London.

During the reign of England's maiden queen, Crosby Hall was the residence of several foreign ambassadors, and occasionally of a Lord Mayor. In the days of the Stuarts, the mansion became a temporary prison for those unfortunates who daringly opposed the despotic doings of King Charles.

In 1672, the Great Hall of Crosby Mansion was engaged for higher and nobler purposes than the brilliant entertaining of kings and queens, and the holding of fashionable pageants. In that year the Parliament passed the declaration of Indulgence, which was regarded as a great concession to the persecuted Nonconformists. Through the friendliness of Sir Thomas Langham, who owned Crosby Hall, and was on intimate terms with some of the leading Puritans, Thomas Watson, the ejected minister of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook, hired the Great Hall, and converted it into a Presbyterian Chapel. It was used as a meeting-house until 1769, and twelve distinguished Nonconformist divines, including the co-pastors, presided over the interests of the Church that worshipped within its historic walls.

Before founding the Church at Crosby Hall, Watson, during the ten years of banishment from his parish pulpit had faithfully preached the Gospel as opportunity presented itself. The date and place of Thomas Watson's birth are unknown. He, however, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, which was the "nursing mother" of many of the noted divines who took a foremost position in the Puritan struggles, and who suffered much privation in their allegiance to their Nonconformist principles. For sixteen years Watson was the faithful rector of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook. His church was constantly filled with devout worshippers, for his fame and popularity as a learned and God-fearing divine were known throughout the City.

Calamy, in "The Nonconformists' Memorial," says: "Watson was so well known in the City for his piety and usefulness, that though he was singled out by the Friendly Debate, he yet carried a general respect from all sober persons along with him to his grave." He was a man of considerable learning, a popular but judicious preacher, and eminent in the gift of prayer. Of this, the following incident is a sufficient proof. Once "on a lecture day before the Bartholomew Act took place, the learned Bishop Richardson came to hear him at St. Stephen's, who was much pleased with his sermon, but especially with his prayer after it, so that he followed him home to give him thanks, and earnestly desired a copy of his prayer. 'Alas!' (said Mr. Watson), 'that is what I cannot give, for I do not use to pen my prayers; it was no studied thing, but uttered pro re nata, as God enabled me from the abundance of my heart and affections.' Upon which the good Bishop went away wondering that any man could pray in that manner extempore."

Mr. Watson was a prolific writer, his principal and best-known work being, "A Body of Divinity," comprising one hundred and seventy-six sermons upon the Assembly's Catechism. It is said to be "one of the most precious of the peerless works of the Puritans, and those best acquainted with it prize it most." His "Christian Soldier" resulted in the conversion of Colonel James Gardiner. "The Saints' Delight," "God's Anatomy upon Man's Heart," "A Christian on Earth though still in Heaven," and other important works bearing the singularly fantastic titles of the Puritan period were the products of his busy pen.

Watson remained at Crosby Hall until failing health compelled him to retire from the pastorate. His last years were spent in rural retreat in the county of Essex. In the year 1689-90, he died suddenly in his study while engaged in prayer.

In the year 1675, the Rev. Stephen Charnock, B.D., became co-pastor with Watson at Crosby Hall, and ministered to its flock until his death in 1680. It is said: "That men of such most extraordinary gifts and graces were seldom, if ever, united in one pastorate." Distinguished and accomplished as Watson was, Stephen Charnock, as a preacher and author, was a far abler divine, and ranked higher amongst the Puritans. Charnock was the son of a city lawyer, and was born not far from Crosby Hall. He accompanied Henry Cromwell to Ireland, and lodged with his patron in Dublin Castle. The Irish were captivated by his powerful intellect, his fertile imagination, and the rich flow of his extempore eloquence.

Charnock was forty-seven years of age when he entered upon his important duties at Crosby Hall. His incessant studies had made him prematurely old. His memory was beginning to fail, and his eyesight was growing dim. During his ministry at the old Hall, and while residing with a Whitechapel tradesman, he commenced his famous sermons on the attributes of God, "which have rendered his name famous to Biblical students wherever the language in which they were spoken is known." He was in the midst of their delivery when death, in July, 1680, released him from his labours, and called him to the higher service of heaven. His remains were carried from Whitechapel to Crosby Hall, where he had so faithfully preached the Gospel, and from thence to their last resting-place in St. Michael's, Cornhill. His executors published his whole works, including his volume on "The "Divine Attributes," and within twenty-two years the Christian public showed their appreciation by calling for a third edition.

The Rev. Samuel Slater, M.A., succeeded Charnock, and held the Crosby Hall pastorate for twenty-four years. He was an excellent preacher and an able scholar. He was greatly devoted to his pulpit preparation, and always "kept a stock of sermons beforehand." The Rev. John Reynolds was his assistant. He was one of the selected Presbyterian representatives who presented the address of thanksgiving to King James the Second, in recognition of his Proclamation of Indulgence to the Nonconformists. The Rev. Daniel Alexander was another of Reynolds' distinguished co-pastors, who resigned in the year 1704.

From 1703 until 1749, Dr. Benjamin Grosvenor held the pastorate of the Crosby Hall Church. Under his fostering and prayerful care the Church reached the height of its growing prosperity. The congregation was wealthy and educated, and was composed of some of the most influential of the City households. Dr. Grosvenor was greatly respected by the Nonconformist leaders of his day. He was one of the first divines entrusted with the delivery of the Weigh House Lecture. In 1716 he was Merchant Lecturer at St. Salter's Hall; and some years later he stirred the citizens of London by lecturing in the same place on the tendencies of Romanism, at the time when the throne of England was threatened by the claims of the young Pretender. The able ministry of Dr. Grosvenor was supplemented by his co-pastors, who included the talented Dr. Wright and the Rev. John Barker, who removed from Crosby Hall to the pulpit rendered vacant by the death of the distinguished Matthew Henry of commentary fame. The Revs. Clerk Oldsworth and Edmund Calamy, the son of a more distinguished father of Puritan fame, were also fellow-workers with Dr. Grosvenor at Crosby Hall.

The succeeding pastor was Dr. Hodge, who was followed in the pastorate by the Rev. Richard Jones. During his ministry the lease of the old Hall expired, and as the Church and congregation had become reduced in numbers, it was decided not to make application for its renewal. For the last time, on October 1st, 1769, the congregation assembled in Crosby Hall to listen to a farewell sermon delivered by Mr. Jones, who afterwards removed to a church at Peckham, where he continued his ministry for many years.

The thoughtful visitor to the famous Bishopsgate Restaurant cannot forget how it sheltered the ark of God in the time of storm, and that its walls resounded with the living voice of some of the ablest and most godly Nonconformist preachers of Presbyterian times.

Revivals: How to Make them Permanently Effective to our Churches.

PART II.

A S to methods to be adopted. We must recognise our converts are of very different temperaments and gifts. No two are precisely alike, and some are very unlike. Jacob and Esau were brothers, but how unlike! as different as the North Pole and the Tropics. Mary and Martha were as the East and West apart. So please do not think what binds one to the Church will always bind another. The converts not only have different temperaments and gifts, but come from very different homes; and so require very diverse treatment. Some are like Bunyan's "Ready to Halt" and "Feeble Mind," and need special care. We suggest what, in our judgment, are some of the essentials.

Help some to mental culture.

Many of our converts are seriously defective in education. Their reading has been meagre, and the little done often of the poorest type. Especially if they be young men and women, it is helpful to start them to mental development. We cannot hope for much strength of character in a contented ignorance. To slay error, face it with truth. A Bible Class, on the heels of a Revival, is an agency for much good. To understand God's revelation to man, and to gain clearer views of God, are helps to spiritual stability. A Mutual Improvement Class in a church has often been the starting hour to mental culture. As far as we can, it should be ours to stimulate study in all legitimate branches; but especially ours to inspire them to private study of the Scriptures.

True social intercourse will help to make permanent the fruit.

Remember the social side of some proves their ruin. Some visit the public-house because they like the deceiving cup; but many others turn their steps thither because of its cosiness and sociality. We take some from the public-house; are we supplying its place? When possible, especially in connection with some of our larger Churches, it is highly beneficial to have a room where they can read current literature and have brotherly intercourse. Some urge: "They have their homes."

The home of every convert, be it remembered, is not an ideal home. A young member of our Church said to me the other day, "You have no idea what difficulties I have at home." The world does its best. The gin palace is gaily painted, well lighted; and as the moth rushes to the flaming candle to court death, so do thousands of our young men, fascinated by the glitter of the gin-shop, hasten on to their ruin. We condemn the public-house, but in too many cases we have no rival or true substitute. It is not unscriptural to plead for such facilities, especially for some converts. Jesus was social. His first miracle was to add brightness to a bright ceremony. His association with others so provoked the Pharisees, as to lead to a comparison between Jesus and John the Baptist, as the Pharisees thought, somewhat to the detriment of Jesus. "The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners."

We want sympathy in our churches. Sympathy! that is an electric word. Is it too much to ask that the Church should be a home, a spiritual home, with all a home's sympathy, a home's love, a shelter from the world's cruel storms. Are our churches such homes? Doubtless there is much unjustifiable censure on the coldness, formality, and utter lack of sympathy of some churches; but is there one that dare say our churches are always what they should be to the stranger that has just come within their gates. The parody hits off certain churches:—

"Whenever I take my walks to church,
How many folks I see;
And 'cause I never speak to them,
They never speak to me."

Let us bury our false etiquette and starch. They were wise, weighty words that Dr. John Hall—who has just passed to rest—uttered, "Kind looks, kind words, kind acts, and warm hand-shakes,—these are a secondary means of grace when men are in trouble and fighting their unseen battles." My brothers, see the converts and grip them with the grip of sympathy. It will help to keep them in the Church.

As a third help, provide them with suitable work. They have changed masters, and that implies change of service. Provide them with work on two grounds:—

1st. For personal safety. There is safety in work. It is the idler who is caught. We have read of a fisher who adapted his bait to the fish; but the idle ones needed no bait, for they swallowed the naked hook.

2nd. For personal enrichment. There is growth in spiritual work. They are filled with new-born zeal; and by all means utilise that zeal, for the Church's sake, the world's sake, and particularly for their own spiritual upbuilding. In serving others, they will be served. In living for others, they will find a larger self.

Find them work then, but let it be suitable work. As a rule, it is not a prudent step, meaning neither gain to themselves nor others, to place them as exhorters three months after conversion. There are many avenues open to the converts. To the young, our Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour, by mapping out fitting Christly work, has come as a decided boon. For example, there is tract distribution—a simple task, and yet show them it is something to be God's postman, and the King's business requires discretion as well as haste. They can swell the mission ranks. They can sing to others the Gospel that has saved them. In the Church's prayer meetings, and in Cottage prayer meetings, they can voice their deep yearnings after a higher life. Work, suitable work, is helpful.

But we come back to the point from whence we started; as all-essential to make Revivals permanently effective to our Churches, we must have, and keep, a deep spiritual life in the Churches.

Yes, Keep. No spiritual lull or dead calm after the excitement. We must keep the spiritual fire burning. The others are accessories, helps, but this is an all-essential. We need true Church Fellowship. Am I right in thinking, one of our most serious defects in our modern Church-life is suitable class-leaders? We have known revivals; and a class-leader, utterly unsuited for his post, has by persuasion gathered a number of converts into his class. We trembled for their future, because we had memories of defective guidance in the past. To keep our converts we need the best men, men of intelligence, of sound judgment, and, above all, men rich in spiritual experience. We are afraid in some districts the race is in danger of the fate of the dodo—extinction. Our best men plead so many other duties, and often the Church goes begging for its class-leaders. A Church with suitable leaders is in a fair way to keep its converts. We need such fellowship. A Presbyterian minister told me a few months ago, they needed something answering to the Methodist Class Meeting.

We plead, then, for spiritual life. Give us that, and we shall have the other requisites. We asked for sympathy, kindness, as a lever to higher things. Some few weeks ago a young lady detailed to me her experience of a certain church—a Primitive Methodist Church, forsooth. She attended the church a stranger, and she left,—a stranger. It was very much—Look after yourself. The atmosphere chilled her, and months elapsed ere she again entered that church. But the second reception was so different that she wondered, “could it be the same church?” The icebergs must have floated south, and been melted by the genial sun; for the church, the same church, and yet another church, instead of raising thoughts of Polar regions, made her feel it was, spiritually, a warm, a tropical realm. The secret was, that church had realised a marvellous influx of spiritual life, and truly all was different. Give us life, and life and love will settle this problem. Yes, a spiritual life revealed in the membership of the Church will help us to keep our converts. Upright living on the Mondays and Tuesdays, straight walking, are the best helps to others. Kingsley well said: “If the Church were but one day what she ought to be, the world would be converted before night-fall;” and might we add, not only converted, but also kept.

Finally, then, our suggestions are: stimulate mental culture, provide social intercourse, let the Church be a home of friendship, and give the converts suitable work. If, however, you are to keep them, see the revival has its birth in the deep, passionate, spiritual wrestling of a living Church.

But we see even a better day. John has permitted us to see it through his spiritual telescope. He sees the Ideal City, the Ideal Life, and the Ideal Church, translated into the actual; and of that Church he tells us:—“The nations shall walk by the light thereof; and the kings of the earth do bring their glory into it.” How does that day come? It comes when we pay God's price,—a living faith and self-surrender; and that means union with God. John says that Church lightens the outer world, and they troop into it. A God-lit Church will always be an attractive Church. The magnet attracts; a holy zealous church is a spiritual magnet, it attracts and keeps as nothing else can. It is through such a consecrated Church God wills by His Holy Spirit to do His great work. “Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be My witnesses.” Brethren, God still speaks to His Church. Not merely to our fathers, but to us is the promise. A veteran local preacher of our Church, a man whose reputation is faultless, told me an incident, which I give to you as he gave to me. He said: “I was to preach at a specified village. The sin of the neighbourhood was a source of deep concern to all, but especially to a saintly man of over seventy years, who lived at a village two miles distant. Through infirmities he could not attend the services; but his yearning, day by day, morning, noon, and eventide, went up to God. He was a saintly man, a man that dwelt not in the outer court, but knew the way into the Holy of Holies; and so, like the rose-tree, that scents for good the surrounding atmosphere, from his life there went out a moral fragrance that sweetened the entire neighbourhood. The day I was to preach, at tea he looked at the clock, and said, in his own vernacular, to the one in charge of his domestic affairs: 'Thou mun gan to the meetin' the neet; there is gannin' to be somethin' wonderful astir there; for when I was prayin' in the wood the day at one o'clock, I heard the angels gan that way. God revealed to me a marvellous break-down the neet.' The meeting began in dense darkness; all the devils in hell seemed let loose; but we prayed and believed, and the darkness mysteriously vanished; and I preached that night as I never preached in my life, under a power I never knew before. It was the birth-hour of souls, and the beginning of a work whose fruit abides to-day." I give it to you, brethren, as it came to me; and it may be there are some other simple souls—as the world calls us—who, like myself, believe God did thus reveal, and has such other revelations for a consecrated people.

It was exceptional when, the other week, owing to the clearness of the atmosphere, from the English coast, across the Channel, we sighted some of the towers and spires of France. Greater visions can be ours. "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." Yes,—

"God, who at sundry times, in manners many,
Spake to the fathers and is speaking still,
Eager to find if ever, or if any Souls will obey and hearken to His will—
Who that one moment has the least descried Him,
Dimly and faintly, hidden and afar,
Doth not despise all excellence beside Him,
Pleasures and powers that are not and that are.
Aye, amid all men bear himself thereafter,
Smit with a solemn and a sweet surprise,
Dumb to their scorn and turning on their laughter
Only the dominance of earnest eyes.
Whoso has felt the spirit of the Highest Cannot confound nor doubt Him nor deny;
Yea, with one voice, O world, though thou deniest, Stand thou on that side, for on this am I."

Such visions mean a full life in the Church, not a fitful uncertain life, but a Holy Fire, like the old altar fire in the temple, that burnt on and on, and never went out. That life assures us, brethren, not only of conquests, but of holding the trophies safe for our King; then shall we permanently keep the fruit gathered into the Church. May that life, in all its abundance and fruitfulness, be ours.

M. T. PICKERING.

Rose Cottage.

It is some years now since I first read Mrs. Craik's popular story, "John Halifax, Gentleman." Since its issue by our Book Room as the first volume of "The Aldersgate Library," I have read it a second time, under circumstances which vastly enhanced its interest. Almost all the events introduced are represented as having taken place at Nortonbury, and in the neighbourhood of Enderly. These two names are, of course, fictitious, but the places described are real, the one being Tewkesbury, in North Gloucestershire, and the other, the village of Amberley, about four miles from Stroud, in the same county. This latter place it has been my privilege to visit more than once. The approach from Stroud is beautifully described in chapter ix. of the book. Bruin still swings aloft on the sign-board of the quaint hostelry; from the higher ground the estuary of the Severn can be distinctly seen; and when you have crossed the common, and reached the further side of the village, you find there, nestling under the edge of the flat, the church with its quiet grave-yard, and just beyond it, the charming residence of which an illustration is given above,—a double cottage "all in a bush of cluster roses, up to the very roof." It is the "Rose Cottage" of Mrs. Craik's masterpiece.

Rose Cottage is associated in the story with many interesting scenes. Here, John Halifax, the tanner's apprentice, met Ursula March, the heiress, whose many good qualities inspired in him a love as deep and true as it appeared to be hopeless. Here, when the barriers that separated them had been broken down, and he had won her for his wife, they returned with their children in order that John might be near his cloth mills. Here, his eldest child, blind Muriel, sickened and died. To its upper-room they brought the body of the father, who had suddenly passed away in the calm of the sunset, as its rays rested on the slopes behind. And in the same room, Ursula, already sick unto death, laid herself down by her husband's body and expired.

Several of the places represented as being in the neighbourhood can easily be identified. The four poplars are still standing—three together and one apart. Enderly flat, is Minchinhampton Common, with its wonderful historical and religious associations. Thick furze bushes cover the slope in front of the garden. Below is Amberley Court, the Beechwood Hall of the story; and still lower, at the bottom of the beautiful Nailsworth Valley, is the mill where machinery is said to have first been used in the locality. Longfield lies a little further down the valley. The familiarity with which these places are described is explained by the fact, that for a considerable time, Mrs. Craik lived at Rose Cottage, and consequently had ample opportunity for studying the surrounding scenery; and it is shrewdly suspected that this study included several local celebrities who, in character, if not in name, occupy subordinate positions in the story. A lady who was personally acquainted with the authoress informs me that most, if not the whole, of the book was written during her residence at Rose Cottage.

Our photograph is a last summer one, and shows the roses in full bloom.

W. WATSON.

Love's Fealty.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE.

HENEVER the life-story of Richard Strong and Mary Bartlett is recalled, some lines of James Russell Lowell come to mind. They occur in "A Legend of Brittany." It is of love the poet speaks—the faithful, patient, all-absorbing and all-confiding love of a woman.

"She had no dreams of barter, asked not his,
But gave hers freely as she would have thrown
A rose to him, or as th t rose gives forth

Its generous fragrance, thoughtless of its worth.

She questioned not his love, she only knew
That she loved him, and not a pulse could stir
In her whole frame but quivered through and through
With this glad thought"

There is no licence in this poetic eulogy. Mary Bartlett's love was of that transcendent order. It became the wonder of the man upon whom it was bestowed. Its height he never scaled; its deeps no soundings could reach. She had given her love to him; it was no longer hers, but his. Unworthy the loved one seemed, unmindful, unthankful, contemptuous, nevertheless she loved him. They were severed by the measurements of miles and the distances of years. She loved him none the less. There is faith in love, and hope, and patience. Love "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." Love was life to Mary Bartlett; but her love was his; he was her life. He was an exile. Over the seas he had sailed. There was a void in her soul. He had taken her love. Her love was in exile.

It is like love to seek in order to save. She sought him, and seeking, found him, and finding him, she found her life.

The story may now be told. To have breathed it sooner would have been an outrage. Then his memory was torture. The mention of his name was a trembling whisper. We had known him, the shamed one and the sinner self-banished. It was kindness to her to be silent. Others were anguished as well as she, but there was no anguish like hers. All who had known him were vengeful toward him while pitiful for her. She had anger for none, and only love for him. Providence has a "white" as well as "a black side." It is the "white" we see. Life is full of surprises, gracious and gladsome. The surprise abides. The sequel is the surprise and we are living in the sequel's joy. His name may now be mentioned and the story narrated. There are many reasons why it may, but the chiefest of them all is that homage may be paid at the shrine of love.

She had neither kith nor kin. Orphaned early, she had but the dimmest recollections of her parents. No other child had been born to them, and death seemed cruel in taking them, to leave her to loneliness.

There was a home for her. "The Father of the fatherless" provided it. David Dale conducted the negotiations, and was the intermedium of the finances.

Mrs. Taylor was more than an hireling. Her heart rebelled that her hand should be subsidised. Gladly the widow would have taken the child without the traffic of fees; but necessity drives hard bargains. She was reckoned as a foster-mother by the unimaginative and factual world. In heaven she was counted with the mothers. She was glad to have the child, for childless widowhood in pinching poverty is bitterness extreme. Better she was with the child than without, in substance and in soul. The orphan's entrance was a real enrichment. She was lavish with her new-found wealth. The best was for the child, the tasty morsel, the corner in the warmth, the gentle handling, the tearful rebuke, the kindest counsel. Atmosphered in tenderness was little Mary Bartlett.

There are guardianships in law and guardianships in love. The right was not legal by which the "Excelsior" proprietor assumed the orphan's supervision. That he had the right he knew. It is the right of the heart, the world and the ages over, to be humane.

He watched her as she grew from childhood to girlhood, from girlhood to maidenhood, and he loved her as she grew, for her growth, while physical, was mental and moral. In knowledge and truth, in grace and beauty, she matured with the years. David Dale had the heart of a father, not the selfish paternity which clings to its own, and its own alone, but the fatherliness which feels paternal to others' children.

Homeless again was she. She had lost her second mother. David Dale had explained everything to her. Till then she had never realised that she had lived through the favour of others. "I have nothing, nothing," she moaned in the pain of the disclosure, "nothing that is really mine. The food I eat, the clothes I wear, all, all are charities. It was kind of him to do it then, but not now. Why did I not think sooner?"

Independence, newly-born, is frequently morbid. The knowledge that she had been nourished through the generosity of her self-elected guardian, stung her in the place where her heart was tender. With tears and kisses she poured on him her thanks for the blessings past, and, dashing the tears from her eyes, and springing erect, declared her resolve to provide herself for the future's needs. David Dale was a man of discernment, and helped her to self-help. She grew the more quickly now that she had awakened to life's meanings, stern and sharp.

Her foster-mother had been wont to tell the neighbours of Mary's "clever fingers." The cleverness of the fingers provided the means of sustenance. In the dress and mantle warehouse there was room for girls of taste and skill. With fear and trembling she asked to be received whenever a vacancy should occur. It was good of God to save her the pain of waiting. There was a place for her. She could begin at once.

She got the lodging herself, one room, in a tiny house in a mean street. It was the cheapest, and therefore the acceptable.

She was content, and with good reason. Her fingers were her fortune. She proved an acquisition to the staff of her employers. Her knowledge was so varied, and her experience so matured, that her judgment was decisive in the niceties of her art. Her wages were increased without request. She could have left the shabby lodging, but had no wish for change.

Thus she grew to womanhood. Her life was full of interests. "Rosehill" was "the House of God" and "the Gate of Heaven." In the Sunday School she taught a class of boys, and ascended in position as the boys ascended. She had taken them when they were young. They were unwilling to move to higher classes if the advancement meant separation from her. They were "her boys" for years. In the chapel they sat in the pew beside her, and by-and-by they rented the pew among them. Sometimes she was needed in the choir, to sing a solo, or to strengthen the chorus. When she was required she walked to the singers' seats and performed her part; then she returned to her own place with the boys.

There was love in her life. Loneliness is impossible where love is. Richard Strong was a clerk in the Engineering Company's offices. He was one of the youths who had grown up at "Rosehill." Fortunate he was considered in having secured a position so genteel and so prophetic of greater gain. He was one of the secretaries of the Sabbath School and a member of the choir. It seemed to him that he had always loved Mary Bartlett. Well he knew that others envied him the honour of her preference. She had liking for all, but love alone for him. They were sweethearts.

The Superintendent of Police was in the private office of the "Excelsior" owner. His professional instincts were alert. He was manifestly impatient. The paper was in his hand. The line of action would be clear when the signature of David Dale had been appended.

"Ah! Good-morning, Superintendent. What have you in hand to-day?" was the master's cheerful greeting on his arrival.

"I want your signature for a warrant, Mr. Dale. A bad case, the worst for years. The fellow's decamped!"

"Indeed! Let me see!" and the engineer held out his hand for the official document.

"Good heavens!" he ejaculated, when his eyes had scanned the particulars. "It cannot be. You must be mad to think of such a thing. Dick Strong is incapable of the crime. Have they thoroughly searched the premises, and have you questioned the other men in the offices? He is one of our chapel lads, and I cannot sign a warrant for his arrest."

"I understood he was a religious fellow," the officer replied, with the suspicion of a sneer. "They told me over at the engineering works that you would know all about him. But religious or otherwise, he's the man we want. The money's gone; and now he's bolted!"

"Give me the facts!" said Mr. Dale. He was ill with dread, and miserable in the thought of the wretchedness inevitable.

"Last night the cashier of the Engineering Company had been compelled to leave the premises before closing-time at six. This Richard Strong was left in charge. He was to see that all was in order before leaving, lock the books in the safe, and instructed to leave the keys at the cashier's house on the way home. The keys were left, and the cashier suspected nothing. When Carlston went this morning he found that notes to the value of thirteen hundred pounds had vanished, and that the cash-box, with forty pounds at least, had been cleared. He immediately searched the book where the numbers of notes are recorded, and found that a page had been torn out, the very page with the numbers of the missing notes. The managing-director was informed, and the communication sent to me."

"There must be some mistake," Mr. Dale impatiently interjected.

"There's no mistake, sir!" the Superintendent

"HE HAD THE PRESENCE OF MIND TO TURN THE KEY WHEN SHE HAD LEFT."

emphatically affirmed. "Conscience makes cowards, you know. The fellow never looked near the place this morning. He had good reason for giving it a wide berth. A clerk was sent to inquire the reason of his absence, and found his mother in a fearful state. He had been out for the evening, but returned home in an excited state. They could get nothing out of him. He went upstairs to bed rather early. Lo and behold! he had fled during the night! So the case is plain enough, I think. But we're losing time. He has taken to his heels. We must be on the trail. Be good enough, sir, to sign the warrant!"

It was gall and wormwood to Mr. Dale. This was the penalty of being a magistrate. Again he read the hateful particulars. His duty was obvious. He must sign the warrant.

"Why did you come to me?" he piteously inquired. "There were other justices who would not have found it so degrading. I've known him since he was a bairn. He was one of the 'Rosehill' boys, and his people are as decent as can be found in the neighbourhood."

The man of the law was relentless. With the magistrate's scruples he had little sympathy. He was keen to be on the scent of the absconding thief.

With trembling hand and aching heart, David Dale wrote his name at the foot of the warrant. Richard Strong might be captured at any moment.

The "Excelsior" proprietor had many engagements for that day. There was a meeting of the Governors of the County Hospital at 12.30. He was to arbitrate in a Trade dispute at 2.15. The French Consul had wired for him to call before five in the evening. He had no heart for business, personal nor public. This awful charge against Dick Strong had stricken terror to his soul.

He was alone, alone with his anxious thoughts and tormenting fears. He was thinking of the lad suspected, of the family of the Stronges, of the chapel on the mount, and of Mary Bartlett.

He rang for Bob, and related to his son the miserable intelligence. Bob Dale looked at his father with eyes of unutterable dismay. His voice was a whisper.

"Is the Super. certain? This cannot be true of Dick!"

"He tells me that Dick has absconded. That is the strangest thing of all. It is a confession of guilt. I have signed the warrant for his arrest."

"You? father! you?" his son exclaimed, overwhelmingly surprised.

"Yes. I—I could do no other as a magistrate."

Bob turned his head to hide his emotion.

Neither spoke. The clock was ticking.

"I cannot attend to these affairs to-day. I have no heart to go to the city. Wire to the Chairman of the Governors and to Monsieur Chateauray! Express my regrets! Ring up the Federation Secretary, and see if to-morrow will do!"

David Dale spoke listlessly. The life had gone out of him. What could be done?

He walked over to the Engineering Company's offices and had an interview with the Managing-Director. Mr. Lambton was furious, angered with the cashier for leaving before time, and still more enraged with the thief. The clerks were at the desks, industriously scribbling. Not a sound was heard. They had been bullied by the frenzied manager.

"There's not the shadow of a doubt, Dale!" he declared, as they stood facing each other. "This is your nice, religious young man. I hope you're proud of 'Rosehill' now. He has done it cleverly.

I admire his smartness. I never suspected he had so much in him!"

It was bitter to listen to the cynicism of the angered manager. The facts seemed conclusive. There was no escape from the verdict of guilt. Dick Strong was a thief.

In the home of the fugitive's parents David Dale found consternation. It was cruel to believe that Dick was a culprit, but the facts were pitiless. His mother remembered his unwonted excitement, and that seemed ominous in the presence of the dark suspicion. The father dared not lift his eyes; the brother was in Dick's room weeping piteously.

The awful news had been breathed to Mary Bartlett during the hours of business. She would not believe it. Deliberately she dressed, and proceeded to the offices of the police.

"What is this you are saying of Dick?" she demanded, when she stood before the Superintendent.

He was a man of blood and iron, but even he was moved by the haughty yet pleading face of the beautiful maiden. He found it awkward to be sympathetic.

"You'll be somethin' akin to him, I reckon!" he suggested.

"I am to be his wife!" she proudly replied.

"Oh! he was your sweetheart?"

"He is," she meaningly corrected.

"Then you'd better change your mind, young lady. He's been an' stolen the money of his employers, thirteen hundred pounds an' more, an' politely shifted his lodgings without leavin' his address. He may have fancied a trip. Anyway, he's gone, an' we're just keepin' our eyes open to catch him to give him the chance of explainin'. Don't you bother yourself about him, my girl! He'll have no time for sweetheartin' when he comes back. There's plenty of fine lads in the world, an' you can have your pick!"

"Do you mean to say that Dick has stolen the money—that he is a thief?" she demanded, keenly watching the officer's face.

"Well, that's what it looks like!" he rejoined.

"Never mind what it looks like! I ask you if you say that Dick has stolen this money."

The Superintendent was not accustomed to cross-examination of this style.

"I'm inclined to think he did!" he answered, moving uneasily from side to side.

"Did you know Dick?" she next demanded.

"I cannot say that I did," was his reply.

"No, I thought not!" she contemptuously declared. "If you had known Dick you would never have been so silly as to imagine that he could do such a thing. It is a lie—a horrible lie. I don't care what you say," she protested, with uplifted hand silencing his proof. "The money may have gone, and Dick may have gone, but he isn't a thief, and never will be."

Then she burst into tears.

He would have sent her home in a cab, but she refused with imperious disdain, and walked through the town with head erect, flashing defiance at all who gazed.

She went to see Dick's mother, and alternately compassionated and railed at the woman who feared she had a son who was a villain.

David Dale saw her in her lodgings that night, and was cowed in the presence of her unswerving conviction of the fugitive's innocence. He had meant to comfort her as best he could. She founded him with bitter reproaches for his credulity in crediting the suspicion against Dick. The world was antagonistic to the man she loved. She defied the world, and championed Dick.

The police never laid hands on the man they sought. Though the particulars of the warrant were wired the country over, he eluded arrest. Anxious were the days and weary the weeks ensuing to those immediately concerned in the exile's fate. The newspapers were scanned morning and night. There were anxious souls who triumphed in the discomfiture of the police. He had fled, and none knew whither.

There were changes apart from, and in consequence of, the suspect's flight. His father was mentally enfeebled; his brother roamed the fields as a lost child; his mother was beaten and broken.

Mary Bartlett again was lonely. She presented a brave and valiant front to the world, but when she was alone her tears were scalding. Sunday by Sunday she attended school. It was a task, and a terrible trial, but she doggedly persisted. They asked her once to sing. She looked at the inquirer, and the look was a refusal and a reproof.

Life was no longer a bliss. It was a Gethsemane. She was treading the wine-press alone. Her lover was a guilty coward even in the judgment of his mother. She alone believed in him. It was useless to affirm her faith. They smiled at her credulity, and answered her with silence.

The years passed on. There was a paragraph once in the newspapers that "Richard Strong was in the Argentine Republic, and living there to escape his country's laws."

The world goes on even though hearts are breaking. There was this shadow at "Rosehill," but as the Sabbaths came the congregations assembled. Sometimes she wondered how others could be glad when her lover was over the seas. All seemed to continue as though Dick were non-existent. They were singing the very hymns he used to sing. Oh! it was cruel! It was the anthem with the tenor recitative. She had wont to be proud when Dick took the part. Harold Dodgson was in his place, and singing. There were some who remembered, and felt with her. The majority had forgotten. It was years since the day when Dick Strong was placarded as a vagabond.

Mary had a photograph—two, indeed—his and hers. They were in a silver locket. The trinket was his gift. It was the food-stuff of her greedy love. It was an altar, even an idol. On her heart she wore it, night and day. Forget him? She never forgot.

The Government-Inspector had arrived. By hundreds the plague-lists were swelling. Small-pox was raging. Business was stagnant. The schools were closed. Terrified families dared hardly cross their thresholds. The doctors were wearied to death with the odious and devastating epidemic. Questions had been asked in the House of Commons, and the Government had despatched an Inspector to superintend the remedial measures, and to investigate the cause of the outbreak.

The district near "Rosehill" was the least affected, but even here there were numerous cases.

David Dale met the Director of the Engineering Company as he passed into the room where the Emergency Committee was to meet the Government Inspector.

"Are all your men right, Lambton?" he interrogated.

"They were all right up till yesterday, and Carlston was stricken," the other replied. "From the first he said he would. We got him re-vaccinated, but he was as frightened as ever. I saw the doctor this morning, and he shakes his head. If the fellow had pluck he would throw it off, but his nerves have completely mastered him."

In the first week of the Inspector's visit, the death-rate reached the highest total. Carlston was one of the victims. The clerks in the offices remembered Dick Strong now that re-arrangements and promotions were taking place in consequence of the cashier's decease. If all had gone well with Dick he would have succeeded Thomas Carlston.

Eleven weeks later, the widow was searching the desk at which her husband had worked at home. Thomas Carlston had had a substantial salary, and many outside sources of income. She expected they had been saving for years. A few pounds only had come to light. High and low she had searched, but her efforts had been fruitless. Again she opened the desk. All unwittingly she touched the spring of a secret drawer. A sealed letter was within. With eager haste she clutched it, and ran to the light. A deep sigh of disappointment escaped her. The missive was not for her. It was addressed to David Dale. The instruction was on the outside: "To be delivered into his hands when I am dead." Long she searched in the hope of finding other hidden places, but no other spring was she able to find.

She never knew her husband's guilty secret; neither did she guess that she was the bearer of its written disclosure. Into the hand of David Dale she placed her husband's letter. She had hoped it might have had some bearing on herself and her children. She saw the start, the flush, the knitting of the eyebrows, the keen survey. It was unlike the gracious engineer to leave her comfortless. Probably it was an affair of business with which she had no concern. So she thought.

He had the presence of mind to turn the key when she had left. His soul was swayed with conflicting emotions; joy, grief, triumph, despair. He was reading the confession of a horrified, terrified, conscience-stricken soul.

He knelt and prayed. A higher guidance he needed, a clearer wisdom. How long he was alone he knew not. His son passed him in the corridor leading to the outer gate. His father never saw him.

On the step he looked at his watch. It was three in the afternoon. Mary Bartlett would be at business. It would be impossible to tell her there. Re-entering the office, he called for Bob, and desired him to go to Mary, and to bring her back with him to the works.

David Dale crossed the railway-sidings to the Engineering Company's office. In the private room he found the manager.

"Read that!" he said, laying the dead man's letter on Mr. Lambton's desk.

A moment he read, then springing to his feet, read on with gathering rage.

"Thunder and lightning! What an infernal scoundrel he must have been! The wretched, lying, thievish knave! So Dick Strong is not the rascal we supposed he was, and this was why he cleared the country! The idiots that we were to be so easily duped!"

It was long before he was composed to listen to David Dale's suggested procedure.

"The man is dead, and will have to answer to his God for his sins." David Dale was standing with his hand on the other's shoulder. "It will do no good, but evil, to make the world the wiser with this knowledge. The widow need never know. Let us save her and the helpless little children from this shame! Mary Bartlett must know all. She was the only soul that believed in Dick. His parents need no other knowledge than that Dick is coming home. You can see the Superintendent, and destroy the warrant. Even he need not be told. It will be sufficient for him if you declare that you have information as to the whereabouts of the money, and that the man suspected has been falsely accused. Do you agree to that? Promise me solemnly, now and here, in the sight and hearing of God!"

"You are a good man, David Dale!"

There were tears in the eyes of William Lambton. "It shall be as you desire, and whatever else you think should be done, you have but to say!"

Mary Bartlett was waiting. Whatever could this mean? To be summoned from business was without precedent. She rose as the engineer entered. He took her hand, and, smiling faintly, said: "Mary, I have news for you, good and bad. The truth has come to light. Dick's innocence is established. Another man took the money, and made him the scapegoat of the sin. This letter came to me an hour ago. I want you to read it for your own satisfaction."

He left her with the dead man's confession.

The heart of a woman is full of unsuspected tendernesses. It was a proud moment for her. Her faith was vindicated; her love triumphant. The man she loved was free from stain. He had erred in taking flight. She was open-eyed. It was weak of him to allow the cashier to play on his fears. He should have faced the ordeal. His cowardice was his infirmity. But guilt was not in him, and at the last the sinner had unburdened his sin, and saved the suspect. Clearly she saw the facts. Dick was innocent; his exile was over; the shame was passed; all would yet be well. All this she thought, yet strangely her heart was full of the other woman, the widow of the man who had written the letter she held in her hand. Did she know? God help her if she did! She hoped she did not. Why should she know?

When David Dale re-entered, he was amazed at her passionate appeal.

"For pity's sake, keep this from the eyes of his wife! Has she seen it? Oh, surely not!" Her hands were tightly clasped. Her eyes were shining.

"Mrs. Carlston does not know, and never will. It was necessary that Mr. Lambton should read it. He has pledged his word to secrecy. You are the third to be informed. It only remains for Dick to see it, and then it can be burned. This is a glad day, and yet a sad one. The triumph comes, but only through shame's exposure. There is bitterness even in the sweetness. It was the least poor Carlston could do. We should be thankful he did it. He might have gone to his grave with his secret!"

There were many more than curious as to the actual facts, but they never knew more than the Press paragraph declared. A frightful mistake had been made. Information had come to the knowledge of the Managing-Director which proved that Richard Strong was absolutely innocent of the crime of which he had been suspected. His disappearance had been the design of a dupe. Regret was expressed for the evil done to the innocent, and intimation was publicly given that reparation would be made to the injured man on his arrival home. Such was the newspaper report.

The exile returned. David Dale and Mary Bartlett found him doing hack-work in Buenos Ayres. He was better after the ocean's voyage, and freshened wonderfully when he was home again.

He had learned his lesson, and learned it bitterly. Well he remembered that night, the meeting with Carlston, the cashier's threats, the impending doom. It was cowardly to fear suspicion when innocence was his. It was a terrible price to pay for the experience.

It would be folly to say that life to him was joy without alloy; but he is growing into peace. His father's mind is gathering strength; his mother now lifts her head; the brother has ceased to roam.

The Engineering Company had appointed another to the succession of Carlston. They created an office for the man they had wronged. Dick Strong is the Secretary of the Company.

Carlston had squandered his substance in ruinous gambling. He had lived a lie, and died a debtor. His widow never knew, nor his children. They have enough and to spare. Their affluence stands to the credit of William Lambton. David Dale had taught him the art of secret generosity. He is beginning to believe that "it is better to give than to receive."

Mary Strong is at rest. Dick and she are one—in law and love, in home and heart. She has all her heart could wish, and thanks God daily for His loving-kindness.

There are strange thoughts in Dick Strong's mind as he muses on his fate, but the strangest of all is the love of the woman who bears his name.

CONFERENCE CHAPEL 1880 AND 1899.
HAINTON STREET CHAPEL AND SCHOOLS, GRIMSBY 3RD CIRCUIT.

Primitive Methodism in Grimsby.

BY REV. J. STEPHENSON.

PRIMITIVE Methodism is always a subject of interest to Primitive Methodists; and rightly so. For were it the subject of more frequent and intelligent thought, and especially so by the leaders of the Connexion, it would doubtless be to our advantage as a religious community. For it is by such study that we discover the points of weakness or of strength, the causes of failure or of success. And the history of Primitive Methodism furnishes abundance of matter for such thought from the greater success that has been realised in some stations than in others. And there are a goodly number of stations in the Connexion which have gained an enviable position because of their great success. Now to ascertain the cause or causes which have contributed to that success, we take it, is the duty of all lovers of Primitive Methodism. Moreover, if that duty be intelligently and faithfully discharged, it cannot but result in good. For, in looking at the matter as it comes before us, we cannot but ask how is it that the Connexion has succeeded so much better in one station than it has in another? For the same Gospel has been preached in this circuit as in that; and in some cases, by the same preachers; and to a large extent in similar circumstances; and yet, while in some cases there has been glorious success, in others there has been comparative failure. Hence, to ascertain the reason of this difference is of no small importance, and, therefore, should be done with the greatest care. The only safe method of procedure is to take some typical cases, and observe the character of the workers, their method of working, the principles by which they were guided, and other collateral facts in their church life as may be regarded as contributing to their success or failure. When these are thoughtfully considered, and their results seen, they become to us very instructive.

Now, of all the places in Primitive Methodism with which we are acquainted, none afford more important matter for thought in relation to progress than Grimsby. The men who have taken the lead in all that has made Primitive Methodism what it is in Grimsby, were not men of wealth, of education, or social position, but young men who had their way to make in the world. But they were men of tact, of skill, of pluck and energy, and coming under the power of religion as they did, they were sure to succeed, both in business and in church life. Hence, as might have been expected of men of such gifts and religious fervour, they soon began to succeed in business. Some of them took rank with the foremost business men of Grimsby. But as they became successful in business, they would not allow the claims of God and His cause to have a secondary place in their lives. Hence they felt it a duty they owed to God and to the world, to do all they could to save men. One duty that pressed upon them, was to provide adequate accommodation for themselves as a Church and congregation in which to worship God. Hence, from the time that Primitive Methodism took hold of these men, this seems to have been a marked feature in their Christian life and work.

"Old Loft Street" was the first place of any considerable size that they possessed. In this chapel it was that some of their most important work was done. For here the work of conversion and sanctification was prosecuted with a vigour and success rarely equalled. It was here that the marvellous work under the ministry of the sainted Parkinson Milson was seen, when hundreds of souls were saved. In fact, so mightily did the good work prosper, that "Loft Street" soon became too small and inconvenient for the congregation to worship with comfort. Hence it became clear to all, that if further progress was to be made possible, a larger sanctuary was absolutely necessary. This was not a matter for debate, but for action.

Under the superintendency of the Rev. H. Campbell, a site was secured close by the old chapel, and the present beautiful chapel in Victoria Street was erected to take the place of the old one. From this we may date the wonderful progress in chapel building, and the rapid advancement in social position of a number of the members and officials in Grimsby. The business aptitude and energy of some of the officials, to which we have already referred, began to be manifested. The brethren began to rise in social position and influence as a consequence. This greatly increased their power for good, a power they were not backward in using for God.

Soon after the erection of Victoria Street Chapel, Mr. Campbell was succeeded by the Rev. C. Kendall, under whose superintendency the Bethel Chapel was built to take the place of the "Ropery Chapel." By this time such men as Alderman Smethurst, (whose memorial stands in the Park), Joseph and A. Robinson, J. W. Emerson, G. Shankster, Joseph Benton, and others had become foremost workers. Under the able superintendency of the Rev. C. Kendall the several societies prospered greatly, and became consolidated. The ministry of the Rev. H. Clarke was made a great blessing, many being brought to God through his agency. For several years the spiritual work prospered greatly, both in the town and country. In the meantime a splendid site had been secured at Cleethorpes, on which a good chapel was erected. In fact, we have had some three successive chapels there; the present one being one of the best in the Connexion.

The progress of the circuit had been such that in 1867 the number of members stood at nearly 1,200. It was now thought advisable to divide the circuit. This was done under the superintendency of the Rev. J. Wood. Tetney was made the head of a circuit, and Grimsby, with some of the country places, was divided into two. The wisdom of dividing soon became apparent, for the work of conversion went on so gloriously, that Victoria Street Chapel was filled, and Bethel also was crowded with attentive hearers. In order to increase further, it was clear to all that more accommodation must again be made. This led to the erection of Ebenezer Chapel, which, however, soon became too small, and had to be greatly enlarged. With this greatly increased accommodation for worshippers came increased opportunity for work, of which the friends readily availed themselves. Hence work in connection with Sunday Schools, chapel debt reduction, etc., was attended to all through the circuits. The spacious chapel at Cleethorpes was filled; a minister's house erected; the chapel debt reduced, and a powerful Church established. With this self-sacrificing work, as might have been expected, the membership increased, and the societies became consolidated and greatly strengthened.

But as the population of the town was rapidly growing, and the several societies were never in a better condition for working, the question arose as to whether Primitive Methodism was doing all that it might, and ought to do to meet the growing needs of the population. The outcome of such questioning was the building of the splendid property in Hainton Street, consisting of chapel, school, and minister's house, by the First Circuit; and the spacious chapel and schools in Garibaldi Street by the Second Circuit. These two chapels have sitting accommodation for nearly 2,000 people.

When these several chapels had been erected, and the churches connected with them well established, it was soon found necessary that another project of great importance should engage the attention and tax the energies of the friends of the First Circuit. It was found that the well-to-do business men of the borough, and others, were going towards the west-side of the town. Among them a number of our own officials and friends who had succeeded in business, were building themselves villas, and going to reside in that pleasant and rapidly increasing side of the town. This fact rendered it necessary, and made it clear as a duty, to the friends, to provide another house in which they and others might worship God. The friends rose to the occasion, and built the Flottergate Church—one of the finest properties in Primitive Methodism. This undertaking was a great success.

VICTORIA STREET CHAPEL, GRIMSBY 1ST CIRCUIT. CONFERENCE CHAPEL, 1869.

A number of well-to-do friends became connected with the place, as well as our own people who had gone to reside in the neighbourhood. In fact, it became one of the most important and influential churches and congregations in the town. A number of our officials and friends had become men of position and influence in the borough—some six or eight who attended Flottergate Church had seats in the borough parliament, either as Aldermen or Councillors. In fact, we had in Flottergate for some three or four years the Mayors of the borough. But while these friends had their place, and gave a kind of social status, and a certain amount of influence to Flottergate Church, yet neither their social position nor office should be regarded as important factors in securing the success of the Church. For there were some who commanded, perhaps, the most respect, and who were amongst the best supporters of the Church, and did the most to build up its life and character, who never sought civic honours.

Since the erection of Flottergate Church, other sites have been secured on which smaller places, such as school chapels, have been built, and churches established in connection with them. These more recent erections will have a very important bearing on future Primitive Methodism in Grimsby, as they are selected with a view to meet the needs of the rapidly growing population in these neighbourhoods, and will eventually be replaced by larger places. This is a thing of great importance.

But while this great, we might perhaps say unequalled, work of chapel building, etc., was proceeding in the town, it must not be supposed that the country places in the circuits were neglected. For during this time, chapels were built at nearly every place on the plans of the two circuits. Those who know the size and character of those chapels, the amount of money expended, and the self-sacrifices cheerfully made by the friends in the town, and the money they raised, cannot but regard it, when all is taken into consideration, as one of the greatest successes in Primitive Methodism. This is a strong statement, but we believe, not too strong. For when it is remembered that nearly a score of chapels in the town and country have been built with sitting accommodation for nearly eight thousand people, and that, at the present time, that property, including ministers' houses, is worth nearly fifty thousand pounds, and that none of the property is heavily burdened with debt, and some of it entirely free; and that all this has been done by a people by no means wealthy, and to meet the needs of only some 75,000 people, we cannot but think that the case is unique.

Although we have dealt principally with the material aspect of the work done and the growth in the number of Church members in Grimsby, this is only one side of their Church life and work. There are other things that should be noticed. There is, for instance, the important temperance and other social work done by the Primitive Methodists in Grimsby. There are few places in England where more hard work has been done in connection with the temperance cause than in Grimsby; and in this work our friends were always in the front rank. It was largely through the influence and the efforts of our officials and friends that the commodious Temperance Hall was built. But not merely in temperance work were our friends conspicuous, but in every kind of social work, no matter whether that work was in the interests of the "fisher lads," the sailors, or the poor, our friends were always well represented. This fact, no doubt, did much to give Primitive Methodism the standing it has in Grimsby to-day. This was inevitable: for working amongst the people, and for the people, could not fail to impress them favourably.

Another thing we have noticed in the "Primitives" of Grimsby is their consistent loyalty to the Connexion. They were Primitive Methodists from principle. They believed its doctrines, they appreciated its liberal polity, and were at home in its laws and usages. Hence, when their worldly circumstances improved, they did not lose their heads and first look down on the Connexion which, under God, had made them what they were, and then sigh for some so-called "good society," for which they themselves might have been perfectly unfit; and then run off to some other Church to seek it; while all this has been repeatedly done in other places we have known, we have not known any such vain disloyalty in Grimsby. Nor has the loyalty of our friends to the Connexion taken this form only. It has been of a much more active kind. For anything of a Connexional character that was likely to extend the Kingdom of Christ, was almost sure to have the sympathetic support of our Grimsby friends. The Missionary Society, for instance, has long had the generous, and often the enthusiastic support of the Grimsby Primitive Methodists.

We have thus attempted to bring a few of the salient facts in connection with Primitive Methodism in Grimsby before the readers of this Magazine; yet, as it will be seen, we have given in the briefest possible form what is a mere sketch of the subject, and what some may regard as a most inadequate sketch of what is in reality one of the most notable instances of progress in Primitive Methodism.

We must now turn for a moment or two to the consideration of a few factors which have contributed to this success in the extension of Primitive Methodism in Grimsby. But before we do so, let us disabuse the mind of the reader on one point. It must not be supposed for a moment that the societies in the Grimsby Circuits have been composed exclusively of the best of men, for they, like other churches, have had their share of questionable characters. But they were not dependent on these men for success, but succeeded in spite of them. With these characters, however, we have nothing to do, and shall, therefore, turn to the more congenial subject of considering a few of the things which have contributed to the success of Primitive Methodism in Grimsby.

The first thing that strikes one is the fact that the officials were out-and-out Methodists in doctrine, life, and usage. This was clear to even an occasional observer. The clear, distinctive doctrine, the devout spirit, and the zeal that flamed in the pulpit, which were characteristic of early Methodism, always excited their sympathetic admiration. The class meeting and other social means of grace were regarded by these men as being absolutely indispensable. In fact, they gauged the life of the Church by the attendance of the members at these several meetings. They believed in the witness of the Spirit, and enjoyed it. They delighted in clear, good testimony in their classes and love-feasts. They insisted on short praying and speaking. They also cultivated lively singing, being much more concerned about spiritual profit than the cultivation of the musical taste. They thought little of a religion that had no zeal for God and souls in it. They had learned by experience that revivals were essential to the progress and general welfare of the Church, not merely because they increased the number of her members, but because they saved the Church herself from stagnation and from drifting—two of the worst things that can come to any Church. The leading officials were never satisfied with the talk about “building up the Church,” and “building up Christian character,” if souls were not saved. For this, in many cases, means little more than a small increase of a certain kind of intelligence or social respectability. Hence, for this kind of talk they had no ear. For they well knew that revivals would tend to build up the Church, making her healthy and strong.

Moreover, they knew that revivals could be had by living for them. For, they had learned by experience and the reading of God’s Word that, by the prayer of faith and rightly directed effort on the part of a people wholly devoted to God, such revivals could be had almost any time.

Another striking feature in the Primitive Methodists of Grimsby was that the leading officials were such practical matter-of-fact men. Religion was to them a great reality; the work of God was real; and they felt they were responsible for doing it. Hence the leading men were not in the habit of leaving the Sunday night prayer meeting to be sustained by a few of the feeblers members of the church. They took the lead, not merely in debates at the Quarterly Meetings, and other official meetings; but in the general work of the Church.

Another thing we cannot forbear to mention is, that the Primitive Methodists of Grimsby have been blessed in having a few unobtrusive but most devout souls, who, while they did not talk much in public, prayed much in secret. And we have no doubt that in the Divine record it will be found that the secret prayers of such saints as dear old Mrs. Emerson have done much to secure the success that has been realised.

Grimsby Primitive Methodists always know how to appreciate and love their ministers. They tried to get good men, and they treated them well. There are names which are as "ointment poured forth." Such names as H. Campbell, C. Kendall, P. Milson, T. Whitehead, J. Wood, J. T. Shepherd, and many others, will long be remembered in Grimsby.

If the younger Primitive Methodists in Grimsby emulate the example of the fathers, there is a great future for them in Grimsby.

The Blankshire District Meeting.

BY ONE OF THE ELECT.

WAS elected a delegate to the Blankshire District Meeting. The Quarterly Meeting of my own circuit had declared by unanimous vote that, in its judgment, "I was a fit and proper person to be a member of that august assembly; that I was not embarrassed in my circumstances, and that I was attentive to discipline—always submitting with becoming modesty to the 'ecclesiastical powers that be,'—never giving trouble to the authorities, but diligently minding mine own business." With such a certificate of character, signed by the Chairman and Secretary, in my possession, I duly arrived at the place appointed—a somewhat sleepy town, which was just rubbing its eyes to get a good look at the visitors who, for the next few days, were to be quartered upon the generosity of its inhabitants.

I travelled with seven or eight other delegates, and a very jolly company we were, as full of fun as a lot of school-boys just off for a holiday. Four were ministers—all dressed in their Sunday best—but only one white tie amongst them, and that not very white. This distinguishing badge of office seems gradually going out of fashion, and is likely soon to be followed by the black coat and clerical hat; for our parsons are approximating nearer and nearer to the laity in the matter of dress, and the only way of distinguishing some of them from their lay brethren is by the way they carry their umbrellas, or the well-worn condition of their travelling bags. After good-natured greetings and a little desultory conversation "on things in general, and a few other things beside," the conversation drifted on to the question, "Who is to be Chairman?" Several brethren were mentioned, and their chances canvassed, and their disqualifications discussed. Before I left home my better half, with the sententious wisdom of her sex, had reminded me that it is "a still tongue that makes a wise head," and that there are few occasions in life that a man regrets being silent, but very many that he regrets having spoken, and so I started with the determination to use my ears much and my tongue little. And so to keep myself in remembrance of my own good resolution, I had written across my District Meeting plan Carlyle's famous epigram, that "Speech is silvern, but silence golden." And here I may as well state that before the District Meeting was over I thought more of Carlyle than ever before. But if I said little I thought the more. Was there just a tinge of censoriousness in the way these ministers spoke about their brethren? And why was there no layman named as a possible Chairman of the District? Does a layman ever take the highest honour in the gift of the District or Conference? I wondered, but held my peace.

Duly arriving at the station, we found the platform pretty well crowded with hosts and hostesses who had come to meet their appointed guests. For my part, I was taken in charge by two young ladies, who for the next few days devoted themselves to my comfort with as much good-will and heartiness as if I had been a young unmarried swain come out to seek a bride. As the brother who proposed a vote of thanks to hosts and hostesses at the public meeting, with startling originality, said, "My every comfort was attended to and my every want supplied," and without doubt mine was the best home that any delegate had, although there were others who, in their ignorance of my experience, claimed that honour for their homes. The friends I stayed with were Congregationalists—and next to Primitive Methodists, I think Congregationalists are nearest to the Kingdom of Heaven. In the home there were as visitors a young man who was a Churchman, and a young lady who belongs to the Friends. But when we got round the table it was impossible to tell the Methodist from the Churchman, or the Quaker from the Congregationalist. All our differences vanished before the sight of a leg of mutton and the smiling face of our hostess. The sweet, joyous atmosphere of that home was itself a benediction.

Of course, I went to hear the Official Sermon. It was a good service: the singing hearty, the people receptive, and the preacher master of his subject and of himself. But—ought not there to be a distinctive element in the Official Sermon? Is it not an occasion to emphasise some of the peculiar doctrines, or cardinal principles of our creed? The sermon, we heard it said, "was an old horse," and though he trotted well, and there was no jibbing, it would have been as well perhaps, to have kept him in the stable on this occasion. It was an opportunity for a clear and distinctive declaration of faith and practice thrown away. I confess that I would like to see the Official Sermon made more of. We heard much denunciation during the District Meeting of Sacerdotalism. But is it enough to denounce? Should we not emphasise the positive side of truth, and state not only what we do not believe, but what we do?

District Meeting commenced on Saturday morning. In looking round upon the assembly two things impressed me—the large proportion of young men and the absence of the leading laymen of the District. This is undoubtedly the result of the growing tendency to send men who have never been before. There is a great danger in doing justice, or what appears justice to individuals, of becoming unfair to the Church. It ought to be distinctly understood that long connection with the Church does not necessarily fit a man to represent it in the ecclesiastical courts. Democracy is all right as a principle, but in actual practice its limitations must be recognised. He was a cynic who declared “democracy to be government by those who ken the least and shriek the loudest,” but there is certainly some cause for fear lest the power of government fall into incompetent hands. “Has he been before?” is the question instantly asked when delegates have to be elected to the District Meeting or the Conference. An affirmative answer materially damages the chances of a candidate. Thus we get a constant change of men, and there is no continuity of policy. Four out of six of my co-delegates never spoke a word in the meetings. One or two men, however, made up for the taciturnity of the rest by speaking on every available opportunity. They knew everything worth knowing, and uttered their ipse dixit with all the assurance of pure unadulterated ignorance. But the business in the main fell into the hands of the ministers. After all, in practice does it much matter what the proportion of lay representation is, if the laymen always follow the lead of the preachers? It is the rule of the fittest.

Officers elected, we proceed to business. The G. C. D. is affable and business-like, and we get over the rough places with ease and without friction. Small jokes enliven ever and anon the proceedings. Individuality begins to show itself as the meeting proceeds. The wit of the company is the man with the saddest-looking countenance in the assembly. His humour oozes out of him almost unconsciously. Once or twice, when the atmosphere is surcharged with electricity, he saves the situation by a well-timed interjection. The meeting owes much to him, and every District should see to it, that by hook or crook one humorist at least is amongst the elected delegates. The bore is soon in evidence. He is most indefatigable. He is the first man at the meeting, and the last man away. He makes notes on scraps of paper at such times as he is not addressing the assembly. His “Mr. President” becomes the most familiar of familiar sounds. His speeches would fill a Blue Book. The President listens with the air of a tired archangel, but occasionally the patience of the audience is exhausted, and it breaks out in stamping and clapping of hands. But he is utterly oblivious to the true condition of things, and thinks the clapping is to encourage him to proceed. “More sound, least sense,” mutters the humorist, but nothing daunted, he goes on to the bitter end. The meeting has its revenge when the election for delegates to Conference comes. The loquacious brother finds his place at the end of the list of “Vices,” at which he is very much surprised and grieved.

Sunday newspapers and Sacerdotalism are the two topics which form the staple of the various speeches at the public meetings. It is made abundantly clear that Primitive Methodism may to a man be reckoned on to fight for a quiet Sabbath and a sound Protestantism. The camp-meeting was good as camp-meetings go, but we missed the old fire, directness of appeal, and immediate conversions of former times. There was much preaching—preaching of a high order—but there was no thunder or lightning, and there were no sinners crying for mercy. The superintendent of the circuit, by-the-way, was surprised to learn how many of his brethren suffer from “throat affections” and other complaints, which disqualify them from preaching at a camp-meeting. He was full of sympathy, and did his best, but was compelled to plan some of these brethren after all. It is pleasing to know that there were no coroner’s inquests on the Monday, nor any additional applications for superannuation. The decadence of the camp-meeting is to be regretted, especially if it marks, as we fear it does, to some extent, the decadence of the glowing evangelism of our early history.

The stationing of ministers is now largely a formal matter so far as the District Meeting is concerned. In the old days it was the chief item of business. Delegates went armed with a long list of men they were instructed to move in the order arranged for them by the circuit authorities. What a battle royal it used to be over “the popular brethren!” Every rusty weapon was refurbished, and every argument, good, bad and indifferent, was pressed into service to serve its end. Then the fathers waxed eloquent, and fought and wrangled, and considered and reconsidered, and moved and amended with as much warmth as is safe for Christian men to engender. Sometimes painful scenes were witnessed when ministers of unpretentious gifts were to be stationed. Sensitive men were wounded when circuits objected to receive them. But that is all past now. By one resolution the G. C. D. fixes the generality of the stations, and only special cases are discussed. Many even of these have no special element in them. One circuit wishes to retain its minister for longer than the allotted term because the friends at one of the places propose to repaint and decorate the chapel. It comes out in debate that the contract for this important undertaking is nearly fourteen pounds. After such an overwhelming proof of necessity, there is nothing for it but for the District Meeting to sanction the re-stationing.

The ordination service is a time of special attraction. The young men finishing probation are wel-came into the great brotherhood of the ministry with great cordiality, and with advice enough to last any ordinary men a lifetime. The Charge is delivered by a senior minister. It is surcharged with good practical suggestions. The presentation of a Bible to each candidate follows, and then another charge to the Church. Personally, I could not but wish that a deeper reverence had pervaded this meeting, and that there should be no exhibitions of applause. We, as a people, have some things yet to learn, one of which is "the might and majesty of silence."

What a gathering of the clans there is on Monday! Friend meets friend after many years, and hand-shaking and hearty greeting are all around us. To many this is a red-letter day to be talked about for many a year to come. Here is a farmer's hind that has walked eighteen miles to be present at the tea and meeting, and will walk eighteen back, and be at his work at six o'clock in the morning. Here, seated at the tea-table, is a dear old grandmother of eighty, who has known the evangelists and apostles of early years, and will tell you that Hugh Bourne drank tea at her mother's, and looked out bashfully at her through his fingers as was his way with women folk. Is not the tea-pot kept at home, a cherished heirloom, to be specially named in her will when she dies? And here is the most modern of Primitive Methodists—a young lady in a neat bicycling costume who has ridden her wheel for ten miles, and looks as fresh as the May blossoms on the hedges.

What chatter and laughter go on at the tea-tables, where there is plenty and to spare of the very best, for the country folks have provided and, as country folk do, have given with overwhelming liberality. It is pleasant to listen to the conversation, for it is all about ministers and preaching and conversions, and indicates a deep interest in the welfare of our Zion. A Church which lives in the hearts of the people is strong and safe.

For the big meeting the most popular ministers have been retained. The Chairman is a wealthy layman, whose contribution has sometimes to balance the poverty of his speech. We are told the three necessary qualifications for a good chairman. It would really be a relief if some ingenious person could invent some variation on "speaking funny, looking sunny, and giving money." Why is a vice-Chairman needed? Is it the donation rather than the man that is required? If so, is it worth while to run the risk of spoiling a good meeting for an extra pound? Our Vice-Chairman fortunately has nothing to say, and says it in a few minutes and sits down. Then come the speakers. The men rise to the occasion, and speak with power. The audience catches fire, and soon we are at a high pitch of enthusiasm. The topics chosen are timely. An old story, lame and decrepit after many years' wear, occasionally mars the high tone of the oratory. How very few men use illustration well! But we go away convinced that our men can hold their own anywhere. We all agree on this, however much we may talk against our ministry among ourselves, it is the finest ministry in the world.

The place of the next District Meeting discovered considerable ingenuity in finding arguments. One place had a good water supply, another a large market-place, and the claims of a third were some good fishing and a large cemetery. The last argument was irresistible, and we decided in favour of the town which makes extensive provision for corpses.

Is canvassing legalised as a Primitive Methodist institution? More than once I was requested to "give my vote to brother So-and-so," and arguments nearly as weighty as those which determined the location of the District Meeting next year were used, as to why I should use the franchise in brother So-and-so's favour. Now, I emphatically object to canvassing in politics, and my objection is, if anything, stronger to canvassing in the Church. It is, to say the least, below the dignity of an ecclesiastical gathering to allow it. Will some reformer take this matter up?

A conversation on, "How best to promote the work of God," brought out many suggestions, useful and otherwise. It was a little humorous, and more than a little sad, to hear a brother who notoriously empties the chapels when he is planned to preach, lecturing the ministers upon how to draw bigger congregations. The heaviest man in the District recommended brighter services, and the longest preacher, shorter sermons. The ghost of Burns at this point crept through the door, and whispered,

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see ourselves as others see us."

Upon returning home I found the wife had slyly taken advantage of my absence to have a cleaning up time. Ceilings had been whitewashed, rooms papered, spiders chased from pillar to post, and everything was spick, span, and clean as a new penny. But I know from past experience, that when I want to find things I have stowed away in little corners of my own, they will be missing. Every springtime the fever comes to turn the house upside down and inside out, to the great inconvenience of such creatures as moths, cats, spiders and husbands. But one cannot have everything in this world.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

VII.—A VISION OF THE INVISIBLE.

KEATS writes somewhere that as four seasons fill the measure of the year, so there are four seasons in the mind of man. And if that man happens to be a poet, the saying applies to him no less, but perhaps more. Keats himself hardly knew more than the lusty spring, or but barely touched his summer; he passed before the "winter of pale misfeature" could chill him. We can scarcely think of Shakespeare as having suffered a winter of his genius: for his muse grew in power and splendour to the end. His "Winter's Tale" is more to us, after all, than all the sunny summer-like romance of "Romeo and Juliet." But of Wordsworth the words are true, —full-circle, so to speak. His poetic productivity had all four phases. His spring is represented by the "Lyrical Ballads"; his summer by the best of his sonnets, "The Daffodils," "The Happy Warrior," the "Ode to Duty," the "Ode on Immortality," and "Laodamia." After 1815 began his autumn, and five years later set in the long winter of his genius, in which, as Dr. Fairbairn has well reminded us, his ecclesiastical sonnets stand forth as melancholy evidence of the blight with which Anglo-Catholicism visits even "poets of the imagination" when "it has ever taken possession of such." The dictum of Matthew Arnold cannot be gainsaid, (and Wordsworthians must be content to accept it with all the grace they can muster), that most, if not all, the poet's really good and abiding work was done in the decade between 1798 and 1808. Take a chronological edition of the poet's works, (that, say, of Macmillan, edited by John Morley) and turn over the pages from 1815 onwards, and you are saddened by the too too plain loss of power, the stiffening of the intellect, the vanishing of insight and elevation, the descent to platitudes, the arid waste of mere metricalised prose that lies before you. But as, even in England, and oftener of late years than before, the summer days we have been looking for will first mysteriously hide away and then appear suddenly towards the end of autumn, so Wordsworth had his "Indian summer," and it is with one of the most exquisite flowerings of that belated season in his poetic career that we have to do to-day. Myers well writes of his autumn and winter work: "We feel that the melody is dying from his song; that he is hardening into self-repetition, into rhetoric, into sermonising commonplace, and is rigid where he was once profound. The Thanksgiving Ode, (1816) strikes death to the heart. . . . And yet Wordsworth's poetic life was not to close without a great symbolic spectacle, a solemn farewell. Sunset among the Cumbrian hills, often of remarkable beauty, once or twice, perhaps, in a score of years reaches a pitch of illusion and magnificence which indeed seems nothing less than the commingling of earth and heaven." Wordsworth stood, on just such a magical evening, on the little mount in front of the famous house at Rydal, and there and then this wonderful poem sprang to birth which he has called "An Evening Ode, composed on an evening of extraordinary splendour and beauty." Let us first of all note what the poet saw; then what he felt: after which I will connect this wonderful poem with a Bible story of which, somehow, it always reminds me. I do not think my readers will consider the connection forced when I have once pointed it out. What, then, was the scene the poet's rapt eyes gazed upon? Let him tell us himself. It will suffice to quote parts of the second and third stanzas:

No sound is uttered,—but a deep
And solemn harmony pervades
The hollow vale from steep to steep,
And penetrates the glades.
Far-distant images draw nigh,
Called forth by wondrous potency
Of beamy radiance, that imbues
Whate'er it strikes with gem-like hues!
In vision exquisitely clear,
Herds range along the mountain-side;
And glistening antlers are descried;
And gilded flocks appear.

Yon hazy ridges to the eye
Present a glorious scale

Climbing suffused with sunny air,
To stop—no record hath told where!

A note adds: "The multiplication of mountain-ridges, described at the commencement of the third stanza of this Ode, as a kind of Jacob's Ladder, leading to heaven, is produced either by watery vapours or sunny haze,—in the present instance by the latter cause."

But what were the feelings generated in the poet's mind by

This silent spectacle, the gleam —
The shadow— and the peace supreme?

There is, to be sure, a clear note of regret for a fast vanishing, if not vanished, past; for the loss of natural and spiritual susceptibility, as if the sense of his waning powers was already strong upon him.

Such hues from their celestial Urn
Were wont to stream before mine eye,
Where'er it wandered in the morn
Of blissful infancy.

The very magnificence of the scene is its own mark of transiency. It is too good to last. It but comes to remind of what was, but can hardly be again. To quote Myers once more, he has said it once for all: "There is something solemn in the spectacle of the seer standing at the close of his own apocalypse, with the consciousness that the stiffening brain would never permit him to drink again that overflowing sense of glory and revelation; never till he should drink it new in the Kingdom of God. He lived, in fact, through another generation of men, but the vision came to him no more."

Or if some vestige of those gleams
Survived, 'twas only in his dreams.

But let us not mistake. There was not only regret. The very poignancy of the plaint is the measure of the glory of the vision that evoked it. The hour and the mood are still those of intense spiritual enjoyment. The scene affords, as it were, an opening into heaven. There is a revelation of another world: a vision of immortality. Surely there is a noble magic in these words:

Thine is the tranquil hour, purpureal eve!
But long as god-like wish, or hope divine,
Informs my spirit, ne'er can I believe
That this magnificence is wholly thine!
From worlds not quickened by the sun
A portion of the gift is won;
An intermingling of Heaven's pomp is spread
On ground which British shepherds tread!
Win, at my shoulders seem to play;
But rooted here, I stand and gaze
On those bright steps that heavenward raise Their practicable way.
Come forth, ye drooping old men, look around,
And see to what fair countries ye are bound.

What now is the Bible story of, which, this characteristic poem reminds one? It is not that of Jacob's ladder, though the allusion to that scene in the note might suggest as much. No! it is of a far finer one I am thinking; it is the story of the translation or assumption of Elijah. Somehow I never think of one without the other; and it is no accidental link of outward circumstance which connects the poem and the story, but something of essential analogy and affinity. On just such an evening as Wordsworth looked on might the Hebrew story-writer have imagined that the great prophet went away into the skies. The inner significance of the Wordsworthian "Ode," and of the prose-poem of the "Book of Kings" are one and the same. They both open up "worlds not quickened by the sun." The Bible story is altogether beautiful and delightful: in the simplest, best, most dignified style of heroic religious poetry. It is the picture of an idea: and a true transforming idea it is. The story shows the immense impression which the prophet's personality and work had made on his own and after generations. His death could not possibly be regarded as the death of a common man. It is therefore surrounded with pomp and circumstance; with splendour and glory exceeding.

"When beggars die there are no comets seen.

The heavens themselves blaze forth the death of princes."

Elijah was a true prince of the moral world, and the fire and the whirlwind which were his element in life are invoked to surround his departure with a fitting stateliness and grandeur. Not even of Enoch is this symbolism used; simply it is said, "He was not; God took him." Of Moses, even, we read only that "God buried him"; but Elijah's assumption is unique; and has for the Old Testament the importance which the ascension of Christ has for the New. Elijah is taken up into the realm of the spiritual: lifted clear over Sheol, as a proof of what the Eternal can do with, and for, His faithful ones. Set this story, as it ought to be set, against the background of the early Old Testament belief about the mysterious underworld to which good and bad, great and small, went alike, and then alone do, or can, you realise the power and the meaning of it. For what was this Sheol—the Hebrew equivalent of the Greek Hades: and as like it as two cells in a convict prison? It was the abyss, the general receptacle of human spirits: a cheerless world of twilight only little removed from darkness. Homer makes the shade of Achilles clasp that of Patroclus, and see it dissolve under his embrace like smoke. "Better," says Achilles, "is it to serve for hire even a needy master on earth than to be lord over all the dead." Mr. Gladstone witnesses that "the Homeric poems are unrivalled in the perfectly natural but penetrating force with which they convey the effect of dreariness and gloom." And Montefiore truly says: "The famous expostulation of Achilles (just quoted) would have found an echo in every Hebrew heart. To the old Israelites the doctrines of immortality had scarcely begun to appear above the furthest horizon of their thought."

Job represents both the old view and a dim yearning after a better one. Who has not shuddered at his words: "Are not my days few? Cease then, and let me alone that I may take comfort a little before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and of the shadow of death; a land of thick darkness, as darkness itself; a land of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness. . . . If I hope, Sheol is mine house; I have spread my couch in the darkness; I have said to corruption, Thou art my father, and to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister; where, then, is my hope? it shall go down to the bars of Sheol, whence at once there is rest in the dust." A faint hope, which, however, he hardly dares indulge, once or twice shoots across his sky. "O that Thou wouldst hide me in Sheol, that Thou wouldst keep me secret until Thy wrath be past, that Thou wouldst appoint me a set time, and remember me. All the days of my warfare would I wait till my release (from Sheol) should come. Thou shouldest call, and I would answer Thee; Thou wouldst have a desire to the work of Thine hands."

Now you have your background, set against it this story of Elijah's translation. He is carried sheer over the gulf of Sheol. He sees not death nor the prison-house of the dead. So did Greek poets sing of favoured mortals who never died, nor went to the land of shadows, but were taken straight to the Elysian fields. In a word, there is here given in story form what in that blessed psalm of the second temple, (the sixteenth in our collection), is sung in metre: the story is but the concrete imaginative embodiment of even more than the sentiment of the hymn: "Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall dwell confidently. For Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol: neither wilt Thou suffer Thine holy (or beloved) one to see the pit. Thou wilt shew me the path of life; in Thy presence is fulness of joy; in Thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore."

Am I wrong, then, in saying that both in the Wordsworth poem and in the Bible story we have equally the opening up of the heaven-world, and the affirmation of immortality? "Wings at our shoulders seem to play" as we look and listen. For what the early Hebrew story-writer gives as unique boon to Elijah—victory over decay and death—is, in our measure, now, the privilege of all God's children—His godly and therefore beloved ones. Christ hath opened the Kingdom of heaven to all believers. The secret of immortality is likeness to Him. "If we have become united with Him by the likeness of His death, we shall be also by the likeness of His resurrection. Knowing this, that our old man was crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be done away, that so we should no longer be in bondage to sin. . . . If we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him: knowing that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death no more hath dominion over Him." As a dear friend writes me from far-away Australia, referring to the lines of Browning in "Prospice," penned a year or two after his wife's death:

O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be the rest!

"Browning knew they could not be parted; such a spirit as hers could not die. Do you know, that is

WORDSWORTH MEMORIAL FOUNTAIN, COCKERMOUTH.

—my proof of immortality too—my having met with just a few people who, I felt, could not die." And in the Browning letters, which, with the supremest pleasure, I am reading just now, I came across this passage only to-day. The words are Mrs. Browning's. Speaking of one who had confessed herself calm and resigned with no belief in soul or future state, she continues: "It is more than I could be. My whole nature would cry aloud against that most pitiful result of the struggle here—a wrestling only for the dust, and not for the crown. What a resist-less melancholy would fall upon me if I had such thoughts! and what a dreadful indifference! All grief, to have itself to end in!—all joy, to be based upon nothingness!—all love, to feel eternal separation under and over it! Dreary and ghastly it would be! I should not have strength to love you, I think, if I had such a miserable creed. And for life itself, . . . would it be worth holding on such terms,—with our blind ideals making mocks and mows at us wherever we turned? A game to throw up, this life would be, as not worth playing to an end!”

Yes, communion with God is the pledge of continued life. God's own—those who love and obey Him—live on. Love is, by its own nature, immortal.

What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent,
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain.

That is a fine story of Rowland Hill's last appearance in Surrey Chapel. He had not been preacher that night, but hearer. It was in the semi-darkness, just before the last lights were put out, and he was heard murmuring as he walked feebly down the aisle between two friends, the words of the hymn:

And when I'm to die, Receive me, I'll cry,
For Jesus has loved me, I cannot tell why;
But this I do know, we two are so joined,
He'll not be in glory and leave me behind.

In a few days he came to the proof, and I have no doubt found it all right. It is but a modern setting of the Saviour's words: "Let not your heart be troubled. . . . I will come again and receive you unto Myself, that where I am, there ye may be also. . . . Because I live ye shall live also."

One word more and I have done. Wordsworth's hour of inspiration did not stay.

'Tis past, the visionary splendour fades,
And night approaches with her shades.

But though his genius stiffened as being enshrined in a brain of flesh, his faith abode ever elastic, and he never forgot that hour of "rejoicing in a second birth." So Elisha from the vision supernal of his master carried bodily, by a whirlwind, in a chariot of fire, and by horses of fire, into heaven, was obliged to turn again, in loneliness of heart, to do battle with the ignorance and faithlessness of the times. But he fought them all the more valiantly for the vision. Both poet and prophet, like Browning's "Abt Vogler," had, perforce, to come down to common earth once more, to "feel for the common chord again," to find for their "resting-place," after high soarings amid the harmonies of the skies, "the C Major of this life," but to no one of the three could this earth be just the same again. For he who, anyhow, in the favoured hours of life, the hours of sacred transfiguration, has caught glimpses, or heard echoes of the eternal glory, moves on with the memory of them to his sure goal in God with ever the more triumphant step, knowing in his very heart of hearts that nothing "shall be able to separate him from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

THABA BOSIU.

Thaba Bosiu.

THE MOUNTAIN FORTRESS OF THE BASUTO.

ON the last day of the year 1898 I rode across the border into Basutoland from Newvale, a farm near Ladybrand, in the Orange Free State, for the purpose of fulfilling a promise made some time before to visit the mission station at Thaba Bosiu. The day was a fine

one. Typical South African weather prevailed. As I rode alone through fields of corn white unto harvest, imagining to myself my friends at home in England shivering with cold, and saying evil things about the fog and damp, I was greeted with many salutations by the workers in the fields, some weeding the promising crops of mealies (maize), and mabele (Kaffir-corn, sorghu), others reaping the ripe wheat with sickles and binding and cocking it. Here and there a group of women might be seen threshing the corn in primitive fashion by beating it with sticks, and sifting it by throwing up handfuls into the air, allowing the chaff to be blown away while the grain fell to the ground. All were happy, for the harvest they were gathering was the best for many a year, and the second harvest of mealies and mabele which will be ready in a few months promised to be equally good. Good humour prevailed, and as they worked, the men and women kept up a wild chant, beating time with their hoes and sickles and threshing-sticks. It was a scene of unbroken peace and prosperity, and very suggestive of the change that has taken place since the days when this same plain was the arena in which long and sanguinary battles were fought. Long before reaching my destination I could see in front of me a low-lying, flat-topped mountain, standing isolated in the midst of table mountains of much greater size which nearly surround it, and far away in the distance the serrated line of the Maluti range, with Machacha, one of its highest peaks, towering to an altitude of 11,000 feet above the sea level. From the peculiar feature it has of an area of sand dunes on its summit, which in the distance have the appearance of a stratum of light-coloured rock, I immediately recognised the mountain ahead as Thaba Bosiu—"the mountain of night"—of all the mountains of Basutoland the most famous from an historical point of view.

Arrived at my destination, I was most cordially received by the Rev. E. Jacottet and his good wife, the missionaries, both of whom, it goes without saying, did everything in their power to make me comfortable during my stay. If anyone wants to know the meaning of the word "hospitality" I recommend him to come to South Africa. The mission house being in process of rebuilding, Mr. and Mrs. Jacottet on my arrival were occupying a small cottage containing four rooms, including kitchen, and I was accommodated with a miniature palace with two rooms, all told. I spent a week with these friends, occupying myself in talking with mine host and wandering about the mountain. Mr. Jacottet is one of the most interesting men I have ever met. He is a Swiss by birth, and has been a missionary in this country fifteen years. He is the author of a Sesuto grammar, and an authority on African languages, generally. He showed me with evident satisfaction the grammars he has recently written of two Zambesi languages, he himself having never been near the countries where they are spoken, and proceeded to fulfil his promise to show me how to learn Seshukulumbwe in a month when I go north. My log for that week contains this statement, repeated day after day, "Spent to-day talking," followed by notes on our conversations. Seated in the study, or on the door-step, according to the time of day, we discussed every subject under the sun, mostly problems met with in the mission field. To a very great extent I was content to assume the rôle of interrogator and listener; my object being to learn what I could from this successful worker in the Great Cause. Some of the information derived from Mr. Jacottet is incorporated in this article, while for the rest I have relied upon my own observations and perusal of original documents, as well as talks I have had from other missionaries in the country.

Thaba Bosiu is what Mark Twain would call "a sort of instantaneous mountain." It rises more or less suddenly from the plain to a height of about six hundred feet, the plain itself being something like 5,000 feet above the sea level. Running all round the mountain just below its summit, is a thick stratum of sandstone, laid bare and hardened by exposure—a feature characteristic of all the table-mountains of Basutoland. As one approaches from a distance this cap of rock appears to be absolutely unbroken, and one wonders how it can be possible for anybody to scale that precipice; but on nearer approach the wall is seen to be broken up here and there, allowing of comparatively easy access to the summit in a few, very few, places. One sees at once that this mountain is formed by the cunning hand of Nature to be an ideal stronghold. Such, indeed, the history of the Basuto has proved it to be; they are commendably proud of the fact that they have a fortress which has never yet been successfully stormed by an enemy, white or black.

The history of the Basuto centres in this rock-fortress of theirs.

At the beginning of this century the country now known as Basutoland, and that now called the Orange Free State, were inhabited by five tribes who formed part of the great Bantu migration from the north. They had exterminated the diminutive Bushmen whom they found in the country, and traces of whom are to be found to this day in the paintings on the walls of caves, and perhaps also in the peculiar "clicks" which are characteristic of Sesuto and some other modern Bantu languages in the south. These Bantu tribes were peaceful people, occupied in cultivating the soil of their country, occasionally indulging in disputes, one tribe with another, and keeping up their martial skill and ardour by hunting the large game which then swarmed in the plains and valleys and on the mountain slopes, but which is now extinct save for occasional herds of antelope to be found in the remoter parts. A hundred years ago events were happening that were to colour the whole future history of South Africa. Some day there will arise in our midst a Motley to give us the history of the Rise and Fall of the Zulu Power, tracing its origin and progress under Tshaka and Dingaan, and its ultimate overthrow under Cetywayo and Lobengula. Such a history would include some of the most striking episodes that have occurred in South Africa, for the influence of the Zulu Power was very far reaching. It affected the whole of Eastern South Africa as far as the Zambesi, and even beyond, for the Angoni of Nyasaland are Zulus, and the so-called Marotse Empire was established by a Basuto chief named Sebituane, who migrated northwards during the disturbances created by the Zulu marauders. Born about 1783, Tshaka spent his youth in exile, where he learnt something of European methods of warfare, and earned for himself the reputation of a mighty warrior and a great general. On succeeding to the supreme chieftainship of the tribe of the Ama-Zulu, he so drilled his warriors that his army became a perfect fighting machine, the like of which has never been seen perhaps since the Roman legions made the City of the Seven Hills the mistress of the world. Enforcing their fear and respect by the most bloody acts of tyranny, and training them by physical exercises and deprivations until they united herculean strength with Spartan fortitude, this African Napoleon hurled his warriors against the surrounding tribes and "ate them up." His ideas of conquest were summed up in the one word, "extermination," and it is estimated that half-a-million of people were slaughtered by his armies. Some of the tribes, not waiting to share in the fate of their neighbours, retreated en masse across the Srakensberg mountains and encountered the tribes whom we have seen cultivating the soil in what are now Basutoland and the Orange Free State. The invaders found these tribes disunited and unable to withstand their onslaughts. But the crisis brought forth a leader—no other than Moshesh, the founder of the Basuto nation. The name Moshesh, by the way, means "The Shaver," and was taken by him in later days when he had risen to paramount influence in the tribe in allusion to the way in which he had overcome all others. Born in about the year 1790, in the northern part of Basutoland, he occupied by birth a very inferior position in his tribe, for he was the younger son of a petty chief, and in this land of primogeniture, was therefore a mere nobody. But he possessed just those qualities which in troublous times bring a man into prominence. He was a man of determined character. Absolutely fearless, and possessed of a powerful physique, as active as the leopards he hunted, he had won, even in that nation of hunters, the reputation of a mighty Nimrod. When the scattered hosts fell upon his tribe, Moshesh took possession of a rock near his birthplace and stubbornly defended it against the invaders, but after a while he was compelled to abandon his position. In the meanwhile he had seen, with the eye of genius, the possibilities of Thaba Bosiu, and on his retreat from Buthé-Buthe, his first stronghold, he took up his abode there. This was in the year 1824, and Moshesh was therefore in the prime of manhood. At Thaba Bosiu he gathered around him the remnants of the five tribes, together with fugitives from neighbouring countries, who, hearing of his prowess, flocked to him for protection against the Zulus. He thus found himself at the head of a large body of people of many different tribes, and being himself a warrior and a born leader of men, he quickly reduced the heterogeneous mass to order, and as "the chief of the Mountain" became renowned far and wide as a warrior and a man of wisdom.

An instance of his power in both of these capacities was afforded in 1831 when his stronghold was attacked by the armies of Msiikazi, a Zulu chief, who for some reason had left his country and invaded what is now the Free State, and on being defeated by the Boers went northward and established the Matabele power. Again and again these fierce warriors tried to ascend the sides of Thaba Bosiu, and scale the frowning heights, but in vain. At length they withdrew discomfited, threatening vengeance on the mountain chief if they ever caught him in the plains. As they were retreating they were overtaken by a messenger from Moshesh, accompanied by a number of herdsmen in charge of a drove of cattle. The message sent to the Zulus was to this effect: "Moshesh thinks that after your hard fighting to-day you must be hungry, so he has sent you a little bread." The Zulus were astonished beyond measure. "This man," they said, "defeats us in battle, and then gives us meat! We will never attack him again." And they kept their word. Moshesh was no match for these Zulus, and he knew it. The temporary advantage he had gained was owing to the strength of his position, and not because his people could cope on equal terms with the warriors of Msiikazi. Therefore, in his wisdom, he conciliated his enemies, and gained, if not their friendship, at least their absence.

By this policy of his, which he pursued throughout his career, Moshesh revealed himself to be a statesman, and herein he differed widely from the Zulu chieftains. Tshaka and his successors down to Lobengula did not understand peace. The only policy they knew was war—war to the death. Moshesh on the contrary never waged war for mere conquest. On one occasion he declared that he was a dog, and if he was kicked he would bite. His motto was, "Peace is Prosperity," and he acted up to that motto. One of his sayings on the subject of Peace was: "Peace is as the rain from heaven which nourishes the land and makes the corn grow; but war is as the hot wind which dries up the earth and blasts the fruits of the soil." On another occasion he said: "My name is Moshesh, and my sister is called Peace." By wise dealing he united the bands who rallied round him into a strong nation, and by his wily diplomacy preserved his people against the inroads of his white neighbours, on many occasions proving himself more than a match for astute English and Dutch statesmen. The result is that to-day the Basuto are a nation, and almost alone of the native tribes, preserve their independence. They are under the protection of Britain it is true, and the representative of the Queen controls the exterior affairs of the country, but the chiefs retain to a very large extent their prerogatives, and white people are not allowed to live in the country except as traders, or missionaries, or Government officials, and may possess no land.

The wisdom of Moshesh is well illustrated by the way he treated the cannibals who were in the land when he rose to power. Probably the custom of eating human flesh was forced upon these people by the famine caused by the invasion of the tribes fleeing from the Zulus, and when once the custom had become established it was not easily abolished. The cannibals, there is every reason to believe, were few in number, and regarded with contempt by their fellow-tribesmen. Moshesh exerted his power to do away with cannibalism, and succeeded so well that since his day there has been no revival of the custom. One is continually meeting with reminders of those terrible days. One missionary told me how he once saw a woman talking to an old man, and afterwards asked her if she knew who he was. "Oh yes," she replied with a smile, "that man ate my mother!" After leaving Thaba Bosiu I visited Cana, a mission station further north, and there I was taken to see a huge cave that was at one time the home of cannibals. The cave is high up on the side of a mountain, at the head of a deep gully, overlooking a vast fertile plain. It is well-nigh inaccessible save from the summit of the mountain above, from which it is reached by a path that could easily be defended against any number of assailants. Seated in this cave the cannibals had a splendid outlook, and woe betide any stray traveller if they caught sight of him. Issuing forth from their retreat and descending the mountain by paths known only to themselves, they would quickly overtake the unwary traveller and—cook him! Mr. Kohler, the missionary at Cana, told me that when he founded the station twenty-seven years ago, he found many human bones in the cave. He told me also of an old woman he used to know, who had had the unique experience of having actually been in the cannibals' cooking-pot, and yet escaped alive! She was at the time a young girl, and the cannibals on capturing her cut off one of her little fingers in order that she might slowly bleed to death. After some time, thinking that she was dead, they placed her in their huge cooking-pot, and poured water over her. During the night she recovered consciousness, and realising her awful position, she crept out of the pot and made good her escape. How she did it in the darkness, weak from loss of blood as she was, I do not know, for even in daylight at the present day when the path has become worn by long usage, it is not free from difficulty. Anyhow, she escaped, and bore about with her to her dying day the marks of her would-be consumers. To-day this cave is frequented by much less harmful creatures, goats, to wit, and the original floor of the cave is hidden from view, precluding the possibility of original research!

The councillors of Moshesh advised him to deal summarily with the cannibals, but he utterly refused to accept their advice. In particular they wished him to put to death a man who had eaten his grandfather, but Moshesh said: "That man is the tomb of my grandfather, and whenever did you hear of such a thing as a man disturbing the grave of his ancestors." The result of this good-natured clemency was that the cannibals came out of their dens, and the evil custom died out. Moshesh evidently had a fund of dry humour about him; some of his sayings are gems of piquant speech.

Another great act of his was to abolish the Drink from his country, an event which happened after he had been under the influence of the Gospel for some time.

Undoubtedly the best thing Moshesh did for his people, even from a purely temporal point of view, was to invite missionaries to settle in his country, and to take them under his protection. The manner of their coming was this. During his troubles after settling at Thaba Bosiu, Moshesh received a visit from a Griqua hunter, Adam Krotz by name, whom he made his confidant. Adam told him about missionaries—about Robert Moffat, and those settled in his own country. Moshesh asked him eagerly: "Do you know any who would be disposed to come? Oh, I beseech you, tell the first you meet to hasten here. I will give them the best possible welcome. I will do everything they advise me to do." After his return home, Krotz found that Moshesh had sent him 200 cattle that he might procure in exchange at least one missionary, but they had been intercepted and captured by a marauding tribe. Shortly after this, three missionaries sent out by the Evangelical Churches of France to reinforce a mission in Bechuanaland, visited Philliopolis, and there met Krotz. They determined to visit Moshesh, and Krotz undertook to guide them through what was then unknown country, marked on maps as "sandy and desert plains." After an adventurous journey, they reached Thaba Bosiu, and ascended the mountain to meet the chief, who received them most cordially. The first impressions made on the minds of the missionaries were distinctly favourable; as one of them said: "I felt at once that I had to do with a superior man, trained to think, to command others, and, above all, himself." When the new-comers had explained their mission, the chief answered: "My heart is white with joy: your words are great and good. You see our desolation. This country was full of inhabitants. Wars have devastated it. Multitudes have perished: others are refugees in foreign lands. I remain almost alone on this rock. I have been told that you can help us. You promise to do it. That is enough. Remain with us. You shall instruct us. We will do all you wish." These events happened in 1833. In that year the missionaries settled at the entrance to a long, deep valley some distance south of Thaba Bosiu, where they founded the station of Morija. In 1837 they formed a station at Thaba Bosiu.

The station lies at the foot of the mountain, situated on a wide elevated terrace, sloping down to the plain below. The photograph reproduced here was obtained from a position on the side of the mountain. In the background is the Berea mountain; in the foreground the low, thatched building is the school with the teacher's house alongside. The mission-house and other buildings are partially hidden by the trees, while the church is on the right. Among the buildings is that occupied by the girls' school, giving a somewhat more advanced training to thirty girls than can be obtained in the ordinary mission schools. This work is in the charge of two ladies. As the holidays were on, I had no opportunity of inspecting this institution. The result of the last examination by the inspector is very satisfactory, all the girls passing the test. The work of the Church is equally prosperous. There are about 900 approved members of the Church, including several out-stations. During last year 500 names were added to the Church roll, the highest number ever added in one year. These are admitted as Catechumens, and remain such until they are adjudged worthy of being received into full membership, as we should say. On New Year's Day there was a big gathering at Thaba Bosiu from all the country round about. At the main service, which was held under the trees behind the mission house, there were fully two thousand people present. In the afternoon another service was held in the same place, while the members filled the church for the communion. It was a sight never to be forgotten. Very patiently they listened to the young missionary as he strove to speak to them through an interpreter. As I watched the long line of black figures march in procession before the Communion table, I saw in my mind's eye Africa stretching out her hands unto God. During the week following, being the first week in the New Year, a prayer meeting was held every afternoon in the church, and was well attended. One of the most regular attendants was an old man of ninety-five, who lives a mile away from the church.

One morning after breakfast I started off to walk round the mountain, a tramp which lasted two hours. On the way I passed through a deserted village, once occupied by the chief Masupha, a son of Moshesh. Last year, however, there was some trouble, and he was turned out of his village. Near by stands a Roman Catholic Church. It was built, as the Romanists said, in the very heart of Protestantism. Masupha is friendly to them, but the friendship of a drunken, heathen old renegade from Christianity cannot be of much value to them. Anyhow, since his removal the church has been closed.

The appearance of the mountain is most striking as one walks round it. The side of the mountain slopes more or less steeply, with huge boulders scattered about, behind which giants might play at hide-and-seek. At the summit there is the perpendicular rock, a hundred feet high in places. Here and there the rock is broken up, and in the crevices there are places by which an ascent to the summit can be accomplished with more or less difficulty. In such places Moshesh constructed breastworks of rock, one within the other. These stones served a double purpose. Ensnconced behind them the warriors awaited the enemy, armed with their assegais, and later on, with guns as well; then as the enemy approached, the rocks would be hurled down the mountain slope with terrific force, carrying destruction and dismay before them. These breastworks, or the remnants of them, may still be seen.

One afternoon after the meeting in the church, I watched a long line of natives ascending the mountain. They advanced very slowly, and as they reached the summit they seemed to be confronted by a veritable wall of rock. Then they disappeared, and presently I saw them on the top of the mountain. Evidently there was a path through the rock somehow; so armed with my camera, I climbed the mountain by the same path one morning. On reaching the foot of the rock I found myself on a terrace, defended by a breastwork of stones. Then up the side of the cliff I noticed a series of rough steps, formed partly by Nature, partly by the hand of man, and by this means I gained the summit. This is one of the four or five paths leading to the top. Along one or two of them cattle and horsemen can pass, though I expect very few of us would care to be the horseman. By this same path a party of Boers tried to storm the mountain during one of the wars between the Basuto and the Orange Free State. Under their brave leader, Commandant Wepener, the Boers advanced, sheltering themselves behind the boulders as well as they could, and exposed to a galling fire from all points. They reached the terrace near the top, and were preparing to ascend the narrow stair when Wepener was shot through the heart, and the Boers retreated precipitately, followed by the yells of the Basuto, and more substantial missiles in the shape of rocks hurled down from above.

The top of Thaba Bosiu is a plain, fairly level in some places, covered with rich grass, in others the basaltic rock is showing, while over one portion is the series of sand dunes already referred to, reminding one very much of the beach at a favourite watering place. The grass on the top used to afford food for immense herds of cattle that were kept there during troublous times. During one siege there were actually thirty thousand head of cattle on the mountain. There are also many springs on the top, so that the fortress was easily provisioned for a long period. Moshesh had his village on the top of the mountain. The remnants of the village are still there, and until a few years ago, his house was standing, but empty, for the Basuto so dread the influence of departed spirits that they will not occupy a house in which a death has taken place. When a chief dies, his successor builds a new house, and often moves the village to a new site. Hence the glory of Thaba Bosiu as the Great Chief's residence has departed, since his successors no longer live there, but Basuto still regard it as the capital of the country. Moshesh was buried on the top of the mountain, and ever since then all of his house and lineage have been interred there. The graves, as will be seen from the photograph reproduced here, are merely heaps of stones, with a tablet at the head bearing the name of the deceased carved in rough letters. Moshesh's grave is fast falling into ruin. The missionaries have offered to erect a suitable memorial to the chief's memory, but are not allowed to, the superstitious nature of the people overcoming their sentiments of reverence for the founder of their nation.

The view from the top of Thaba Bosiu is full of interest to the historical mind. The plain around the mountain has been the cockpit of this part of South Africa. It has witnessed in historical times fierce Zulu i pis, Boer commandoes, British regiments, and the armies of rival factions of Basuto arrayed against each other. Opposite is the Berea mountain, on which the British troops were defeated by the Basuto. Yonder, too, is Qeme, another flat-topped mountain, the scene of several conflicts between the Boers and the Basuto, during the long wars which have been waged between the two peoples, in the course of which the Boers tried many times, but in vain, to storm the stronghold of Thaba Bosiu. As late as last year the clash of arms was heard around the mountain. During the troubles between Lerotholi and his uncle Masupha last year, Masupha's warriors encamped in the space between the school and the church on this station, but as Lerotholi's troops failed to appear at the expected time no battle took place.

So that this mountain, if it could speak, could tell a strange and stirring story. From the days when diminutive Bushmen contended with the lions and tigers for the possession of the caves until now—what tumults it has witnessed!

Farewell, Old Mountain of the Night! Thou hast witnessed many strivings of man with man : henceforth thou shalt look down upon a fairer scene—a people of peace.

Orthographical Note.

The inflections of the nouns in Sesuto are expressed by prefixes. Ba-suto indicates the people ; mo-suto, a single person ; Se-suto, the language ;

Le-suto, the country. Properly, when speaking in English, we should drop the prefixes and refer to the Sutos, etc., just as we speak of the Zulus, and not of the Ama-Zulu. But inconsistently enough people who speak of the Zulus also refer to the Basutos, using a double plural in the latter case.

Th in Sesuto is not pronounced like the th in English ; it is an aspirated t.—E. W. S.

Browsings in My Library.

V.

O a book lover it is a delightful thing to cut open the pages of a new volume or periodical, and feel that you are "the first that ever burst" into its unrifled treasure house. As the paper-knife ploughs through the folded sheets, you get fleeting foretastes of the sweets in store, and you would linger, bee-like, as you pass, but that you are eager to see the later pages, and to settle down, with as little delay as possible, to the Preface and Chapter I. You are often disappointed with your new book, and are tempted to say, with Charles Lamb, "Whenever a new book comes out I read an old one over again." Still, if you would not be a Dryasdust, cutting yourself off completely from the living present in order to live in the past, you are bound to read new books, and it is only by experience that you acquire a scent for that which is worth buying, or worth borrowing, among the thousands of volumes that pour yearly from the Press.

Delia is dubious, and not without justice, of my new books. She has so often picked up one from the table that had a tempting cover, and the inside was some dry, and to the feminine palate, tasteless kernel of philosophy, theology, metaphysic, or sociology, instead of a charming story, or a piquantly written biography. So to-day it is not altogether surprising if my tyrant, as she comes into the book-room, and finds me cutting the pages of a thin quarto in a light brown paper cover, gives a little sniff, and says, "What have you there, Sir Book-worm? It looks thrilling, I must say."

"It is a Dictionary," I mildly reply.

"A Dictionary, indeed! You don't need to learn any more hard words. I noticed the people at the meeting the other night nudging each other while you were talking about 'Hermeneutics' and 'Palimpsests' and what not."

"If you had been dutifully listening you wouldn't have noticed the nudging. But this is no ordinary dictionary—it is the Oxford 'New English Dictionary on Historical Principles,' on which a large number of the greatest scholars, with Dr. J. A. H. Murray at their head, have been engaged for nearly forty years, and they will be engaged, in all likelihood, for another ten or fifteen years before they get to the end of Z."

"And where, pray, are they now?"

"They have just got to Horizontal, but the Parts are coming out now two or three, in different letters, every quarter."

"And what will be the good of it?"

"The good? Why, it will give every word that has ever been written in English, and the Anglo-Saxon from which it sprang, during the last thousand years. It traces every one of those words to its origin, if the origin has not been lost, and it shows how those words have varied in meaning, and the variety of ways in which they have been and are used, and it illustrates each of those uses by a series of quotations from the very earliest writer who can be found to have employed it, down to writers of our own time. And some of these quotations are extremely curious. Oh, there is a great deal more than you may imagine in a good dictionary. It was a Scotchman, if I remember rightly, who was left stranded on a rainy day in a lonely inn, with nothing but Johnson's Dictionary to amuse him ; but it did amuse him, and he said, 'There is lots of fine confused feeding in it, but I wish the subject did not change quite so often.'"

"Well, I think I should prefer something more connected myself, but every man to his taste—and every woman too."

"You would find some of the articles in these H parts quite long enough for a sitting. Those on Hand, Heart, Home, He, Heaven, and so on, cover several closely-printed pages each. Besides, you want to use your imagination, and you will find that many of the words, in their derivation and their history, conjure up pictures and awaken sentiments that make them as fascinating as any novel, and much more profitable."

Delia rippled into a silvery laugh, and said, "Now, sir, I shall make you prove that rash assertion. Give me an illustration, this very instant!"

I took up the part Haversine to Heel, and turned to Heaven. It would fill four or five pages of The Aldersgate Magazine, so, of course, I did not read it. That would have been to "give myself away."

You need to read the "New English Dictionary" as you need to hear sermons, "in the right spirit," and the unphilological novice is not likely to be in the right spirit. I simply skimmed gracefully over the article, as a swallow skims over a pool, and let my fancy hover over it here and there.

But what a word Heaven is! What a long history lies behind its euphonious Saxon syllables, going back through the centuries, and being found in various spellings in all the branches of the Germanic language, till it is lost in the mist of antiquity! Even the erudite scholars of Oxford, with their hundreds of willing philological volunteer helpers all over the world, have failed to trace heaven to its ulterior etymology. It is one of the mother words of our language, taking its place by the side of the sweet syllables, wife, husband, home, hope, help, meet, holy, that have sounded deliciously from the lips of our ancestors since our language was in its cradle. At its mother's knee the child lisps heaven, it sounds like its own music in the hymns sung by the youths and maidens, and the men and women; and when the aged pilgrim, or the prematurely fallen traveller in life's highway, nears the darkly-flowing river, it is the soft syllables of heaven that cheer the sinking heart, and nerve it for the chilly plunge. The "New English Dictionary" classifies the various significations of heaven, and illustrates each by quotations ranging from the Anglo-Saxon through all the stages of our language till to-day. The Christian heaven is defined as "the celestial abode of immortal beings; the habitation of God and His angels, and of beatified spirits, usually placed in the realms beyond the sky; the state of the blessed hereafter and opposed to hell." The quotations range from an Anglo-Saxon Gospel of the year 1000 to Christina Rossetti's "Seek and Find," (1879), in which she beautifully says, "Heaven is the presence of God; the presence of God, then, is heaven." Some of the quotations might serve as excellent texts, thus:

"Sufficiency dwellis nocht bot in heavin."—Dunbar, Poems, 1500-20.

"Heaven lies about us in our infancy."—Wordsworth.

"Heaven opened to a soul while yet on earth, Earth forced on a soul's use while yet in heaven."
BROWNING.

"Heaven is not the firmament overhead, but the condition of the redeemed after death, of which the blue serene gives us the appropriate symbol."—Sears.

We are told in the course of the article, that by the Jews, (at least in later times), seven heavens were recognised; the highest, called also "heaven of heavens," being the abode of God and the most exalted angels. This division was probably of Babylonian origin, and founded on astronomical theories. Heaven is used sometimes in the lower sense of "a state of bliss or felicity." Delia does not approve of the quotation I read to her illustrative of this sense from a sixteenth century author, (J. Heywood, 1546), "Husbandes are in heauen whose wiues scold not." A rare, but highly expressive compound is Heavenhood, of which two modern examples in use are given: "Ripe, rich fruits of heavenhood," (G. D. Boardman, Creature Weak, 1878), and "This is the heavenhood of heaven," (Max Müller, Natural Religion, 1889).

When I finished, Delia was quite ready to admit that "all dictionaries were not so dull as she had thought." She would have liked to know something about the history of other words, and referred to Wife and Husband, which I had mentioned. I told her to ask me again, about the year 1910, by when the Dictionary will have got to W. I gave her the interesting derivation, however, of these old Saxon words—Wife, the weaver, the spinner, who makes the material of the garments she afterwards cuts out and sews; and Husband, the "house-band," who keeps the house together. Of course, I pointed out, wives are not now weavers, but the word points back to the simple state of society when the spinning-wheel was an indispensable part of the furniture of every house, and the wife wove from the wool of her yeoman husband's sheep all the cloth for his and her own and the children's clothes.

"It must have been a man," she said, "who invented the word husband." 'House band,' indeed! Poor homes most would be if they were left to the man to hold together. You, for instance. You would be like Alfred the Great, only instead of mending an arrow you would be poring over a book while the cakes were being burnt and the kettle was boiling over. But there's another word just come into my head I should like to know something about—the word Ranter, that used to be thrown like mud at the early Primitives, only it never hurt them. Where did it come from?"

"You will have to wait four or five years for the Dictionary to get to R before you can have the full information. But I came upon it the other day in the 'Journal' of George Fox, the founder of the Quakers. I will get the book."

I reached down the two volumes of that extraordinary record of religious experiences and "journeyings many" in Evangelistic service, to which John Wesley's "Journal" is the only one fit to be compared. I read to Delia the full title: "A Journal or Historical Account of the Life, Travels, Sufferings, Christian Experiences and Labour of Love, in the Work of the Ministry, of that ancient, eminent and faithful servant of Jesus Christ, George Fox; Who departed this Life in great Peace with the Lord, the 13th of the 11th month, 1690." Mine is the sixth edition, printed by Antony Pickard, Leeds, in 1837. There are about a dozen references to a sect commonly called the Ranters, who held very extravagant views of Scripture, and some of them appear to have been peculiar also in their notions of morality. George Fox, who could be very peculiar himself, was sorely exercised at the Friends, who were nick-named Quakers, being often mistaken for, and called Ranters, and he says that on one occasion he "was moved of the Lord God to tell them 'that the plagues and judgments of God would overtake them, and come upon them.'" It is not surprising that the Ranters often annoyed the Quakers, who delivered such testimonies against them. We often smile at the naïveté of George, but let us thank God for Fox! He surely had the "inner light," and the denomination that derives itself from him has set, and still sets, the noblest example of pure living, honourable trading, fearless philanthropic intervention on behalf of the persecuted, and a robust and sanctified common-sense that is now proving of inestimable service to the Free Church Federation movement. The Quakers were shrewd enough from the very beginning. Thus, I read to Delia how, like Paul, they made the magistrates who had arrested them eagerly desire to get rid of them. It was at Wellington, Shropshire, in the year 1663—the year after the 2,000 Nonconformist ministers resigned their benefices rather than submit to the Act of Uniformity. Says Fox:

"There had been very great persecutions in that country, and in that town a little before, insomuch that some Friends questioned the peaceableness of our meeting; but the Lord's power chained all, and His glory shined over all. Friends told us, how they had broken up the meetings by warrants from the justices, and how by the warrants they were required to carry six Friends before the justices; and Friends told them, 'Carry them then.' The officers told Friends 'they must go;' but Friends said, 'Nay; that was not according to the warrant, which required them to carry them. Then they were forced to hire carts and waggons and horses, and to lift Friends into the waggons and carts, to carry them before a justice. When they came to a justice's house, sometimes he happened to be from home, and if he were a moderate man, he would get out of the way, and they were obliged to carry them before another; so that they were many days carting and carrying Friends up and down, from place to place. And when afterwards the officers came to lay their charges for this upon the towns, the townspeople would not pay it, but made them bear it themselves; which broke the neck of the persecution through for that time. The like was done in several other places, till the officers had shamed and tired themselves, and then they were glad to give over."

Delia was highly amused at the idea of these sturdy Friends in sober apparel and broad-brimmed hats mixing so much of the wisdom of the serpent with the simplicity of the dove. It is interesting to note, in these days when the most powerful of monarchs proclaims himself an apostle of peace, that it was George Fox who first delivered a clear testimony on Christian principles against war. I read a passage where he tells how he acted on his principle himself:

"There were among the prisoners, two very bad men, that often sat drinking with the officers and soldiers; and because I would not sit and drink with them too, it made them the worse against me. One time when these two men were drunk, one of them, (whose name was William Wilkinson, a Presbyterian, who had been a captain), came to me and challenged me to fight with him. I, seeing what condition he was in, got out of his way; and next morning, when he was more sober, showed him how unmanly a thing it was in him to challenge a man to fight, whose principle, he knew, it was not to strike, but if he was stricken on one ear, to turn the other. I told him if he had a mind to fight, he should have challenged some of the soldiers that could have answered him in his own way. But, however, seeing he had challenged me, I was now come to answer him, with my hands in my pockets; and (reaching my hand towards him); 'Here,' said I, 'here is my hair, here are my cheeks, here is my back.' With that he skipped away from me, and went into another room; at which the soldiers fell a-laughing; and one of the officers said, 'You are a happy man that can bear such things.' Thus he was conquered without a blow. After a while he took the oath, gave bond, and got out of prison; and not long after the Lord cut him off."

We were interrupted by a shriek from the garden, and a violent sobbing of our hopeful five-year-old. Delia rushed out to ascertain the cause, and found that Master Wilfrid, like George Fox, had been converting principle into practice. At Sunday School he had heard an address on kindness to animals. He conceived it to be his mission to release poor flies from the meshes of cruel spiders. He told Delia, with choking sobs, "Here's a poor fly that that wicked spider has begun to eat up. Oh-h-h!" He was soon comforted, but may he always keep his heart tender, not merely to flies, but to men and women!

Co-operative Farms.

By J. B. PATON, D.D.

Nottingham,
April 12th, 1899.

To the Editor of
THE ALDRSGATE PRIMITIVE METHODIST MAGAZINE.

DEAR SIR,

Many are anxious to re-people the land and to establish rural communities that will have bright social and educational advantages such as are now only possible in towns. This can only be done where there is a Co-operative Society in which a number of families form a commune and organise themselves so as to secure these advantages and other great economic benefits. There are three classes of men who would probably wish to form such a commune or Co-operative Colony, and who, we think, would be likely to make it thoroughly successful.

1. Men who have been brought up on the land and are acquainted with various kinds of farm-work, and who, having made a little money in town-life, now wish with their small capital to occupy a small holding under the favourable conditions we have referred to.

2. Men who are now on the land in large farms, but who find their capital insufficient to work them successfully, and who may even be losing money upon them. Many of these men would be glad to remain on the land in such a Co-operative Colony. Readers of the striking novel, "Jonathan Merle," will remember how the farmer who drifted into the city and sank in its maelstrom, sighed for some such holding as is now offered at Lingfield; and I believe there are many such who would delight in a small holding, and would be able to make a comfortable living upon it.

3. Many enterprising agricultural labourers who have been able to save a little money by their work on allotments, are now prepared to make a distinct advance upon their present mode of life by becoming small holders. These men have the skill and the industry necessary for the thorough and intensive cultivation of a small holding, and by means of Co-operation all they do, in the way of production, purchase, and sale, could be done to the very best advantage.

We shall therefore specially encourage such men to take up small holdings in a Co-operative Colony, such as it is proposed to form alongside the Training Colony at Lingfield, and which is described in the following statement. I accordingly ask the favour of the publication of this letter and statement in your magazine.

Faithfully yours,
J. B. PATON.

The Lingfield estate was purchased not only to be, if possible, a model Training Colony for those who sought work and were fit for work, but who could not find it elsewhere; but also to provide land for a Colony of another type, namely, a Co-operative Colony of Small Holders. For this purpose ninety-six acres of good arable and grass land have been set apart. Upon this it is hoped that twelve industrious men and their families may be settled, each man holding upon an average, eight acres, a quantity which, it is believed, will be sufficient for one man, providing he cultivates the land in the most perfect way by spade labour. Of course, there must be minor and auxiliary outdoor industries, such as poultry-rearing, the producing of eggs, pig-feeding, rabbit-farming, bee-keeping, etc. Indoor industries should also be organised, for which some technical skill is required, and for which some technical education must be given. These indoor industries will occupy the long winter evenings, and the inclement days, when work out-of-doors is impossible.

The main element, however, in such a Colony, without which it will fail of perfect success, is the Co-operative element. The several tenants will hold on a permanent tenure under a Co-operative Society of which they themselves are members, and the affairs of which they will conduct under their own Committee. This Co-operative Society will undertake, or will assist in the purchase and sale of commodities needed by the tenants, or prepared for market by them, and will also own such machinery and horses as may be required by the tenants. The Society will also establish a Co-operative Credit Bank on the Raiffeisen method, which has given such wonderful stimulus and help to the small tenants and proprietary farmers in Germany, France, and Italy.

As the land has been set apart for this purpose, the Director of the Lingfield Colony is now in a position to receive applications from industrious men, who are thoroughly acquainted with agricultural work, and who would be prepared to settle on such small holdings under the conditions named. It will be necessary for each applicant to have at his command, either of his own money or, through friends, a capital of about £8 an acre, so as to be able to contribute something to the stocking of his holding. By means of an agricultural credit society he might be assisted in more fully stocking his farm, and possibly in the erection of a cottage farm steading. The Directors would be glad to hear from any suitable men, and would be grateful to any of your readers, who know of men suitable to become pioneers of such a model colony, if they would inform such men of the offer now made to them.

Connexional Biography.

REV. C. T. HARRIS.

CHARLES THOMAS HARRIS was born at Redruth, Cornwall, March 11th, 1812. His father was married twice, and Mr. Harris was by the second wife. In his childhood he was both weak and delicate, and his life was frequently despaired of. Once he was given up for dead. Twice he had a narrow escape of being drowned, and once of being burned.

Both his father and mother were pious people, and members of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. They both lived to a good age, his father dying when he was seventy, and his mother in her eighty-seventh year. Being the son of pious parents, he was taken by them to the class meetings and preaching services, in which he received much spiritual good, as well as greatly profiting by them. It was no doubt this fact that made him such a lover of the class meeting to the end of his days, and so anxious that it should be retained as a distinguishing feature of Methodism, and especially of Primitive Methodism. Indeed, I have heard him say more than once, "If you let the class meeting go, you can write Ichabod on your chapels and schoolrooms;" and there was much truth in the remark, which ought to make us both cautious and careful to retain our distinctive features as Methodists, for if we let them go we shall deserve the reprobation and censure of all right-minded and true-hearted men.

During the year 1827, the Primitive Methodists had a glorious work of grace going on at Redruth, and a large new chapel was built there, and through a sermon preached in it by the Rev. William Driffield, on the depravity of man, Mr. Harris was convicted and converted, and became a member of the Society. Soon after his conversion, and his union with the Church of his choice, he was strongly tempted to doubt the truth of Christianity, and to go back again to the beggarly elements of worldly policy and cunning. But this temptation he kept to himself, and by prayer and faith, reading good books and conversing with good people, he overcame the temptation, and got under clearer skies and into calmer waters, where he found rest and peace and joy.

But the temptation, he tells us, caused him great sorrow and searching of heart, and he afterwards praised God for His goodness to him, and His wonderful deliverance of him.

On his recovery from this severe temptation, he says, he gave himself afresh to God and to His work, and began to feel more and more called to do the will of God.

About this time he was apprenticed to the building trade, and worked at it for several years.

In 1830 he was requested to give an address at a prayer meeting, and complied, the Lord owning and blessing the words that he spoke to the good of others. After this, his first effort at public speaking, his name was put on the local preachers' plan, and three years afterwards he was called into the ministry.

During the first part of his ministry he travelled long journeys and suffered many privations in the performance of his duties. But none of these things moved him, or yet hindered him from doing his work. He felt he was called of God to this work and in it he must stay until God, who called him to it, should release him from it. He met with great persecution in Poole, in Dorsetshire, and suffered much in his work there.

In 1840 he was stationed at Hereford, and commenced his labours in this city for the first time, July 4th. He preached in the High Town at nine in the morning, then walked to Harewood's End, a distance of nine miles, and preached afternoon and evening.

In 1843 he entered the marriage state with Miss Elizabeth Lea, Yew Cottage. They were married at Newton Chapel, Cwm Circuit, July 11th, and their first station after their marriage was Swansea. Here they met with many kind friends, and here they suffered many privations and trials in their work, but the good work progressed and many souls were saved and added to the ranks of the Church.

In 1844 their first and only child was born, and they regarded him as a gift from God, and endeavoured to train him for heaven. The two years in Swansea Station, Mr. Harris tells us in his diary, were trying years. They, however, paid their way, and left a few shillings in the circuit steward's hand. From Swansea they removed to Salisbury, where they met with great persecution and many trials; but God blessed their labours, and the Church was enlarged under their efforts and God's blessing upon them.

During their stay in Salisbury as many as 300 souls were saved and added to the Church.

From Salisbury Mr. Harris went to Bristol for a second time; indeed, he was stationed no less than four times to Bristol, twelve years in all being spent there. Under his superintendency, Ebenezer Chapel was built and opened under favourable circumstances. The following are the stations on which Mr. Harris was permitted to travel, viz.: St. Austell, Exeter, Devonport, Bristol (four times), Poole, Dorset, Hereford, Swansea, Salisbury, Stroud, Bath, St. Ives (twice), Penzance, Pontypool, Aberdare, Tredegar. In 1876 he was superannuated and came to reside in Hereford.

During his retirement from the active work, Mr. Harris was by no means indolent or indifferent to the claims of his Church. He preached and visited as though he was in full work, and many are the pleasing reminiscences of those visits in the minds of the people. For the last three years Mr. Harris was unable to attend the religious services of the sanctuary, but he never forgot them in his prayers, or yet in his gifts, sending his collection money regularly, although unable to attend himself. During the last six or eight months of his life his mind was somewhat affected, but he ever retained his consciousness of God's presence and power to save. He said on the Saturday before he died, "I want no other Saviour than Jesus. He is able to save me, and I will trust Him."

The writer was with him when he passed away on January 16th. There was no struggle, but a languishing into life. In fact, he went to sleep in the everlasting arms, and is now at home with God.

His remains were interred in Hereford Cemetery on Friday, January 20th, 1899, in presence of the members of his family and the officials and members of the Church. The Rev. E. Ball was the officiating minister.

Many letters of sympathy have been received by his family since his death, but they are so many that we have not space for any of them.

In estimating his character: he was a good man, fairly intelligent, a great reader of pious biographies and good devotional books, but the Bible was his chief book. He was not what would be called a great preacher, but a useful preacher, many being brought to God under his ministry. The platform was the place where Mr. Harris shone most as a public speaker. He was a hard worker, always doing and on the alert to build up and strengthen the cause of God. He was a good family visitor, and devoted much of his time to it. His methods may not have been the best, but they were his own, and he believed in them to the end. He was a true friend and lover of peace, no retailer of scandal or of reports about his brethren. He was a good husband and father, and had one of the best of women for his wife.

E. BALL.

MR. MICHAEL FELLOWS.

MR. MICHAEL FELLOWS was born at Broad Oak, near Bridgnorth, Salop, on June 6th, 1810. Being the only child of his parents, he was somewhat idolised. He removed to Enville parish, with his mother, when about twenty-five years of age, after which he was elected churchwarden; also, in 1852, he removed to Hall Close, Alveley, shortly after which he was again appointed churchwarden.

He was very regular in his attendance at church, and in his duties as churchwarden.

He began to attend our services in Alveley, when they were held in a cottage, through the influence of his cousin, Miss Fisher. One Sunday morning he came home from church and stood with his back to the fire, when he said: "I'm starved, I feel starved somehow." Miss Fisher replied: "Yes, I know where you are starved, and what you mean, and you had better come with me to the Methodist meeting." He came to the meeting, and though religiously inclined before, he became one of the brightest examples of the Christian life in the village of Alveley, and throughout the Kidderminster Circuit.

Shortly after uniting himself with us efforts were put forth for the erection of a chapel, which proved very successful, and Mr. Fellows faithfully performed the promise he made to the Rev. W. Gwillim, superintendent minister at that period, that he would see the chapel out of debt.

Everything that the clergyman and Church people alike could do, was done, by way of entreaty, persecution and intimidation, to secure his return to the Church of England, but all to no effect. The work of God prospered, souls were saved, and a good village cause established.

As a local preacher, class-leader, society steward, trustee and treasurer, he was very conscientious in the performance of his duties, keeping a conscience void of offence before God and man; and many will, doubtless, be the crown of his rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Hall Close has been the home of ministers, local preachers, and friends alike, for forty-five years, and the kind hospitality received has ever been of the most exceptional character; for though Mr. Fellows never married, yet his cousin, Miss Fisher, became his housekeeper after his mother's death, and remained so to the close of his life, though his senior in years.

The family altar was never neglected by him, the Bible and devotional books were constantly and carefully studied; and, like Enoch, "he walked with God." No one could possibly be more deeply interested in the welfare of the cause of God than Michael Fellows. His liberality was proverbial, considering that his means were limited; for several needy chapel cases in the circuit, as well as the circuit and missionary funds, were assisted by him to the utmost of his ability. His sympathies also were always with the afflicted, the poor, the widow, and the orphan; so that the whole village and circuit will seriously suffer by his decease.

For years he was called upon to suffer much from physical weakness, but his love for God's house continued undying, and on more than one occasion have we with difficulty persuaded him that he could not be assisted to chapel without adding materially to his suffering. He could not have survived so long had it not been for the incessant kind attention of Miss Fisher and other friends. I can never forget how he clasped my hand in his and held it, on the occasion of my last visit to him, and how earnestly he responded to prayer for a revival of God's work in Alveley. His death took place on Thursday, March 18th, 1897.

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileged above the common walks of virtuous life, Quite on the verge of Heaven."

The Rev. R. Baxter thus writes of him: "During the six years I laboured on the Kidderminster Station it was my privilege to spend one or two days and nights every month in the hospitable home of the late Mr. Michael Fellows, and his estimable cousin, Miss Fisher. From the time of my first acquaintance with Mr. Fellows I have regarded him as a good and grand old man. He lived a Christly life, and had a clean conscience enlightened by the word of God and prayer. The Bible was his daily companion. It was the strong meat on which his soul constantly fed. He tried to shape his life in conformity with every Divine command. He had Scripturally conceived views on Christian stewardship, in the matter of worldly substance. He was a liberal and devout supporter of the Lord's work. For a great number of years he contributed considerable sums to our missionary funds; but, on account of heavy losses, he has not been in a position to give so largely of late as he did formerly, and I well remember his great grief when he was compelled to reduce his annual subscription. As a steward of the church, Mr. Fellows was always found faithful. As a class-leader, he diligently discharged his duties, feeding the flock committed to his care. He did not, however, devote the whole of his attention to the Church. The sick, the suffering, the sorrowing, widows and orphans left in helplessness, the aged, the infirm, the outcast, could all and always find in him a sympathising friend and helper. He was a man of much prayer. He loved the house of God. He had a firm faith in God's promises. Christ was to him 'all and in all.' Holiness unto the Lord was written on all he had, and holiness of life characterised all his doings. Perhaps he was somewhat puritanic in his notions, but he was free from sanctimoniousness. He lived in agreement of soul with God, allowed God to rule his will, and fill his whole being with His fulness. 'Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God.' Michael Fellows has gone to gaze on God, and to shine in the light of God, lost in wonder, love and praise. I hope to meet him in the light when the shadows have passed away."

The Rev. Thomas Pigott says: "I have delightful soul-inspiring reminiscences of the truly religious habits of Brother Fellows, and the holy influences of his family altar have left marks for good upon my soul, which eternity will never erase. He had all the manners and respectful bearing of a country gentleman, and was one of the finest personifications of sanctified life it has been my privilege to know. He knew, loved, and lived his Bible. I bless God for my acquaintance with him. Heaven becomes richer, and earth poorer. I do pray that Miss Fisher may be comforted and helped in her great loss."

No one could be more deeply respected than Mr. Fellows, and there will ever be a widespread regret among the officials and friends of the Kidderminster Circuit that, in consequence of undue Church influence, they were not allowed to manifest that respect at his funeral, which occurred on the Wednesday following his death.

His death was improved in the Alveley Chapel, on the Sunday afternoon of May 2nd, by the circuit minister, when the united choirs of Alveley and Highley rendered excellent service by singing "Vital Spark" and other suitable hymns specially printed for the occasion.

WILLIAM CLULOW.

MRS. ELIZA LEESON.

MRS. ELIZA LEESON, wife of Edward Leeson, local preacher, of Alveley, in the Kidderminster Circuit, exchanged mortality for life on March 31st, 1897, at the age of sixty-three. Before her marriage she was servant to Mr. Michael Fellows, when he lived at Pool Hall, in the parish of Alveley, and survived her old and much respected master only thirteen days. She was married about forty-five years, and gave herself to God before her marriage. She was a very consistent member of our Connexion, and very anxious for the salvation of her children. Ministers and local preachers were always welcome under her roof, and she would put herself to any inconvenience for their comfort. To her it was given to suffer much before the end came, and it was a trial known only to herself and God to give up her loved ones, and especially her husband, into the Lord's hands; but she gained the victory, and resigned herself and hers fully to the Lord's will. Our last visit to her was on the occasion of the funeral of Mr. Fellows, when she expressed herself as fully ready for the Master's call, and that it was her wish for her own minister to officiate at her burial; but such have been the undue Church influences of this parish for years, that this was denied. Her death was improved in Alveley Chapel, by the circuit minister, on the same occasion as that of Mr. Fellows. May her husband and children all meet her in the deathless clime.

WILLIAM CLULOW.

MR. SAMUEL BROADHURST.

SAMUEL BROADHURST was born at Oldbury, near Dudley, in the year 1851. He described his mother as a right good Primitive, and never forgot the prayers of that mother for his conversion; for though those prayers were continued for twenty-five years, and she died without any apparent answer to those prayers; yet those prayers and her death led indirectly to his conversion.

His conversion took place at Cradley Heath, under the ministry of the Rev. W. Wright, on Sunday evening, September 19, 1880, while Mr. Wright was preaching from that text: "Wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them." It appeared to him as though the preacher looked straight at him, as he said: "He can save to the uttermost," and felt, "He means me;" and there and then he gave himself to Christ.

The Rev. W. Wright thus represents that service: "I very well remember his conversion. There was no outward manifestation of sorrow or joy noticed by the congregation or minister. No one evidently knew of the great change which was silently and invisibly wrought within him in that service, beside himself. I remember with what divine unction and force the word was attended. I called in at Mr. Wesley's the day after, and Mrs. Wesley joyfully said: 'Sam is converted!' And I said, 'Is he? When?' And she replied, 'Last night at chapel!' On interviewing Samuel, I asked him if the report were true, and he said: 'Yes, it is; I got right while you were preaching that Christ was able to save to the uttermost.' He united with our Society, and continued to conduct himself as it becometh the Gospel of Christ so long as I remained in that circuit."

In a few months after his conversion, he was proposed for the preachers' plan, and at first refused; but on being reasoned with by Mr. G. Burford, he afterwards complied. Before he was received on full plan, he removed to Kidderminster, and became so acceptable a local preacher as to be employed ten Sundays per quarter, for seven years, and never allowed an appointment to be neglected. He was circuit secretary for twelve years, and a member of the District Committee for nine years. He was sent as circuit delegate to two District Meetings, and as a District delegate to one Conference.

His health began to fail seven years ago, when the doctor told him he was not to preach any more, as it was positively dangerous. Within three months of his death, and when he felt he could not much longer survive, he said to the writer: "I cannot get to any place of worship, but God comes here and reveals Himself to me, and one of those divine revelations was overpowering. I have known what the joy of working hard and seeing conversions has been; and there is only one thing I wish now to be spared for, and that is to preach in Cross Street Chapel again. On looking back, I have much to regret."

In the paroxysms of pain, to which he was often subject, the mystery of Divine Providence was painful and inexplicable, especially as he thought of the wife so soon to become a widow, and the boy fatherless; and on these occasions the temptations of the enemy would come with almost overwhelming force. We have endeavoured again and again to comfort him out of our own heart's sorrow, and especially from the experience of his Lord, and not in vain. How much he served God, even in suffering, we shall never know, until the day dawns and the shadows flee away. His friends desired him in case he became too weak to speak, to lift his arm in token of victory, and that arm was quietly raised, when immediately Samuel Broadhurst passed to that pure clime, "where there is no more pain," on Tuesday, April 6, 1897, in the forty-sixth year of his age.

The Rev. Thomas Pigott thus writes of him: "Brother Broadhurst was a man of rare gifts, and his aptitude for Church business was sound and solid. His sympathies were with the right, and the weakly. I have most pleasant remembrances of him as a controversialist. He knew the deep things of God, and used to talk and weep until his heart burned within him, in fact he was a man of capacious grasp in relation to the things of God and truth. His last sentences penned to me are worthy of a place in any manual of devotion; fine traits of manhood were embodied in the sayings and doings of our dear brother, and now he is with all the good and great of a long past; and the Lamb which is in the midst of the Throne is leading him to fountains of living water, and God has wiped all tears from his eyes."

The Rev. R. Reeve thus writes: "We were deeply grieved to hear of the departure of Mr. Broadhurst. It must be to him a glorious change and deliverance, for long weary years of pain have been his portion on earth. I knew him only in retirement and suffering, but that suffering was borne with exemplary patience and submission to the Divine Will, and several times after severe attacks, when the pain had subsided, a cheery remark, like a streak of sunshine in cloudy days, would burst forth, as though pain could not destroy the blithe spirit within. I was with him in Birmingham the day that he consulted a famous doctor there as to his condition. The verdict was that he might possibly live three months, and most likely less than that period. That which won my admiration and sympathy was his utter forgetfulness of self, and when in the train he repeated the doctor's words, with anguish in every feature, he looked at me and said: 'Oh, Reeve, what of my poor lad and wife?' We are thankful to know that, through strict attention to medical advice, his sojourn on earth was prolonged much beyond that period.

"He always appreciated beyond its real value any act of kindness which our people did for him to relieve his pain and weakness, but there was a manly independence about him that ever shrank from being a receiver. It was always a greater pleasure to him to give than to receive. He always impressed me as very loyal to his own Church. In circuit matters, all concerns were of interest, and sometimes of anxiety to him. A sense of honour led him to dread deficiencies in revenue, and by precept and example he strove to bring up the members of his class to his view of the situation, and of the sacredness of giving to God's cause.

"Another feature I perceived in him was his respect for old age, his courtesy to old people, and to aged and venerable servants of God. With what admiration and respect I have heard him speak of Mr. Michael Fellows, so recently removed from your midst. The saintly life and the genial spirit of Mr. Fellows often led our brother to speak of him as a glowing example of meek and unobtrusive piety, and ere this we may believe that they have joined hands again on the eternal shore.

"We cannot, would not, call either of them back to the scenes and sorrows of this life, because we believe them to be surrounded with the glories of immortality in the presence of their Saviour and God. Our affliction, however great, our loss however painful, must be swallowed up in the thought of their exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

His death was improved in Cross Street Chapel, by the circuit minister, on Sunday evening, May 2nd, when the choir rendered "Good Night" in a telling manner; and on the same day as the deaths of Mr. Fellows and Mrs. Leeson, of Alveley, were improved.

WILLIAM CLULOW.

MRS. MARY A. S. PRITCHARD.

EARLY in the morning of the last day of the year of grace, 1896, God suddenly called my beloved partner to go up and commence the New Year amidst the glories and felicities of the Heavenly home. On the 13th of October, 1864, the now sainted Rev. Robert Hartley united us in the bonds of holy wedlock in the drawing-room of her father's house, Newtown, Sydney. As soon as the wedding breakfast was over, unsolicited, she sat down to the piano, and in the presence of a large company of assembled guests, sang, accompanying herself,

"Joyfully, joyfully onward we move, Bound for the land of bright spirits above," etc.

Thus, in the very first hour of our wedded life, she gave the key-note, and struck the chords of a bridal song which continued without interruption until she was invited to join the choir in the upper Temple. Brought up in the Wesleyan Sunday School and Church, she was specially privileged in early life. In January, 1864, she was converted in our church at St. Peter's, and from that day until the day of her departure, she was a truly devoted Christian and loyal Primitive Methodist. I do not claim for her an endowment of great gifts, as the world understands greatness; but if patient, uncomplaining endurance in the midst of trial, if a faithful, conscientious perseverance in work for God and His Church be elements of greatness, she possessed these in a pre-eminent degree.

Shortly after our union, we removed to Newcastle, which at that time was a comparatively small mission there, worked by a hired local preacher. Our first Sabbath services were crowned with the salvation of souls, and this revival, begun that day, continued almost uninterruptedly during the nearly six years we remained on that station. Hundreds of souls were saved, and the leading position among the churches in that great coal basin of New South Wales was secured for Primitive Methodism. During those glorious years of blessing the tension on my physical and nervous system was immense. Frequently have I conducted "protracted services" in the out-stations for three and four weeks successively, and six nights, and sometimes seven, each week, I seldom or never got home before eleven o'clock p.m., and often it was midnight or past. But never once did I reach home without meeting a cheerful welcome, kindly inquiry about the progress of the work of God, and suitable provision waiting to strengthen my weary, often exhausted, frame.

In the great coming day, when God will reward our faithful services, what percentage will He accord to a devoted and patient minister's wife? For more than six years she played the organ in our church. In getting up tea meetings and bazaars she was always at the front. When duty detained me from home unexpectedly, I knew that the family altar and society class, which met in our house, were not neglected. She was always ready to "do what she could."

I can truthfully say in all our stations, both in Australia and England, she never once caused me any anxiety, or disturbed the peace of the Church by any unwise word or unkind act. Some may think when reading these lines that I am writing con amore, but I confidently appeal to those who knew her best for a verdict. Compelled through a serious accident to seek superannuation in 1888, we have not been settled until God graciously guided us here in October, 1895. Here we met with a small church of our own, and a nice little society of kind-hearted people. My dear wife at once identified herself with the church, and sought the social as well as the spiritual good of the poor and aged of the congregation. Ten weeks after our arrival, on the last day of the year, she gave a tea to all the poor and aged of the church, numbering seventy-five. On Christmas eve, 1896, the whole of our Sunday School were entertained by her arrangement, and at her expense, in our large kitchens. She had also arranged to give all the poor and aged a substantial tea as on the previous year on the last day of the year. While the children and teachers were enjoying her bounty, she was the prisoner of the terrible disease, influenza, and when the poor and aged should have enjoyed their feast, she was not, for God had taken her. This tea was given a fortnight afterwards.

On the 4th of January her dust was conveyed to the burying-ground connected with the Congregational Church at Finchingsfield, and left to sleep in the shade of a growing tree until the Master shall awaken it, and although at the time I was in the grip of influenza, and consequently unable to follow her dust, thank God I shall meet her in the morning, where there is no influenza.

The Revs. W. Turner, of London, and C. H. Lightfoot, of Braintree, conducted the service at the house and at the grave, at the close of which a large company of sympathising friends joined in singing, "Safe in the arms of Jesus."

On the following Sunday evening, January 10th, the Rev. J. W. White preached a very affecting sermon to a crowded church, on Acts ix., latter part of 36th verse. "This woman was full of good works, and alms-deeds which she did."

At the following Quarterly Meeting, held March 4th, the following resolution was unanimously carried and sent to me by our superintendent: "That we record the death during the past quarter of Mrs. E. C. Pritchard, of Great Bardfield Hall, who during the fifteen months that she resided in Bardfield endeared herself to our hearts and to the hearts of our people, and rendered great service in our Church. That a letter shall be written to the Rev. E. C. Pritchard, expressing our deep sympathy with him and his family in their sorrow.

"(Signed) C. H. LIGHTFOOT."

Born at Lane Cove, Sydney, February 29, 1848, and slept in Jesus at Great Bardfield Hall, Braintree Station, December 31, 1896.

E. COOK PRITCHARD.

RICHARD GLASSBY, of Crowle Wharf, in the Crowle Circuit, was born at Mexbro', in December, 1842. His father was a mason by trade, but of his early years we know almost nothing. He came when in his teens to Crowle Wharf Station as passenger clerk under the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company, in whose service he continued upwards of thirty years, seventeen of which he occupied the responsible position of station-master. In this capacity he became very widely known, and much respected by a large circle of friends. On his retirement he received a life-long pension from the Company, and a valuable testimonial—with a purse of gold—testifying to his many excellent qualities as a public servant, and the esteem in which he was held by all classes in the district.

When our brother came to Crowle, and for some time after, he was without God and without hope in the world, and there are those still living who can recall his frolicsomeness as a youth—one very tangible mark of this tendency he carried with him to his death, very often with not a little inconvenience to himself. His attention was called to the subject of religion by a fellow-workman under interesting circumstances. At that time subscriptions were being collected in aid of Crowle Chapel, and Brother Glassby was asked for a donation. He treated the matter with his accustomed playfulness, but finally consented to give a shilling. This was accepted, and the assurance was given that God would return him sevenfold, and on his own telling, the Lord did so, literally the very same day. This first lesson in Christian liberality served our brother to good purpose in after life, for generous support of the cause of God became one of his chief characteristics. He was induced immediately after the incident recorded to attend a class meeting, with the result that conviction of sin laid hold upon him, and after a night of broken rest, with intervals of earnest prayer, he found peace through believing, in his own bed-room, and on the following morning to him "all things were new," the world without answered to the world within, he was "a new creature" in Christ Jesus. He forthwith joined our society at Crowle, and subsequently identified himself with every forward movement connected with the Church. A better scribe than most of his fellows, he was qualified for offices that he filled with great credit to himself and service to our cause. Sunday School teacher and secretary, seat letter, member of chapel committee, and temperance society, trustee of chapels, local preacher, and circuit steward, include offices to which he was afterwards called.

In 1864 he resolved to join our society at Ealand, the chapel being near the station. The smallness and inconvenience of the old chapel caused him to decide to build a new one a short time afterwards; and on March 6th, 1882, a few members met together to make preliminary arrangements. By many such an undertaking was regarded as utterly impracticable; but mainly through the Christian enterprise and dogged perseverance of Brother Glassby, the premises were built, and are now debtless and valued at £500. Suffice it to say, these premises, comprising chapel and school, with suitable appurtenances, are at once an ornament to the village and an abiding tribute to our brother's memory and worth.

Mr. Glassby also felt his obligation to the world as well as the Church; but of his public offices we need not speak in particular, except to say that at his death he was a member of the Crowle School Board, and a leading spirit in connection with Crowle Wharf Dividend Society, where he will be greatly missed.

That he had his faults and failings those to whom his memory is most sacred would readily and regretfully admit. But we are not of those who regard "the ointment of the apothecary as valueless without the fly which causeth it to stink." We therefore prefer to forget his infirmities, that we may imitate his virtues and exhibit them for the emulation of others. In so doing, we adopt the language of a living author, "We know a man truly when we know him at his greatest and his best."

Brother Glassby's last illness was brief and painful. Two weeks before his death he took a chill by temporary exposure. Influenza set in, immediately followed by jaundice and other alarming complications. The writer took an early opportunity of inquiring as to his spiritual state with the result that from first to last he expressed simple and unwavering trust in the merits of Jesus Christ. The best medical skill and the best nursing were secured, but in vain, and after the lapse of the time named, although earlier a lease might have been taken of his life, he breathed his last in the presence of his sorrow-stricken family early on Sunday morning, May 9th, 1897, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was twice married, and leaves behind one daughter and two sons to mourn his loss.

Literary Notices.

On God's Lines; and Other Stories. By RAMSAY GUTHRIE. (3s. 6d.) Christian Commonwealth Publishing Co., Ltd., 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

It is not difficult to locate Blackerton, where the scene of the stories told in Ramsay Guthrie's book is laid. The writer of the present notice knows the district well, and can vouch for the essential truthfulness of the delineations of human life and character here given. He thinks he has met with some of the very characters who live and breathe in the pages of "On God's Lines," or, at any rate, with some who were so much like them as to be, in the vernacular phrase, "their very spit and marrow."

Blackerton itself is not a pretty or prepossessing place. The scenery around is lovely enough, and there are many spots of historic interest not far away. But Blackerton, with its monotonous rows and pit heaps, and the usual accompaniments of mine and furnace and forge, is somewhat depressing. Ramsay Guthrie does not trouble himself much about scenery or the romantic stories of the past. There are no word-pictures of sunsets or landscapes. It is the human interest he finds in Blackerton that absorbs him, and he writes of what he has found in a direct and business-like way, as though his only concern were to communicate without loss of time what he has seen and felt. The style of writing is configured to the author's purpose. The sentences are short and clear. There are no digressions, circumlocutions, or lingerings by the way; no mere verbiage; every word tells.

Another thing should be said. Those who do not know the miners of the North, and, still more, those who have a superficial acquaintance with them and their modes of life, may fancy that they are pictures in far too roseate hues. Well; had Ramsay Guthrie been a Zola with an eye for the foul and the repulsive, he might have found material enough and to spare in Blackerton and its neighbourhood. In a colliery village you have the sharpest contrasts. In the same row the dog-man, the drinker, the gambler may live hard by the chapel-man, whose home, when you get within, you find to be the picture of cleanliness and comfort, in striking contrast to the abode of the dog-man aforesaid. Now, Ramsay Guthrie has not entitled his book, "On the Devil's Lines," but "On God's Lines." He has selected his material, and chosen to show us the humane, the nobler, the religious aspects of life as lived in a Durham mining centre; and who shall say that he is not right in so selecting his material, and that his limnings are not according to truth? Some of the truest, finest men and women it has ever been our privilege to know were working miners, and their wives and daughters, of the very district Ramsay Guthrie has made his own, and we are free to confess that as we read these stories of quiet heroism, independence and self-sacrifice, we felt our eye moisten:

See Priam! aye, praise waits on worth
E'en in this corner of the earth;
E'en here the tear of pity springs,
And hearts are touched by human things.

We cannot close this notice without expressing the gratification we feel in knowing that the pen-name "Ramsay Guthrie" but thinly veils the identity of one of our own ministers. We believe that this is his first published book, and by it he has achieved even more than a succès d'estime. Good as this book is, Ramsay Guthrie will, we believe, do still better work in the near future.

The Temperance Problem and Social Reform.
By JOSEPH ROWNTREE and ARTHUR SHERWELL.
(6s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS book will prove a valuable addition to the library of the temperance advocate and social reformer. In regard to many questions on which it is very desirable to have well-tested and reliable information, it will supply the facts desired. Amongst the questions dealt with in the valuable first chapter, are such as these: What is the per capita consumption of alcohol in this country? How does this stand related to the consumption in former years, and to the amount consumed in other lands? What proportion of the national drink bill of 150 millions belongs to the working classes? What is their average weekly family expenditure upon drink? And what relation does this drink expenditure bear to the average family earnings? The fallacy as to the serious diminution of the revenue which it is alleged would follow from a decrease in the drinking habits of the country is also very conclusively dealt with. Succeeding chapters are occupied with "The Social and Political Menace;" "Prohibition;" "State Monopoly and High Licence;" "The Company System in Sweden and Norway;" and "The Solution of the Problem." A number of most valuable appendices complete the work, which also contains useful maps and diagrams. The authors are to be congratulated on the eminently reasonable tone in which they have discussed weighty problems, as well as on the mass of carefully sifted and digested facts they have brought together. All may not agree with their suggestions or conclusions, but all must thank them for the information supplied, and admit that their conjoint work has resulted in a statesmanlike production. We learn as we write this notice, that Mr. W. P. Hartley has determined to supply each Primitive Methodist minister with a copy of Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's book forthwith. It is a wise and kindly resolve, like others which have preceded it. We rejoice to know that by this generous act such a mine of information and repertory of arguments will be put into the hands of all our brethren.

The Rajah's Daughter. By BESSIE MARCHANT.
(1s. 6d.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

A WELL told tale with a carefully worked out plot. There is no padding in this story, every page contains fresh matter of interest which helps on the plot.

The characters are well and clearly drawn, though not overdrawn. The scene of the story is laid partly in Borneo, and partly in England. In the Borneo parts we find the most interest, partly because of the glamour of romance there, and because we meet there with Song, the Rajah's daughter, a thorough child of nature. To appreciate Song's many-sided, but noble character, her sad life, and her passionate devotion to the man Poyntz, the young English naturalist, who dies of consumption there, the book must be read. Song stands in strong contrast to Hester Dayrell, the practical, self-reliant and lovable English girl, whose destiny was so curiously connected with that of the Rajah's daughter. We refrain from disclosing the plot, though it is somewhat of a temptation to do so, we should not like to spoil the reader's enjoyment of the story.

Bessie Marchant, or as her friends know her, Mrs. Comfort, is no stranger to readers of our Magazines, some of her stories having appeared in their pages in serial form.

Yesterday Framed in To-day. By PANSY, (Isabella M. Alden). (2s. 6d.) Charles H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

PANSY prefaces her present story with a brief explanation of her theme. In this explanation she says: "I have taken this present time, with its railroads and telegraphs and phonographs and electric lights and what not, and lifted into it from out the historic past a central figure. The central figure of all time; the One without whose coming we would not even have counted time as we now do—the Man Christ Jesus. I have conceived of Him as walking the streets of our modern cities and villages, meeting the people of to-day—people who dress and act and think in the New Testament era, yet have knowledge only of the Old. I have imagined people coming in contact with this central Light as it shone on earth centuries ago, and treating it in the same spirit that men and women treated it then; the spirit in which undoubtedly very many would receive Him now, were He to come again in the same humble, local way."

As a story the author, of course, frankly admits it to be impossible. The narrative partakes more of the nature of a supernatural hypothesis. She supposes the impossible to happen—that is, that Christ instead of having made our civilisation what it is, makes His first appearance on earth at the present day, healing the sick, raising the dead, and performing the same miracles which He did while upon earth.

"Pansy" is a favourite writer of ours, and her stories are usually marked by vraisemblance; but we frankly admit that this story in its strange setting does not "find" or convince us.

St. Mary's Convent. By JEANIE S. DAMMAST.
(1s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

A DARK picture of life in an Irish convent. Captain Seward, the father of the heroine, has become, while in Spain, a convert to the Romish Church. He conceives a strong desire that his daughter may embrace what he now considers the true religion. To gain this end she is taken to a convent in Ireland, where she is forced to take the veil, though at heart still a Protestant.

This book certainly shows the Church of Rome in its very darkest colours. The Lady Superior's inward depravity is only exceeded by her outward loveliness; the priests are all scheming and crafty, though all is done under the cloak of religion.

Many dramatic incidents are related before the heroine is finally delivered from her thralldom by the gentleman of her choice, and takes up the thread of her life again as the wife of a Protestant minister.

The Connexional Outlook.

By THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

DISTRICT MEETINGS, 1899.

—The District Meetings for 1899 have completed their work, and collected and forwarded to the General Committee all returns and information required by the Conference. Each district in the Connexion possesses a large measure of Home Rule, and decides finally the most of what affects it locally, the Conference simply giving a formal sanction to what has been done. All executive Committees with their respective officers, and the various representatives on the Connexional Committees are appointed by the District Meeting. Questions affecting the general condition of the districts are settled locally, except in special cases requiring the attention and consideration of the Superior Court, such, for instance, as cases of aggravated chapel difficulty, and the lengthened stations of Ministers, and even in this latter case the Conference very rarely disturbs what the District Meeting has settled. All questions affecting the Connexion generally, as a matter of course, go on to Conference accompanied with such expressions of judgment as the District Meetings may deem prudent. The tendency for some years past has been to render so far as possible the decisions of each district in relation to its own affairs final, a very prudent course, and one which makes for peace and progress.

—In years past the main interest of the District Meetings centred in the stationing of the ministers, for these meetings had the appointment of the ministers entirely in their power unfettered by any previous arrangements. An old friend of ours used to say that there were only other two classes who were treated in this fashion, and had no say as to where they were to go—soldiers and slaves. This can be said no longer, and, in fact, could not be said for some years past. Ministers and stations are now at liberty to make mutual arrangements, and it requires some very special circumstances to set these arrangements aside. In the District Meetings that have just been held, not a single invitation has been disturbed, nor will the Stationing Committee at Conference venture to meddle with any save for very grave reason. Brethren, therefore, who have accepted invitations confidently anticipate that the arrangements they have made will duly take effect.

—One of the most exciting, and perhaps interesting items on the agenda of a District Meeting is the election of delegates to Conference. Most stations are, of course, anxious to secure for one of their officials this honourable appointment, and as only a certain number can be elected, the interest and excitement sometimes run very high. In some cases at the recent District Meetings a considerable part of two sessions was devoted to this particular business, as each election had to be by a majority of the full meeting, and it happened again and again in the voting that no candidate had a majority of the votes cast. It has been rumoured—but let us hope it is not true—that the practice of canvassing for votes is somewhat extensively adopted, and rumour says, too, that even in Conference itself this practice is resorted to when appointments have to be made to official positions, and that it even reaches to appointment to the Presidential Chair. But then rumour has a loose tongue, and it is better to conclude that rumour is baseless than to think for a moment that any brethren would introduce the doubtful political method of canvassing for the purpose of filling a position that if gained at all should be gained by personal worth and the merit of service.

—The public services connected with the District Meetings are of a varied character, and embrace Temperance Meetings, Open-air services, and processions and public meetings of a general character at which the speakers select their own topics. In some districts a meeting for the consideration of pressing social questions, or an Endeavour Rally, or a meeting for the special purpose of deepening the spiritual life of the churches was held at the recent May Meetings, and it, of course, goes without saying that camp-meetings were well in evidence; as were also meetings for the ordination of ministers completing probation. It would be singular if a District Meeting was held without any meeting for the advocacy of Temperance. The Connexion has been so long at the front, and is so definitely pronounced on this question, that to omit the Temperance Meeting would come as a surprise. There is, however, no fear of anything of this kind happening. And at the recent District Meetings no uncertain sound was given on this question. The Connexion stands committed to Local Veto, Sunday Closing, and in fact to any measure by which the demoralising agency of the drink traffic can be crippled. At a considerable number of the District Meetings early morning services were held, at which the attendance was generally very good, and one chapel of considerable size we know was well filled at half-past six in the morning of May 7th to hear the preacher appointed. We offer gratuitously the advice that if the Committee arranging for a District Meeting, wishes to have the early morning service well attended, then appoint a preacher the people all desire to hear. That will invariably bring a good congregation.

—The Sabbath services appear to have been very effective. The weather was generally ideal, and as a consequence the people gathered in great numbers. The addresses in the streets and on the camp-grounds were characterised by plainness, pithiness, and force. The preachers, true to the traditions of their church, declared with unction and power a free, full, and present salvation, and not in vain, for in connection with several of the District Meetings, many sought and found the Lord before the Sabbath-day closed. In some places, but not many, the Camp Meeting was dispensed with, and the principal services held in the churches, but in all cases open-air services were conducted at suitable times, and in localities where they were likely to do the most good. We note that from the following District Meetings come the welcome news of conversions more or less numerous—Tunstall, Manchester, Brinkworth and Swindon, Leeds and York, London Second, North British, Bradford and Halifax, and Shrewsbury. All the other districts in their reports speak of powerful services, and of their confidence that much good was done.

—The North British District Meeting, held in the town of Motherwell, was preceded by a week of special prayer on the part of the church in that place. A meeting was held each night, at which the church gathered to pray for special blessing upon the District Meeting, and to this the remarkable spiritual power which rested upon the meetings and business sessions from first to last was unquestionably due. These preparatory prayer meetings were well attended, and the people claimed in earnest, definite pleading, full of simple, trustful faith, the presence and power of God, and the Lord hearkened and heard, and answered by seasons of refreshing that have rendered the District Meeting for ever memorable to those who attended it. This is an example that might be followed with much profit. What times of power and grace our District Meetings might be if the churches in the stations where they are held, and the churches of a district generally, preceded them by a week of special prayer, pleading definitely and trustfully for a gracious fulfilment of the Master's words: "Where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them." What means of grace might the District Meetings then become!

—The reports of Sunday School work in the districts, with the exception of Devon and Cornwall, are generally favourable and are couched in much the same language. "The Sunday Schools in the district were found to be in a prosperous condition." This is the general report with very little variation. In only one district, Nottingham, have we met with any report in detail. In this district there is an increase of two schools and nine teachers, but a decrease of 162 scholars. There is an increase in the number of scholars who are members, both above and under fourteen years of age; but there is a decrease of seven Bands of Hope and of ten adult Temperance Societies in the district. Special attention was called to these decreases, and the stations in which they had occurred were earnestly requested to give increased attention to work among the young.

—The Chapel Reports from the various districts afford evidence of a steady and prudent extension and an encouraging reduction of debt. Both are matters for congratulation. The following tabulation will afford some idea of the work done in this direction:—

—It is pleasing to note that in all the districts a proportion of the ministers are remaining upon their stations beyond the traditional three years. Some, we observe, are remaining for a term requiring two figures to state it. This we regard with much satisfaction, for it indicates a growing goodwill between ministers and people and a diminution of that desire for change which formerly prevailed, as well as a growing efficiency in the ministry. It is a tendency that cannot fail to contribute to the stability and strength of the churches, and to increase their influence in the respective neighbourhoods in which they are situated. The frequent interruption of ministerial labour is by no means desirable in Church life. A station of from four to seven years will give a minister a fair opportunity of doing good service if he has any mettle in him.

—Twelve brethren are applying for superannuation from ten different districts. Rev. S. J. Wallis, Nottingham District; Revs. G. Clark and W. Robson, Sunderland and Newcastle District; Rev. W. Durance, London First District; Rev. W. Wray, London Second District; Rev. R. B. Howcroft, Liverpool District; Revs. S. Brock and T. Campey, Sheffield District; Rev. J. Jackson, Darlington and Stockton District; Rev. R. Betts, Lynn and Cambridge District; Rev. A. Glegg, Shrewsbury District; and Rev. J. Taylor (1), Missions District. Only one of these brethren is under sixty years of age, and one has reached the threescore and ten. Five of them have travelled just under forty years, and seven of them forty and upwards. Sympathetic resolutions were passed by the District Meetings in sending on the applications to the Conference.

—Some thirty-eight candidates for the ministry are reported from the various District Meetings, all of whom have been recommended for the work. Possibly this number may be exceeded, as it is very likely that in some cases no report has been published. The number, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is as stated.

—According to the Conference Minutes of 1898, twenty-seven ministers have this year completed the fourth year of probation. Of this number we have information of twenty-one who have passed the necessary examinations with credit, and will be placed on the Approved List at the Conference as the recommendations of the District Meetings in these cases are invariably accepted. One, Rev. W. Chapman, is in Central Africa, and though not named in the report of the Missions District Meeting will, we presume, be placed upon the Approved List, as his examination will have been arranged for in some other way. The names of the other four do not for some reason or other appear. In one case, of which we happen to have some information, illness is the cause, and possibly a like cause may have been operative in the other cases.

--The membership of the Home Districts, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is given in the following tabulated form. The South Wales District received 120 members from the Missions District with Pembroke Dock, so that though the district shows an increase of 99, it has really a decrease of 21. The Bristol District gave 1,916 members to the new Devon and Cornwall District, so though it has a nominal decrease of 1,889, it has really an increase of 27. The Missions District gave to South Wales District 120 members with Pembroke Dock, and 561 with several stations to the Devon and Cornwall District, so that though it has a nominal decrease of 723, yet it has an increase of 42. The new Devon and Cornwall District, which was formed by the last Conference from the Bristol District and the Missions District, received 1,916 from the former district and 561 from the latter district, making a total of 2,477, this year reports 2,419, which though it appears as a nominal increase, yet this new district has a decrease of 58. This district, it may be remarked, has suffered much owing to the depression in the Cornish mining districts, but as there is some hope of industrial improvement in that part of the country, we may anticipate numerical progress in the future.

—As changes will take place in three Connexional offices at the approaching Conference, and vice-officers will have to be appointed, several of the districts sent up names of persons deemed competent to take these positions and discharge the duties of them:—

—This list must not be regarded as exhaustive, as districts in the published reports of which no names appear may probably have made nominations, and of course the Conference can add to the number of district nominations if it be its pleasure to do so.

—The Conference is to be asked to divide the following stations: Burton-on-Trent First, in the Nottingham District; Croydon, Gravesend, Chatham, and Brighton, in the London Second District; Sheffield Fifth, Sheffield District; Spennymoor, in the Darlington and Stockton District. Some of these cases will need the most careful consideration, as the wisdom of division is not by any means apparent.

—It would be a singular circumstance in the history of the Connexion if no legislative proposals were forwarded by the stations to the District Meeting, with a view to gain acceptance there, and be forwarded to Conference. This year will form no exception. Legislation was introduced into the Tunstall District Meeting on the removal of local preachers to other stations, but was not adopted. The Nottingham Meeting was requested to consider legislation on the election of delegates to District Meeting, and did so with the result that it rejected it. The Manchester Meeting was asked to send on to Conference legislation on the constitution of Christian Endeavour Societies with a view to harmonise the Connexional and International movement, and eventually decided to recommend the Conference to harmonise the active members' pledge with the international pledge, but to retain the Connexional Associates' pledge as at present. The Brinkworth and Swindon Meeting sends up legislation providing to raise the minimum salary for ministers to £25 per quarter on the ground of justice to ministers and the disadvantage at which the poorer stations are placed in securing such ministers as they desire. The North British District forwards legislation relating in some form or other to "Connexional Auditors." The Liverpool District Meeting adopted legislation relative to the formation of a District Chapel Extension and Aid Fund, and asks the Conference to sanction it. The Bradford and Halifax had three separate legislative proposals under consideration. The Bradford First Station presented a proposal to give P.S.A. Societies representation in Quarterly Meetings. This was rejected on the ground of informality. The Building Committee proposed to curtail the chapel yearly schedule, and the District Committee presented proposals relative to the best way of preserving a permanent register of church members, and credentialling members from one station to another. The proposals from these Committees were adopted with some amendment, and sent on to Conference. There will probably be legislation from the College Committee on the extension of the College term, and the examination of probationers. The Conference, so far as published reports show, is not likely to be over-burdened with legislation.

—Various public questions were discussed at many of the District Meetings, such as—Seven Days Journalism; Lawlessness in the Established Church; the Peace Conference; the Cantonment System in India; the Licensing Question; and the Closing of Public-Houses on the Sabbath. Resolutions favourable to the purpose and work of the Peace Conference were passed; but resolutions on the other questions were invariably condemnatory, and some of them very much so. There is great need for the representative Assemblies of the Connexion to speak out on questions affecting the moral and spiritual welfare of the people. There has, perhaps, been too much reticence in the past, and it is refreshing to find that the Connexion is finding its voice on these and other great public questions touching the welfare of the Commonwealth, and taking steps to make its presence and influence felt as a power working for righteousness.

—In all the District Meetings the utmost harmony prevailed, and the delegates appear to have vied with each other in promoting such measures as would be likely to advance the Connexional interests, not only in each particular District, but throughout the Connexion generally. Some of the meetings were remarkable for the manifestations of spiritual power and influence experienced, and all gave more or less promise of a forward movement in our Connexional life, so that we look to the future with much hope, anticipating a year of progress.

* * *

—In preparing this summary of the District Meetings we have been greatly indebted to the excellent reports published in the Primitive Methodist World, all of which, with one exception, owing to the enterprise of the editor, appeared within two days after the Meetings closed.

The Wider Outlook.

—The Church Discipline Bill was thrown out by the Commons when it came on for second reading. It was only limited in its scope, and this limitation Mr. Balfour made one of his main grounds in opposing it. It simply proposed to deal with ceremonial, with the exception of the use of the word "Mass," its provisions related to the use of incense, vestments, etc. It, however, provided for the abolition of the Bishop's veto, and proposed to give to any two persons who had resided in a diocese for a year, the power to lay an accusation against any clergyman who indulged in the prohibited ceremonies. Cases arising under the Act were to be tried by a lay judge, assisted by the bishop, or one of his officials, and instead of imprisonment, an offending clergyman might be temporarily inhibited for a first offence, and for persistent disobedience, deprived of his benefice. The decision of the judge had to be carried into effect by the bishop within seven days, whether he approved of it or not. However, the House refused to give the Bill a second reading. The debate was remarkable for a speech by Lord Hugh Cecil, Lord Salisbury's second son, who contended for a free and established Church, though how to combine these two features he did not attempt to show. They are utter incompatibilities. If the Church is established by law, it must be subject to the law by which this position is given to it, but Lord Hugh Cecil wants the Church to have the position with all its prestige and emoluments without any of the obligations connected therewith. An impossible thing. A Free Church untrammelled by connection with the State can only be realised through disestablishment, and if Lord Hugh had said, "I, and those acting with me, want a free, self-governing church, and if we cannot have it along with establishment, then we will have it without," we could have understood him. It may be very distasteful for the Episcopal Church to be governed by men of all creeds and no creed at all, but that is the price of establishment, and if it is not relished, the way out is to relinquish the State connection altogether. The Government secured the defeat of the Bill by introducing an amendment to the effect that if the efforts now being made by the Archbishops and Bishops to secure the obedience of the clergy are not speedily effectual, further legislation will be required to maintain the observance of the existing laws of the Church and the realm. The Government are thus committed to future legislation if the so-called court set up at the Lambeth Palace proves worthless, as is not at all unlikely, for it possesses no executive power, and the clergy will pay no more attention to it than they have paid to other efforts of the prelates, unless the threat of the Government respecting legislation in the near future has some effect upon them.

—It is sometimes asserted that the persecuting spirit of Romanism has been exorcised by the progress of enlightened civilisation, and that Rome would not persecute those of another faith as in centuries past. This is a mistaken view. Rome is the same in spirit, and shows it where its manifestation is possible. There is no change in Rome, the same spirit still prevails, though in certain places other forces contribute to repress it. It is barely fifty years since the authorities in Madeira, influenced by the priests, crushed a growing Protestantism by the harshest measures imaginable. It was forbidden to supply fuel, bread, or any other necessary of life to those who accepted the Protestant faith, and one woman, at least, was condemned to death because she refused to do homage to the consecrated wafer. This was no sixteenth century transaction, but took place midway in the present century. But there is no necessity to go back to the fifties to ascertain the real spirit of Romanism. What is happening on the Continent at present reveals it. Recently, in parts of the Austrian Empire and in Germany, there has been a remarkable movement away from Rome. A similar movement has more or less prevailed in France, and in all cases, so far as Rome can, the methods of persecution have been employed. Of course, the old methods of the Inquisition—the rack, the boot, the thumb-screw, and other similar appliances cannot be requisitioned, but other methods, animated by the same spirit, have been put in force. The movement has been ridiculed, and, that not proving effective, other measures have been introduced in Austria. Parents who have left the Romish Church have been reminded that their children, till they reach the age of fourteen, must be educated in the doctrines of the Church, and in some cases where parents have ignored this law, action has been taken against them. Committees have been formed for the purpose of espionage, so that all suspected persons might be closely watched, and report made concerning them. The Custom House officials on the frontier have received instruction to look out sharply for any travellers with Protestant literature as part of their luggage, and the officials in the districts where the movement away from Rome prevails have been warned to take no part, in any way whatever, in this Protestant movement, nor to afford it any countenance. Any official who fails to regard this warning becomes a marked man. A list of the names of the persons who have left the Romish Church has been published, and they are held up to the scorn and reprobation of the faithful, since every good Romanist is taught to consider such persons as among the vilest of mankind. The spirit that breathes in all these measures is the same as dealt out to our fathers in this land sterner treatment, and that would resort to the sterner treatment again were it not for repressing forces active in modern civilisation. The spirit of Romanism is the same, but the conditions of modern life prevent the use of the severe measures of earlier centuries.

—The tercentenary of the birth of Oliver Cromwell has been celebrated this year. Three centuries have passed before this man, in many respects the greatest of our race, has received anything approaching a national recognition. We say approaching a national recognition, for a considerable section of the nation and a certain section of the press took no part in the celebration. Enjoying the advantages which this man, under God, secured for this nation—for if ever man was sent of God Oliver Cromwell was—they have neither the generosity nor the justice to recognise the debt they owe to him. The England of to-day is due to this man. Without him it would have been impossible. He shattered the divine right of kings, and set up in its place the divine right of the people, and though his work was left incomplete and sadly marred by subsequent folly, yet the ideas he rooted in the national life could not be uprooted, and they have developed into the free and vigorous life of to-day, and will develop into a freer and more vigorous national life in the years to come. Cromwell lives in the life of this nation as no other ruler does that it has ever had. His name stands for everything that is noblest and best in our national life. It was meet that the Free Churches of the land, the depositories of Cromwellian traditions, should celebrate his birth, and recognise the great gift that God gave to this land in him. A simple country yeoman till he was forty years of age, he ranks as one of the greatest generals of all time, though he was never trained in the art of war; as one of the ablest statesmen this or any other country has seen, though he had reached middle life before he took any part in politics; as one of the noblest rulers a nation ever had, though he had had no training or practice in methods of government. Surely he was a God-sent man. Profoundly religious, a man to whom God was ever present, a man of faith and prayer, possessed by ideas of liberty and equality far beyond his times, not without faults, but of many excellences, he is a man of whom the nation may well be proud. It is no credit to us that we have been so long in understanding and appreciating this man. Not a statue of him did any city in the land possess till a few years ago a public-spirited citizen of Manchester erected one to his memory, and had it placed upon a rough granite pedestal. Characteristic this as it stands in one of the busiest thoroughfares of the Lancashire city. The day of indifference is past. The nation is awakening, and no longer will this greatest of Englishmen be relegated to the shade of a cold neglect. His time has come at last, and religious bigotry and sycophantic loyalty can no longer obscure his memory. He now stands forth as the man who, of all others, made this England of ours free and powerful among the nations of the earth, and the place which is his of right can no longer be denied to him.

—The May Meetings have again run their course, and the Metropolis has been visited by the representatives of various religious bodies and philanthropic societies. The Baptist Churches have suffered the loss of the President elect, the Rev. Dr. Spurgeon, but a popular substitute was found in Dr. Clifford, than whom no man is more highly esteemed by the Free Churches. This denomination has had a prosperous year, and reports an increase of fifty churches and over 16,000 admissions to Church fellowship, and an increase to the Church membership of over 8,000. The funds of the denomination are generally in a healthy condition. The Missionary income is over £2,000 in advance of last year, and is gradually working up to the £100,000 upon which the managers of the Missionary Society have set their hearts.

—At the Methodist Free Church Missionary Meeting a report of progress in the various mission fields occupied by the Society was given. The report from China was specially pleasing, and the account of the work and success of the medical mission very interesting. It was recognised that the development of native agency was the road to increased success, and to this special attention is being given. The income for the year was £14,028, and the expenditure £13,666.

* * *

—In the Presbyterian Synod over 300 congregations were represented. The Moderator, Dr. Moinet, called attention to the Anglo-Catholic revival, and expressed the opinion that if the Church had to contend successfully against the perils that threatened it, great prominence would have to be given to the sacrifice of Christ as the sole ground of forgiveness; the priesthood of Christ; and the indwelling Presence of Christ in ourselves individually and in the Church. Cheering reports of the work at home and abroad were presented. Five ministers were set apart to labour as evangelists for several weeks in the Northumberland Presbytery, and a proposal to employ a minister fully in evangelistic work was remitted to a committee for further consideration.

—The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Anniversary this year is considered to have been among the best and most successful yet held. The attendance at the various meetings was large and enthusiastic, and the speeches fresh and interesting. An increase was reported throughout the mission field in almost every department of work. Throughout the entire Asiatic field, where the most ancient and highly organised forms of heathenism exist, there is general progress, and many openings present themselves in India and Central China. The regular income of the Society for the year has been £130,533, which is £1,100 more than last year, and £4,807 in advance of three years ago. The membership on the foreign missions is 46,262, with 11,619 on trial.

—The Bible Christian Missionary meeting was quite a success; the attendance was larger than in previous years, indicating an increased interest in the missionary work of the Connexion. An encouraging advance was reported in the income of the Society, though it did not quite reach £9,000. An excellent account was given of the way in which the money was expended, especially by a missionary from China, who gave a very interesting account of the work in Yunan, and particularly of the conversion of the first native teacher there. The membership on the mission stations at home and abroad is 11,325, an increase for the year of 200.

—The anniversary meetings of the Church Missionary Society following so closely upon the recent centenary celebration, were not so largely attended as usual. There was, however, no lack of encouragement in the various reports presented. A hundred years ago the Society began its work, and during that time it has sent out over 2,000 missionaries, not counting their wives. During the past year the adult converts received into the Church by baptism from Paganism and Mahomedanism numbered 6,829. The receipts for the year, apart from the Centenary Fund, amounted to £315,126, and the expenditure to £325,223, leaving a deficiency of £30,110. But this deficiency will be more than covered by the Centenary Fund. The Society occupies 496 stations, and employs upon them 413 ordained missionaries, 128 lay agents, 273 lady missionaries, in addition to 314 wives of the missionaries, a total European agency of 1,118. In addition to these, the Society employs 303 native clergy and 5,700 native lay teachers. The native Christian adherents, including Catechumens, number 245,709, and the native communicants 65,387. The Society sustains 2,107 schools, in which 86,798 scholars receive instruction.

—At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the large Exeter Hall was well filled. The report afforded abundant evidence of the work done by this excellent Society. The agents employed number 725, and more than a million and a half of copies of the Scriptures have been distributed by them in various parts of the world. It is interesting to know that during the last twelve months 30,000 copies of the Scriptures have been sent to Cochin China. The Society employs 552 native Christian Bible-women in the East. The entire issue of Bibles and portions of the Book reached the enormous number of 4,479,000, the largest issue yet in any one year. By this Society the Scriptures are circulated in almost every known language, and translations and revisions are now in progress in 100 different languages, upon which well nigh 1,000 scholars are at work. Last year the Society realised by sales £88,211, and by other income £131,755. The expenditure was £224,736, leaving a deficiency on the year of £4,769. A translation of the Scriptures is in progress for the Philippine Islands, to which free access may now be had since they have passed from under the rule of Spain.

* * *

—The work of the London Missionary Society has steadily progressed during the past year, but the income is still insufficient to meet the expenditure. For the twelve months just ended the treasurer had received £155,677, but the expenditure had been £162,240, showing a deficit of £6,563. Urgent requests are being made for the Society to extend the sphere of labour in Southern India and in China, but the difficulty in the way of doing this is the lack of funds. The Society, however, is in a much better position financially than it was a few years ago. In 1885 the income was £101,103. It is now above £50,000 beyond that.

REV. GEORGE EDWIN BUTT.

Rev. George Edwin Butt.

HE Rev. G. E. Butt was born at Motcombe, in Dorsetshire, on March 19th, 1841. From a religious point of view he had a good start. His father was a man of deep convictions, unbending principles, blameless character, and withal, a thorough Primitive Methodist. His mother was a kind and gentle Christian woman, whose chief concern was to train up her family in the fear and admonition of the Lord. Under the influences of his Christian home the boy grew up to love and serve Christ, and during a great revival of religion that swept over the Motcombe Circuit he made his public confession of faith, and joined the society at Gillingham. From the first he was an active member. His talents and zeal immediately found scope in the Sabbath School and in the Band of Hope. The Church soon found that he had unquestionable talents for public speaking, and when but a boy his name appeared on the plan as a local preacher. At the end of 1861 he was called to the work of the regular ministry, and pledged by the Witney Circuit at the following Conference.

His stations in England were Witney, Aylesbury, Salisbury, Banbury (twice), Highworth, Oxford, Reading and Grayshott Road, London. During his first term at Banbury we had the privilege of being his junior colleague, and of living with him in the same house for two years. At that time a friendship was formed between us which has lasted till the present moment. It has been our lot, too, to be his successor on two different circuits, so that we have had ample opportunity of judging of his character and work. Knowing him as thoroughly as we do, it is a great joy to us to be able to say that Mr. Butt is a true man, a faithful friend, a thorough Christian gentleman, an earnest student and an able minister of the New Testament. Often have we sat spell-bound as we have listened to his keen analysis of texts, his clear exposition of his subjects, his play of wit and humour and pathos, his unlimping eloquence, his convincing arguments, all blended with a fine evangelical fervour. No wonder he was popular on all his home stations, and that upon some of them he witnessed very gracious revivals of the work of God.

As a foreign missionary, however, Mr. Butt is best known to the Connexion. On the return of the Rev. John Smith from Aliwal North, South Africa, the General Missionary Committee requested Mr. Butt to succeed him on that important station. At that time the Committee had under consideration the establishment of a Technical School for the training of young native Christians; and knowing the technical training that Mr. Butt had received in his early days, together with his other qualifications, they were anxious to secure his services. His eldest son, George Henry, had previously gone out to this station as a missionary schoolmaster. This fact, no doubt, had some weight in the decision to which he came, for after careful thought and prayer, he decided to accept the invitation of the Committee. The whole history of the mission since his arrival there proves how wise and providential his decision was. He at once set himself to work to establish the Technical School. Before starting it, however, he, with characteristic prudence, visited all the kindred schools of other Churches that were within his reach. He was especially attracted towards the French Mission in Basutoland. Here he found three schools at work for the higher education of the natives; the Normal School, to train teachers; the Bible School, to train evangelists; the Industrial School, to teach trades. It occurred to him that it would be well to unite these three sections in one school. The Aliwal School, therefore, was founded on that broad basis. It is unique in its character, there being no other in the country like it. The school was started eight years ago with four pupils. There are now twenty-seven, and already twenty have finished their education and are serving the Church; eleven as teaching evangelists, and nine as lay workers. The youths or their friends pay a fee of £6 a year towards their food, as they are boarders; their education they get free, and this is given by Mr. Butt and his son, in addition to their ministerial work. Mr. Butt, jun., takes the work of the standards, and Mr. Butt, sen., gives them Bible and Industrial instruction, and takes the general oversight. This school has been examined each year by the Government Inspector, and not a young man has failed to pass the standard in which he has been presented. Two of them, James and John, took the Government Elementary (equal to the Oxford and Cambridge Junior), and both passed; one in the second class and the other in the third class.

It is gratifying to know that seven of the students, last December, passed the Government Examination for qualified teachers. But the supply of teachers does not cover the whole ground of need on the mission. To train young men as teachers only, would render it necessary to train other young men as evangelists only. Hence the Bible section of the Training School, and Mr. Butt's endeavour to train the students for both kinds of work. They are thus able to teach a school during the week, and to preach on the Sabbath. This is found to be the cheapest and most effective mode of working; and then from the most useful and devoted of these the native ministry can be drawn. That great care is taken to well ground them in a knowledge of the Scriptures is evident from the Inspector's report.

The Rev. D. D. Fraser, Inspector of Schools, says:—"This day I inspected the Primitive Methodist Training Institution at Aliwal North. The results of the inspection in the elements of ordinary education will be found in my report to the Education Department. Religious instruction does not fall within the lines of my official duty. I am, however, at liberty to inspect it if invited to do so. At the request of the Rev. G. E. Butt, I examined these lads in Bible history (especially the life of David). The examination touched on Biblical geography, antiquities, and collateral subjects. The six boys who had been at school during the whole of the past year made a really good appearance, the others did fairly. While conducting the examination I could not but call to mind the time when, as a Sunday scholar in Scotland, I used to contribute to missions in Africa. The Primitive Methodist Sunday Schools in Eng'and must be of a very high class if their senior pupils in villages can do as well as these lads. Certainly, in that case, they must be quite equal to the best schools I met with in Scotland. It is but fair to say that a practical turn is here given to the instruction. An attempt is made to reach the heart as well as the head. This is my third, and will be my last inspection of this institution. It is a pleasure to be able to report on its work as in a very high state of efficiency."

The first care is to teach them self-help. They prepare their own food, mend and wash their clothes, clean their rooms, and do all that is necessary to enable them to live as good Christians. All this, as education, is more important than it seems. In their heathen state the women have to do all the work, except looking after the cattle, and it is only as they are brought to understand the dignity of all useful labour that they are prepared to treat their women with proper respect. They are also taught gardening, including grafting, planting and pruning of fruit trees, the cultivation of all the various kinds of vegetables which can be grown in the country, and also to grow corn. The chief feature, however, of the Industrial section is the carpenter's shop. This work is a source of great saving to the mission. Since the school was commenced the students have done all the carpentry and painting of three native churches and the new Training School. Already this school has sent two well-trained teaching evangelists to the Zambesi, and others are ready and waiting to start on the return of Mr. Baldwin.

But all this does not exhaust the amount of educational work carried on by Mr. Butt. He has in addition to this, six elementary schools in which nearly four hundred children are taught by properly trained native teachers.

It is most gratifying to know that, while so much attention has been devoted to this branch of the work, the general work of the mission has greatly developed. It is now ten years last March since Mr. Butt went to Africa, and a comparison of the following figures will show how greatly God has blessed his work. In 1888 there were 310 members, now there are 1,044, showing an increase of 734. But this does not represent the total results of his success. The mission has lost during that time 1,818 members through removals and other causes, 1,168 of whom have been credentialed to other churches in the country, while only 243 have been received by credentials. This shows that the additions to the roll by their own labour have been 2,309, about one-third of which have been gathered from heathendom. During the same period, Mr. Butt has built seven new churches, enlarged three, built two new mission houses, the new Training School, with workshop for ten benches, dormitory and necessary offices for the students, and greatly improved Christ Church, (Aliwal North). The total cost of all this has been £4,030; towards this sum the General Missionary Committee has given £803, and the remaining £3,227 have been raised on the spot. Besides this, £5,660 have been raised by Mr. Butt for the support and extension of the general work of the mission. Ten years ago three ministers and one teaching evangelist were employed; now, four ministers, one lady teacher and seven teaching evangelists are employed; four of whom have been trained in our own school. From these facts it will be seen that Mr. Butt is one of the most successful missionaries that the Connexion has ever sent forth. His work in Africa is a great joy to him—for he is a born missionary, but alas! his joy has not been unmixed with sorrow. Soon after his return to Africa after his recent visit to this country, his dear wife was stricken down by death, and lies in an African grave. We cannot refrain from saying how highly we esteemed her true womanly virtues, her unostentatious piety, her ungrudging labours in the cause of Christ. She was a true helpmeet to her husband—a model missionary's wife. She is gone, but her memory lives and is blessed. It must be a consolation to Mr. Butt in his bereavement to have the presence of his eldest son with him as a co-worker on the mission field, and to know that his youngest son, whom he left behind in this country, is a local preacher with us and a partner in the firm of our Connexional lawyers. Long may the devoted missionary live to labour for his Master, and more and more may he rejoice in the prosperity of his work.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE OPINIONS OF THOSE IN HIGH PLACES.

THE news which Lady Neville communicated to Alizon and Rutland was to the effect that Monsignor Lindley and the Bishop of Tolisco had consented to dine with her on the following evening, and that she hoped Rutland would also accept her hospitality. Duncan accepted at once. For one thing, he was still under Alizon's spell, and was glad of any excuse to be in her company, while for another, he wanted to converse with these Church prelates. Hitherto he had conversed only with the generals of various orders, the heads of great missionary organisations, and the presidents of colleges. These men, while fully informed concerning their own particular departments of work, were utterly ignorant of the thoughts and feelings of the common people who thronged all around them. Some of them seemed to know a great deal of the life of India, and of the South Sea Islands, but they knew nothing of the government, municipal and Imperial, of Italy. Indeed, the Catholic priest is not generally a well-informed man. His sympathies are insular, and his knowledge is generally limited to his own department of work. Rutland hoped, therefore, that in meeting with Monsignor Lindley and the Bishop of Tolisco he should be able to learn something of the secular side of the Church-work in Italy. He had learnt that vast changes had taken place in Rome since 1870, and he wanted to know how these Church dignitaries regarded these changes. Lady Neville's invitation gave him the opportunity he desired, and he looked forward with much eagerness towards the next evening.

After lunch the young man went on to the Pincia alone, while Alizon sat with her mother.

"I have great hopes of to-morrow night," said her ladyship. "Indeed, I made the arrangement for Mr. Rutland's benefit."

Alizon was silent.

"You see," Lady Neville continued, "Mr. Rutland's Protestant prejudices were stronger than we had imagined. Even Father Ritzoom admitted this when he visited us at the Priory a few weeks ago. As you know, it was through his wish that we decided to stay in Rome rather than in Cannes or Nice, or Monte Carlo. He builds a great deal on his conversion, and believes that when it takes place it will begin a movement which will affect the whole district of Lynford. The seeds of truth have been sown, and we must do all in our power to see that they bring forth fruit."

Alizon still continued silent. For the first time in her life she had a secret from her mother. Up to the present she had not told her of Rutland's confession, and while she longed to take her into her confidence, something forbade her doing so. On several occasions she had opened her lips to speak, but a weight had seemed to be placed on them, and she had said nothing. Sometimes she was afraid she was not acting quite honourably, and still she continued to hide her secret in her heart, and to brood over it in silence. Moreover, the fact that Rutland loved her became more and more pleasant. She was sure that she could never think of returning the love while he remained a heretic, nevertheless she was glad he loved her. During his illness, it was at her instigation that constant inquiries were sent from the Priory concerning his welfare, and no one knew of the sleepless hours she had spent while the young minister lay close to the portals of death.

When Lady Neville had expressed the desire to go to Rome, Alison had gladly consented, and now that she was in the Eternal City, its interest was increased to her because Rutland stayed at the same hotel.

"Are Monsignor Lindley and the Bishop of Tolisco clever men?" she asked presently.

"They are among the ablest men in Rome," was the reply, "and I am sure they will have a very beneficial influence upon our young friend."

"Do you think he will ever be converted, mother?"

"Oh, I have no doubt now! I am practically certain that his illness was caused by studying the differences between the Catholic and the Protestant faith, and the mental anxiety which such a study entailed. In his delirium he often talked about the unity of our Church, and such like matters."

"Is it fair to retail such things?" asked the girl rather indignantly.

"It was common talk," remarked her ladyship. "It is true he said nothing during his unconscious hours that could be fastened upon, but there is little doubt that his illness was owing to his great anxiety concerning religion."

Alison heaved a sigh of relief. She had often wondered whether he had at any time mentioned her name during his fever-stricken days, and had longed to inquire. But she had reflected that in a town like Lynford, where all kinds of gossip was eagerly fastened upon, had he spoken of her she would certainly have heard of it. She felt sure, moreover, that she knew more concerning the real cause of his illness than anyone else, and because of it she had often prayed for his recovery. She did not feel any love for him, but if he had died she was sure that his love for her would have been the main cause of his death.

"The fact of his coming to Rome shows the drift of his mind," added her ladyship.

"Yes," said Alison, remembering the conversation they had had together as they walked through the woods near the Priory.

"And so, for his own sake, and for the sake of our faith, we must do what we can that the good seed may bear fruit," continued Lady Neville. "I verily believe it would mean a new Reformation in Lynford. Was he impressed with the service at St. Peter's this morning?"

"Yes, he was much impressed," replied Alison, keeping her eyes on the floor.

"Of course, many doubts will naturally remain in his mind, but these, I hope, will be dispelled to-morrow night."

"Does Monsignor Lindley and the Bishop of Tolisco know—that is, are they aware of—how matters stand?" stammered Alison.

"Nothing in particular. I simply spoke of him as a possible convert."

Rutland saw neither Lady Neville nor Alison any more that day, and during the whole of Monday Alison remained with her mother, so that when night drew near the young man's heart beat rapidly at the thought of meeting her at dinner.

About seven o'clock Duncan met Alison in one of the corridors.

"I was just wondering about you," she said kindly. "Mother expected you an hour ago. Both our other guests have arrived. Are you ready to come? I see you have dressed for dinner."

"Yes," replied Duncan. "If I adopted clerical attire it would save me much trouble; but being somewhat of a radical in that direction, I have to go through the ordeal of putting on these things every night."

They walked along the corridor together till they came to Lady Neville's apartments, and immediately afterwards Rutland was introduced to the two Roman dignitaries.

Monsignor Lindley was a tall, corpulent man, fair of face, and florid. His features were of Irish cast, and he still retained, although he had lived thirty years in Italy, a slight Irish accent. He was a man of great influence in Rome, and occupied positions of trust in several of the important organisations peculiar to the Papacy. He spoke with apparent frankness, and impressed Rutland with his bonhomie demeanour. Dr. Rizzoni, the Bishop of Tolisco, presented a marked contrast to his companion. He was a little man, and looked almost shrivelled as he stood by Monsignor Lindley's side. His skin was dark and like parchment. His mouth was somewhat sunken, his nose was large, his brows were overhanging, making his eyes, which were really large, appear small. Nevertheless, it was the man's eyes which really impressed one. They were coal-black, and had a quick, restless movement. He spoke English, but not fluently, he often hesitated for a word, and seemed impatient because he could not express his thoughts easily. Dr. Rizzoni was a member of the Congregation of the Index, and was especially severe on any cleric who should give expression to thoughts which in the slightest degree suggested liberality. He was the deadly enemy of the new movement in America, called Americanism, and fought with great vehemence against any modification either in the doctrine or ritual of the Church. Moreover, he hated the Italian Government with a deadly hatred. He held that Mazzini was a blaspheming atheist, an enemy to God and man; while Garibaldi was a bloodthirsty cut-throat who deserved and undoubtedly suffered the torments of the lost. It was said, moreover, that he would not pay the slightest homage to the king, regarding him as a usurper, living in a house which rightfully belonged to the Pope. Possibly Monsignor Lindley was as ardent a Catholic as Dr. Rizzoni, but he expressed himself more pleasantly, laughed more heartily, and was not averse to the good things of this life. The Irishman was a man of the people; but Dr. Rizzoni came from an old Italian family, and held to the aristocratic ideas of the country.

Both greeted Rutland kindly; Monsignor Lindley shook his hand with great heartiness, while the other watched him furtively. Both seemed to expect that the young man would pay them some homage, and were evidently surprised at his greeting them as one man is in the habit of greeting another in England. They sat down to dinner without speaking.

While the waiters hovered around them, the conversation was general, but when they had gone, and cigars and coffee had been brought, they spoke freely on subjects near their hearts. Dr. Rizzoni did not smoke; instead, he helped himself liberally from his snuff-box, and seemed to enjoy himself thoroughly. Presently, moreover, both seemed to forget that Rutland was a Protestant, and spoke without reserve on Church questions, especially on that which went by the name of Americanism.

"Of course," Monsignor Lindley remarked, "this American question is a difficult one. It is a new country and the people are imbued with new ideas. We must not forget, moreover, that there is a tremendous leakage in that country. Had all the emigrants to America remained true to the faith we should have thirty millions of adherents instead of ten millions. That is a sad state of things, and I trust the Holy Father will look at the question from a liberal standpoint."

"It must not be," said the other, "it must not be. Every concession ends in calamity. Directly the Church deviates one hair's breadth from the lines she has marked out, she lessens her power. The Church knows nothing of countries. Her laws are eternal. I hope the Holy Father will remain firm."

"But still there have been periods when she would have acted wisely if she had considered national prejudices," said the Irishman.

"Pardon me, I do not think so. The Church is Divine, and because it is Divine it is unchangeable. America must be governed entirely from Rome, even as the rest of the Church must be."

"And yet see what we have lost by being unyielding," replied Monsignor Lindley. "Think of Italy."

"Italy will learn wisdom in time," was the other's response. "There have been many periods in the history of the world when the Church has lost power, but God has raised up a man who has destroyed error and the results of evil counsel. Think of the condition of the Church before the coming of Hildebrand. And yet during his Pontificate he changed the thought and life of Christendom. I pray God that when Leo XIII. dies another such a man may rise—one who shall rule with a strong hand, and teach the heretic nations the laws of God. I tell you we must have no compromise."

"Do you think Cardinal Vampasia would meet your wishes?"

"Too much sympathy with the French," was the reply. "The Spaniards and the Austrians would veto him immediately. Besides, he has so-called liberal ideas, and they are of the devil."

"Then what do you think of Lostella?"

"Weak, weak. He plays with the king. A time-server too. He has no policy, no clear, definite ideas of the work of the Church."

"Then what do you say of Fowver?"

"A Frenchman, and no Frenchman must be Pope. The Papal chair belongs to an Italian. I shall do my utmost to fight against such."

"For my own part, I favour Lostella," cried Monsignor Lindley, "and shall do my utmost for him."

"No, no," cried Dr. Rizzoni, "it will not do. He pretends to be liberal; favours education, and speaks of the power of knowledge. See what education has done for Italy."

"But is not the condition of Italy the result of the policy of the Church in the past?"

"No, no," cried Dr. Rizzoni impatiently. "The mad rampant atheism of Italy is the result of that foul thing called the education of the people. It is the outcome, too, of the devil incarnate in the shape of Freemasonry. What right has the peasant to knowledge? What good can it do him? From the time when Voltaire began to pour out blasphemy under the guise of a plea for education, knowledge among the people has only meant unbelief, discontent, disobedience, anarchy. The Church has always known best how to treat the people. It has taught them to obey the Church, and that is enough for them to learn."

Perhaps Lady Neville had scarcely furthered her purposes in bringing these two men together. Report had it that Monsignor Lindley's professed liberalism was to Rizzoni like the proverbial red rag to a bull. It is possible, too, that although neither had taken but a moderate quantity of wine during dinner, they had just drunk enough to unloose their tongues. Rutland, who never took wine, listened with keen interest, but with a cool head. Alison followed the conversation with intense eagerness; Lady Neville looked rather uncomfortable.

"Is Atheism so very strong in Italy?" asked Rutland.

"Strong, strong?" cried Rizzoni. "The country is riddled with it. The Italian parliament is atheistic, the press is atheistic, indeed, the secular life of the nation is bitterly antagonistic to the Church. If an atheistic paper criticises the Church it is quoted in Parliament, if a Church paper criticises the Government it is suppressed. The State robs us, throws stones at us, harms us all it can."

"But how has this bitter antagonism been aroused?" asked Rutland. "In Italy the Church has had Imperial as well as spiritual dominion. How has religion lost ground to such an extent?"

"Godless education," cried Rizzoni. "It began in France, and the wave reached us. Worldly knowledge made Italians proud. Italians wanted to form a great nation. Then Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, and the rest of them fed the childish vanity of the people, and led them to oppose the will of the Church. The bloodhounds of lies were unloosed, open rebellion against the Holy Father became the order of the day, and truth was left to lie bleeding on the ground."

"But truth is stronger than lies," suggested Rutland.

"Eventually it will be," cried Rizzoni. "Only there must be no tampering with it. The Church must not yield an inch in her demands—not an inch. She is the voice of God, and must have absolute dominion. All this playing with the secular government, all this hobnobbing with worldly power is of the devil. Italy belongs to the Church, to rule as she thinks fit, and the Church must act accordingly."

"But can you resist education?" cried Rutland. "Is not knowledge the heritage of the people?"

"What does it do for the people? The truth is, men of the world fail to distinguish between true and false prosperity. You will doubtless say that knowledge leads to commercial greatness; I say that commercial greatness is nothing when compared with the advancement of religion. What is wanted to save the world is not knowledge, not wealth; it is faith and obedience."

"But what if reason rejects faith?" asks Rutland.

"Reason has nothing to do with religion," cried the old man. "Religion belongs to another realm of life. The matter is absolutely plain. Here is the Church, the will of God on earth, established by Christ Himself. He gave the keys to St. Peter and his successors for ever. Men must not reason with God. The Church demands faith and obedience, and nothing else will satisfy her. Reason has no right to advance her claim if it touches even the outskirts of the Citadel of St. Peter. The reason of the world has meant rebellion, always meant it. It was so back in the time of Arius; it was true of Huss, and of that Antichrist, Luther. It was true of Calvin, of Knox, and all the rest of them. No, no; the Church knows what is best; and it is the duty of all Christians to believe and obey the Church without hesitation."

"Still the Church is ever kind to her wandering children," said Monsignor Lindley. "It offers them a gracious welcome."

"Yes, but they must come back humbly penitent," said the old Bishop. "They must promise implicit obedience, they must denounce all error whatsoever."

"Then you contend that the Church is absolute truth: that it represents the will of God?" said Rutland.

"Doubtless."

"But can men find truth except through reason? Is not reason the medium through which God teaches His children?"

"Not unless that reason is in entire subjection to God and to the Church. The Church must be, in reality, all powerful."

"And yet you say Italy is leaving you; that every section of its life is riddled with atheism. In Protestant England aggressive atheism is dead."

"That fact is a mere bubble on the wave. We have nothing to do with success or failure. We simply stand by the Church of God. By and by she will have her power back, by and by she will not only rule over two or three states in Italy, but over the whole country."

"And when her power does come back," asked Rutland, "what will you do then? How will you treat atheism and heresy?"

"Deal with it?" said the old Italian, whose eyes flashed fire; "it will be put down with a strong hand."

Rutland ceased asking questions; but he listened to the conversation which continued mainly between the two priests. He followed the arguments expressive of the semi-liberalism of the Irishman with interest, and his heart grew hard at the stern ultramontaniam of the Italian. Monsignor Lindley, aided by Lady Neville, presented the milder aspects of the Church life. He spoke of the Pope as liberal, almost socialist in his ideas, and spoke of his endeavours to establish Christian truth everywhere. On the other hand, Dr. Rizzoni presented the sterner aspects of the Papal policy, of its unflinching attitude under every circumstance.

To the young man the evening proved an education on many subjects. He was enabled to see not only the inwardness of these men's natures, and their ideas, but also to get a glimpse of Italian life. He saw that the Church was at war with the State, while the great mass of the young life of Italy was growing indifferent, if not antagonistic, to the ideals of the Church. Reading between the lines, too, he saw that the life of the Vatican was riddled with plot and intrigue, and that while the priests of the Church were coerced into apparent unity, one part of them battled against the other.

Although neither of these men said so in so many words, he could not help gathering from their conversation that many occupying high positions were anxiously waiting for the old Pope's death, and that hundreds of hungry priests in the city were eagerly looking forward for the crumbs which might fall from the rich man's table, when the new Pope should be elected. Even while Leo XIII. was alive, cardinals were busy canvassing for votes, each seeking to outbid the other for popularity. Monsignor Lindley seemed to regard this state of things as natural and right, while Dr.

Rizzoni was terribly severe in his condemnation of what he regarded as a worldly policy.

In the midst of their conversation a messenger was announced, who brought letters for both the prelates, and Rutland noticed from the expression on their faces that the news they contained were of the utmost importance.

CHAPTER XXIII.

WITHIN THE VATICAN.

ON the face of Monsignor Lindley was a look of pleasant expectancy, while Dr. Rizzoni seemed much disturbed.

"The Holy Father is ill," said the former, "he may not live through the night."

"Indeed," said Lady Neville, "I trust this sad occurrence will not oblige you to shorten your stay here."

"Oh no," replied Monsignor Lindley, taking another cigar and lighting it, "there will be a gathering at the Vatican to-morrow, but not before."

"If the Holy Father should die," went on Lady Neville, "the question of the future Pope will be settled very soon."

"May God give us all wisdom," said Dr. Rizzoni. "It is an anxious time for us all. It is true that the power of the Holy Father belongs to the office he holds, and not to the man himself; all the same, we are very anxious that he who is chosen of God shall sit in St. Peter's chair."

"But does not the election of the Pope depend entirely on the Council of Cardinals?" asked Rutland. "If so, what has the feelings of others to do with the matter?"

"Ostensibly it depends on the Council you mention, my dear sir," replied Monsignor Lindley, in a tone of importance; "but the Cardinals dare not act contrary to the expressed wish of many who may not have a seat in that Council."

Rutland could not help smiling at the implication contained in Monsignor Lindley's words, but the Bishop of Tolisco spoke no word. His face was set and hard, he looked steadily on the floor as though he were thinking deeply.

"Sometimes the election of a Pope has its humorous side," went on Monsignor Lindley. "Why, it is a matter of history that on one occasion the Council of Cardinals met, and when the question as to who should be the next Pope was discussed, one cardinal got up, he was called Cardinal Vespi I think, and said, 'Well, if you want a Pope who will be popular with the people, doubtless Cardinal Homo is the man; if you want a man who is deeply pious, Cardinal Santa is the man; but if you want a good all-round, sensible fellow, you can't do better than choose me.' And he was chosen too," laughed the Irishman.

"Wasn't there some peculiar circumstance connected with the election of the present Pope?" asked Rutland.

"Oh yes, several, several. No doubt Providence directed the matter, but his election seemed to depend on chance. You know that the representatives of Catholic countries such as Spain and Austria have the power of veto. Well, the representative from Austria was instructed to veto the election of him who is now Leo XIII. But by a strange coincidence he did not reach Rome in time. He was taken ill at Bologna, and had to stay there until it was too late for him to do any harm."

"The Pope seems a man with great will force," remarked Rutland.

"Will power! He has done what no other Pope dared to do. No sooner was he elected than he destroyed hundreds of offices which were sinecures, but which had existed for hundreds of years. Then at the election of a Pope the custom is for one of those in attendance to place the tiara of the newly selected pontiff on his head, while he takes off the Cardinal's cap which he has been wearing, and gives it to the one who has given him the tiara. This act from time immemorial meant that the man was made Cardinal. But Leo XIII. on his election, took a different course. He didn't give his cap to the man who had placed the tiara on his head. Instead he put it in his pocket, and the other is not a Cardinal to this day."

Again Monsignor Lindley laughed pleasantly, while Dr. Rizzoni continued to look thoughtfully on the floor.

"Is the Pope dangerously ill?" asked Lady Neville.

"Yes, dangerously ill," replied Dr. Rizzoni. "Of course, he may get over it. He has a wonderful constitution, and can overcome almost anything. Still it is an anxious time. He is fast verging on ninety, and cannot live long. I pray that we may be guided to elect the right man. We need one at this time who will move the world. Another Gregory would do it."

"But I thought the Council could not elect the wrong man," said Rutland. "I thought your belief was that the Holy Spirit guided the Cardinals to elect the right man. If that is so, what need is there for anxiety?"

"You do not understand, you do not understand," said the old Bishop testily. "It is impossible that you should. The right man would change everything. He would bow the neck of the secular Government, he would hearten the whole world; but the wrong man, a man like Lostella, would let the Church drift on the rocks of material power. He would allow liberal ideas to creep in; he would concede this, and concede that, until our power would be gone."

"I do not agree with you," said Monsignor Lindley, "he is a stronger and a wiser man than you think."

Dr. Rizzoni's eyes flashed angrily. "Strong, wise!" he cried, "why, think of his attitude in relation to the Index. When I felt it my duty to bring forward the case of Schmidt, that German heretic, who, in a land steeped with heresy, taught liberal ideas to his students, and was publishing books that meant the right of individual judgment in religious matters, what did he do? He pleaded that he should be allowed to go on, and that he should not be called upon to withdraw his books. What could be worse? His action, moreover, made Schmidt bold, and for a long time he held out. Indeed, he did not yield until I made him feel that the Congregation was in earnest."

"Of course, that was a bad case," said Monsignor Lindley; "but he learnt wisdom by that affair."

"Then the Index is still in force?" said Rutland.

"In force!" cried the old Bishop, "how can it be otherwise? How could we check error else? Why, if the power of the Index were abolished we should have free-thought in the Church, we should have men daring to set up their opinions against the teaching of the Holy See. We have far too much liberalism already. Men in countries like England are allowed a freedom which can end in no good. No, no, when any man seeks to touch the doctrine of the Church he must be stopped."

"And yet it is a dead letter in most countries," said Rutland.

"That is because the law of the Church is not the law of the people."

"But what would you have?" asked Rutland. "How do you think books ought to be treated?"

"The Index should be the most far-reaching force in the world," replied the Bishop. "If the Church were all-powerful there would be placed in every great centre priests whose sole work would be to examine books submitted for publication, so that nothing should be given to the world of which the Church did not approve. In this way we should stamp out heresy at its fountain-head. All scientific books which threw a doubt on doctrine, all novels which disturbed the mind, all volumes which taught morals other than those of the Catholic faith would be burnt in unquenchable fire."

"But what effect would this have on the mental and moral condition of the nations?"

"Effect! Doubt would cease to be. There would be one fold, and one Shepherd. Nothing would be taught but the truth of God; the Church would be supreme in every realm of life."

"Would you also have it that every law passed in the legislative assemblies be submitted to the Church?"

"Is not this the will of God?" cried the old Bishop. "The Church represents God on earth. It is infallible on all matters of faith and doctrine, therefore when that time comes, as it surely will come, the world will be governed by God through the Church."

The old man rose to his feet, and his eyes burnt like coals of fire. "This is the Church's hope, the Church's ideal," he cried. "Think of it! The world governed from St. Peter's! the world ruled by the Church of Christ, while all the forces of life, material, intellectual, moral, are used as she dictates! That is why we cannot allow compromise, that is why the Church must at all times, and under all circumstances, make her own conditions. We can no more make terms with men, or institutions, or nations, than God can. Why, think of it! Gladstone, that arch-heretic, who calls himself a High Churchman, wanted the Holy Father to recognise Anglican orders! But it could not be. It rejoiced me that Leo was firm. He saw as we all see, that the English Church is heretical. Every Anglican clergyman is nothing more than a layman, and all of them blaspheme every time they pretend to fill holy offices."

In spite of himself, Rutland could not help being impressed by the old Bishop's unflinching ultramontaniam. He saw, too, that if his conception of the Church were true, he stood upon safe ground. But was the Church an organisation such as he had conceived it? Did the Catholic Church as an organisation express the will of God?

A dozen questions rose to his lips, and he scarcely knew which to put first. He looked towards Alison and saw that she was watching him eagerly. For the moment she was carried away by the stern old Bishop's words, and she wondered what effect they would have upon the young minister.

"It ill becomes me, perhaps, to argue with you," he said, "but do you mean to say that none but those who can accept the doctrines of your Church belong to the Church of Christ?"

"Not really, how can they?"

"Then you do not believe that the true Church overleaps the bounds of all organisations, that it is the Spirit of Christ permeating society?"

"Such a statement is so much wind," cried the Bishop angrily. "The true Church must be visible, it must be united, and it must be the Church of which St. Peter was the first Pope. Without those conditions you cannot have authority, or infallibility. Without that you have merely a rope of sand. There is but one true Church, and all outside it are heretics, and the one true Church is the Holy Catholic Infallible Church."

"If that is so," cried Rutland, "how is it that those states in Italy which were governed from the Vatican, and over which the Pope had temporal as well as spiritual power, were the worst governed in Italy? And how is it that these same states were the most ignorant, the most immoral, and the most degraded in the land?"

"Those are but the lies of Protestant historians," replied the old Bishop.

"Believe me, I am asking these questions seriously," went on the young man. "They interest me more than you can think; and on the solution of these difficulties my life's happiness seems to depend. I am not carping. I have read the history of this country, written by Catholic historians, and they practically agree with the writings of Protestants concerning these same matters. Your ideas concerning one visible and universal church governing all the life of the world according to the will of God are beautiful; but then one has to look at facts. If the Catholic Church rules as God rules, how is it that Catholic countries are lowest in the scale of civilisation? Here in Italy you are miles behind England in all that makes for righteousness. I admire beyond words your stupendous organisations for converting the world, only here in Italy, the home of your Church, you are drifting to Atheism and to ruin; while the forces which seem to be putting forth efforts to save the nation, are those which are under the ban of the Vatican."

"But, my young friend," said Monsignor Lindley, "you are confounding material prosperity with real prosperity. The only real prosperity is the advancement of faith and religion."

"Yes, but the faith and religion which does not express itself in holy life is surely false."

"True, quite true," cried the Bishop, "and what holier lives can be found in the world than those which have been nurtured by the faith, the fostering care of the Church? Think of her saints, think of that innumerable host which have lived, and are living, the life of God in the world."

"I gladly recognise them," said Rutland, "and the same could be said concerning Protestant Churches; but I am thinking of its general effect on the general life. I will not enlarge on the terrible condition of Spain, which is perhaps the most Catholic country in the world; but I am thinking of England. There you number about one in sixteen of the population, and yet the Catholics supply one in four of the criminals of the country."

For a moment the two priests were silent; then Monsignor Lindley said, "You are sure of that?"

"They are the figures of the Government officials," replied Rutland.

"And what then?" cried the inflexible Bishop. "These statements are simply suggested by Protestant heresy. We have to think not of time, but of eternity. We have to deal with the great facts of the Church as our blessed Lord taught them. 'He that believeth and is baptised, shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned.' No amount of morality will save men from hell, but the humble acceptance of, and unquestioning obedience to, the laws and doctrines of the Church."

"Our Lord also said at the close of His Sermon on the Mount, that those who heard His sayings and did them, He would liken to those who built their house upon a rock, but those who did them not were like those who built on the sand."

"That is true, and the sayings of our blessed Lord are expressed in the doctrines of the Church. All other interpretations of those words are of the devil," cried the Bishop. "It all lies here, young man. Salvation for eternity lies in the Church, damnation remains for those who stay outside. It is for all of us to remember this, and obey. All reasonings about such matters are futile, they are of the devil, we must believe and obey. I am glad you have come to Rome. Study the Church well, see her as she really is, and may God give you light."

The two priests prepared to leave, and Lady Neville rose to accompany them to the door; but Alizon sat like one stunned. She had scarcely spoken for the night, and yet she had not missed a word that had been said. Often she had looked towards Rutland with longing, wondering eyes, as though she would read his innermost thoughts. The conversation, Catholic though she was, had in many respects been a revelation to her. In England the disposition towards Protestants was far more charitable and liberal than here in Rome, while the unflinching ultramontaniam of Dr. Rizoni was almost unheard of. In England, moreover, the plea was that Roman Catholicism was reasonable, while here reason seemed to be lightly regarded.

Rutland did not stay long after Lady Neville had bidden her visitors "good night." With a wondering look in his eyes he sought his room, and for many hours he lay thinking over what had been said through the night, and wondering what the future would bring forth. When morning came, and he found his way into the dining-room, both Lady Neville and Alizon met him with a bright smile.

"And what is your programme for to-day, Mr. Rutland?" asked Lady Neville.

"I have arranged to meet Father Matthew," replied Rutland. "He has promised to take me through the Vatican. He knows the history of many of the most famous pictures there, and I am anticipating a pleasant time. Wouldn't you like to accompany us, Lady Neville?" he added, "I shall be delighted if you will."

"I should like to do so very much; but I have arranged to make some calls to-day; I dare say, however, that Alizon will be glad to accept your offer."

And so it was arranged, although Alizon's presence gave the young man almost as much pain as pleasure. To be in her society had, if possible, made his love more ardent. He felt sure that Lady Neville knew nothing of the passion which consumed him, and thus he appeared to himself as one who acted a double part. And yet he knew not what to do. To avoid her society would seem ungracious, especially in the light of all the kindness they had shown him. Besides, he felt utterly weak in Alizon's presence, and so while he felt that his love was hopeless, he yielded to the influences which bound him more closely to her.

The Vatican proved to be a scene of constant wonder to them. The Sistine Chapel, decorated by the hand of Michael Angelo, the magnificent statuary, the wondrous frescoes, aroused their admiration beyond expression.

"As far as the decorative arts are concerned, the English seem but as ignorant children compared with these Italians," said Rutland.

Father Matthew smiled complacently, but Alizon said nothing, she seemed to be thinking deeply. Presently they came to a picture before which they stood a long time. It is the work of a modern artist, and was painted to commemorate the declaration of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. It is a fresco, perhaps from twenty to thirty feet long, and nearly as many high. It is very largely symbolical, but its meaning is very evident. When Rutland looked at it at first, he could not believe his senses, but after Father Matthew's explanation he could no longer doubt. The lower part of the picture represents Pope Pius IX. standing with arms outstretched, while all around him are the princes of the Church. At the extreme right some angels are represented as holding the Cross, from which a shaft of light shines and rests on the head of the Pope, illuminating his mind while he enunciates the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. Above the Pope three colossal figures are portrayed. On the right hand sits Christ, and the centre is the Virgin Mary, whose snowy feet stand on a globe representing the earth; on the left sits God the Father, who holds the world in His hand. The three figures are of equal size, and each is represented as having equal authority. Each has a halo around the head, and each forms a part of the Godhead. Above the head of the Virgin Mary, however, is the figure of a dove, representing the Holy Spirit. The picture from the artist's standpoint is magnificent, from the standpoint of a believer in the New Testament it is a piece of blasphemy. The representation of God as a man with a long beard suggests a ghastly caricature, while the revelation of Mary as equal with God made Rutland gasp.

"Is it not fine, is it not magnificent?" cried Father Matthew.

"But what does it mean?" cried Alizon.

"It represents our Blessed Lady as Queen of Heaven and Ruler of the world. Can't you see her snow-white feet stand upon the earth as its ruler, while above her are innumerable angels proclaiming her as Queen of Heaven. Do you know," went on the priest, "that the day on which the dogma was declared was dark and gloomy, but at the very moment the Holy Father declared it as the doctrine of the Church, the sun shone. The Pope regarded this as the smile of heaven sealing his words."

"And this picture was painted by the order of the Pope?" asked Rutland.

"Oh yes; and he was much pleased with it. Look at the Latin inscription underneath. It tells how Pius IX. solemnly proclaimed the doctrine."

"And he accepts this picture as a true representation of the doctrine."

"Oh yes."

Rutland did not speak again concerning the picture; indeed, throughout the rest of the day he was almost silent. The picture seemed to have impressed him greatly.

When they reached the hotel in the evening, however, all thoughts of the day's sights were for the moment driven from his mind. The news reached him that Lady Neville had been taken seriously ill.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE BAMBINO.

RUTLAND did not see Alizon for some hours after their return. No sooner did she hear of the dread news than she rushed to her mother's room, and nothing would induce her to leave the bedside. It appeared that just after lunch Lady Neville had been seized with severe pains, while her blood suddenly rose to fever heat. Every endeavour had been made to find Alizon, but in vain. No one knew what part of the city she was visiting, and as Lady Neville had become delirious she could give no information. The nearest doctor had been sent for, who had shaken his head gravely, and suggested that he consulted immediately with an English doctor who resided in Rome. The two physicians were holding a consultation when Alizon arrived. They agreed concerning a prescription, and left about nine o'clock, saying they would call again in the morning, but that if her ladyship was taken worse through the night they were to be immediately sent for.

About midnight her ladyship appeared to become quieter, and dropped into a fitful sleep, and it was not until then that Alizon left the room. When she got into the corridor she saw Rutland walking up and down, and with a grateful heart she went towards him. As far as she knew he was the only friend she had in the city, and this fact drew her more closely to him.

"I think mother is a little better," she cried.

"I am very glad," replied the young man.

"Have you seen the doctors?"

"Yes, I saw them as they came out."

"Did you speak to them?"

"Yes, I asked them a good many questions."

"And what did they say?"

"Oh, I judged that they regarded the matter hopefully, but they seemed very reticent. They always are, you know."

"Are they? I know so little of doctors. But, but you think mother will get better, don't you?"

"I hope so, I trust so," said Rutland. "I have been praying for you, Miss Alizon, and if I can render any service, you will not hesitate to ask me, will you?"

"Oh, thank you. You—you are the only one I could ask in Rome. Mother has friends here; but I do not know them. But it is late. Ought you not to go to bed?"

"I could not sleep if I went. I have stayed here in the corridor hoping that I might be able to help you."

"Have you? I am very glad. I know it is selfish of me; but then I am all alone, and it is helpful to think I have a friend."

"I shall always be that, Miss Alizon, whatever happens."

Tears started to the girl's eyes. "Will you?" she said. "Yes, I am sure you will," she added.

"And to show that I am your friend, I ask you to go to bed. You ought for your mother's sake."

"But I could not, Mr. Rutland. I must go back by her side. The nurses are all right I dare say. One is from a convent. She is a very good woman; but she makes me think mother will die."

"Why?"

"Oh, she is always turning up her eyes and praying. She is constantly telling me to send for a priest, too. Do you think I ought, Mr. Rutland?"

"At any rate, one would do no harm," replied the young man. "Her ladyship will very likely be conscious by morning, and the presence of a good man might comfort her."

"Sister Mary says she knows such a holy priest, a Franciscan, and she tells me that his prayers have wrought wondrous cures."

"The prayers of a good man must do good," replied Duncan. "But the doctors will be here early in the morning, you can ask them."

"Yes, I will; but I must go back now, and you ought to go to bed. You have only just recovered from an illness yourself, you know."

"No, I shall not go to bed; but I will lie down on a sofa in your drawing-room if you will let me. I shall be near you then, and ready to render you any service if you need me."

"Oh you are kind!" said the girl, "good night."

"Good night, and remember that God is good. Nothing happens by chance. He never makes a mistake."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, I am sure. I shall be praying for you."

"OH, I AM AFRAID SHE IS GOING TO DIE!"

The girl went back to her mother's room. In spite of her anxiety she felt better for her talk with Rutland. True, he was not a Catholic; but she felt sure that his prayers would help her. He was calm and strong too, and this helped her. She was glad, too, that he was close by. His nearness comforted her. She looked at her mother, and saw that she slept heavily, while the two nurses stood near. One, a nun, prayed audibly, and counted her beads.

At eight o'clock in the morning, the doctors came and held another consultation. Just as they were leaving Rutland spoke to them.

"How do you find her ladyship?" he asked.

"She is very ill," was the reply.

"Worse?"

"No, we should think she is rather better."

"You think she will recover?"

"Oh yes, I should say so," replied the English doctor. "In about thirty hours from now the fever will leave her, and then she will get better. But in all such cases the fever must run its course."

"I think her daughter would like her to see a priest. I suppose there is no objection to that?"

The Italian doctor smiled scornfully. Like most of the scientific men of Italy he was an Atheist. "Let her by all means," he said flip-pantly, "it can do no harm. We shall cure her and the priest will get the credit."

"Pardon me, are you in any way related to Lady Neville?" asked the English doctor.

"No; but I knew them in England, and they regard me as a friend."

"Nothing more, I suppose? I do not ask because of mere curiosity."

"No, nothing more."

"You have no influence with Miss Neville."

"No, none in particular."

"I am sorry for that, because—but are you a Catholic?"

"No, I am not a Catholic."

"Ah, I am, that is if I am anything; but do your best to persuade Miss Neville to see to it that her ladyship is not frightened."

"What do you mean?"

"One of these nurses is a nun. I have spoken with her, but some of these women lose their heads. Try and impress upon Miss Neville the absolute necessity that her ladyship shall not be excited."

"Yes, I will do my best."

"Of course, the fever may leave her a few hours before I said, and when it does, anything like fear would do her incalculable harm."

"I understand."

"That is well." The two doctors left the room together.

"The Pope is better this morning," said the Italian.

"I suppose so. Wonderful old man, isn't he?"

"Yes, he has a constitution like nails. I suppose he attributes his recovery to the intervention of the Virgin Mary?" and the Italian doctor laughed derisively.

"A lot of the Cardinals will be disappointed again," said the other.

After breakfast Duncan returned to Lady Neville's private drawing-room. He wished to be near in order to render any necessary help; also he longed to be close to Alizon. His heart went out to her more than ever in her anxiety.

During the morning, a Franciscan monk came. It was the man so much revered by Sister Mary the nurse. Rutland admired the founder of this order immensely, and felt kindly disposed to all those who were his followers. This man was called Father Francis, and Rutland looked at him with interest. In appearance, however, he was not suggestive of Francis of Assisi. He was a well-fed man, short and very stout, and he waddled as he walked. His face was like a full moon, and his eyes stood out with fatness. He panted much at climbing the few stairs, and his face was almost purple.

"I am not as young as I was," he said; "but I have come, Sister Mary. Take me to her ladyship at once."

Rutland could not help smiling as the brown-frocked brother found his way into the sick room. He seemed so utterly incapable of imparting spiritual help.

After about half an hour Alizon brought the priest into the drawing-room where Rutland sat. Alizon's eyes were wet with tears, her face was drawn and pale.

"Mother is saying such strange things," said the girl, "she is quite delirious. Oh, I am afraid she is going to die!"

"Do not be afraid," replied Rutland; "both doctors told me this morning that they thought she would get better. The fever will have run its course by to-morrow night."

"We must trust to the Blessed Virgin," said the old priest. "Let the doctors do all they can; but I trust in the sacred offices of the Church. I believe her ladyship will get better, not because of what the doctors have said, but because of the intervention of our Holy Mother. The Church can still work miracles," he added.

Rutland smiled.

"Why, think of the wondrous things done at Lourdes," said the old man. "Hundreds of cases have been given up by the doctors, and yet they have been completely cured by the Blessed Virgin in her grotto. There can be no doubt about these cases. All have been critically investigated by eminent doctors."

Still Rutland was silent.

"Oh, I wish we had some such power here!" cried Alizon. "Cannot something be done, Father Francis? This is Rome. Could not the Holy Father be persuaded to do something?" The girl spoke excitedly; she was almost beside herself.

"Yes, something can be done," cried the priest. "I was going to tell you about it. Surely you have heard of the Bambino in the ARACELI!"

Alizon shook her head.

"Can it be possible!" cried the old man. "I thought the history of its miracles had reached even benighted England."

"What is it?" asked Rutland. "A Bambino is a child, is it not?"

"Yes. It is the figure of the blessed Child Jesus. It has wrought, oh! such wonderful cures. Cardinals, Bishops, and old Roman nobles have been given up by doctors, and then the Santa Bambino has been sent for, and, lo, no sooner has the blessed figure of the Holy Child entered the house than the patient has got better."

"Is this possible?" cried Alizon.

"Possible!" repeated the old priest, "possible! Why, ask any one in Rome! Of course, the Jesuits and the Dominicans do not say much about it, but that is because they are jealous that our Order possesses such a miraculous relic. But, my dear child, even Cardinal Lostella himself was cured by it, the Bishop of Tolisco was dragged back from the very jaws of death by its power; why, during the last few years the blessed Bambino has wrought cures upon the most exalted people in Rome. By the blessing of God that sainted Child shall cure your mother too!"

"And can you bring it here?" asked Alizon.

"I can obtain it for you. I must speak to the General of our Order, and obtain permission; then I must get a carriage and horses, and after that another brother and myself will accompany the sacred Child here."

"Is the figure large that you need a carriage?" asked Rutland, smiling in spite of himself.

"Oh no, it is not large, but we pay honour to the Blessed Bambino. It is drawn by two horses, just as a Cardinal is, and it has a crown on its head. It was crowned by the Holy Father's Secretary of State. I will have it brought in all its jewels."

"Jewels?" said Rutland.

"Yes, it is covered with jewels. It has wrought so many miracles that the recipients have covered it with costly presents; it has been a source of vast revenue to our Church too. People like to give large offerings, you know," added the priest.

"And it has really worked miracles?" queried Alizon like one in doubt.

"Why, yes, my child, yes, hundreds, thousands! Heaven only knows the number of people it has cured. The Holy Father thinks highly of it too, it is not generally talked about; but many believe that it is through the Bambino that his life has been prolonged. He has sanctioned a prayer in honour of the image, and on January 18th, 1894, Leo XIII. accorded a hundred days' indulgence, applicable to all souls in Purgatory, for every time this prayer was repeated with contrition. The indulgence can be gained every day. Why, it is the most renowned relic in Rome, more renowned even than that of the Blessed Virgin herself!"

At this moment Sister Mary the nun entered the room.

"You are speaking of the Blessed Bambino in the Araceli," she cried, "oh, yes, bring it, Father Francis, bring it."

Alizon looked at Rutland as if in doubt, but the young man's face was perfectly motionless.

"Yes, send for it," she cried, "if it has been blessed to so many people, it may also restore my mother to health."

"By the blessing of the Church, and through the prayers of her children, it will be blessed," cried the old man. "Oh, it has a wonderful history. I will tell you about it to-night when I bring it. If, indeed, the General of our Order condescends to allow it to be taken out of the Church."

"But surely there can be no doubt about it?" cried Alizon.

"I hope not, I think not. And when her ladyship is cured, she will doubtless remember the power of the blessed image, and show her thankfulness."

"Oh, I am sure she will," cried Alizon.

"I think, I think our General will give his consent," said the priest, as though he were in doubt; "it is seldom taken out of the Church now except to confer a blessing on some renowned and faithful member of the Church. Why, the last time it was taken to a sick bed, and the patient recovered, it was for an Italian Countess, Countess Pelanti, doubtless you have heard of her. She belongs to an old Italian family, but she has lost nearly all her fortune, as so many more of them have. When she recovered she was exercised greatly how she should manifest her gratitude. She had no money, but she possessed some old family jewels, and although they were very precious to her, she sold some of them in order to give one thousand lira (francs) to our Order."

"Oh," cried Alizon, "if my mother is cured, I will give two thousand lira to your Order."

"Ah!" cried the old man, taking his snuff-box from his pocket, and taking a pinch with evident enjoyment, "of course, we brothers of the Order of St. Francis possess nothing. We have taken the vow of poverty, and have but few luxuries, indeed. our vows forbid it; but our Order needs money in order to carry on its great missionary work. But I will go straight to our General."

"Let me accompany you to the street," said Rutland, "you may get lost in the passages," and he led the way down stairs, the old monk following him.

"Have you seen our Church?" asked the old man.

"No, not yet. I have seen your General though, I visited him the other day with Father Matthew, of the Society of Jesuits."

"Oh, indeed, and what is your name?"

Rutland told him.

"Ah, I heard him speak of you. And you are a friend of Lady Neville. Oh, I shall be able to prevail on him I have no doubt. Lady Neville is a faithful child of the Church, I suppose?"

"Oh yes."

"The titled people of England are not poor like those in Italy, are they? I have been in England myself. I learnt your language there. I think I have heard that Lady Neville is rich."

"Yes, I believe she is. How long will it take you to walk to the monastery?"

"Oh, a good while. It is half an hour's journey for me. I am getting old and stout. Simple living agrees with me, you see."

"Let me call you a carriage."

"Oh, there is no need. We followers of St. Francis always walk."

"But this is a special circumstance," said Rutland, noting the look in the old man's eye, "you will be able to get there in a few minutes then."

"Then let it be a close carriage, my son, a close carriage."

A few minutes later Rutland was back in Lady Neville's drawing-room again.

"Oh, I am so frightened!" cried Alizon. "That Sister Mary is such a good woman, such a holy woman, but she makes me think mother will die. She has such an awful expression on her face when she looks at her, and moans out her prayers as though she were afraid. The other nurse fell asleep through the night, and I was alone with her. I don't think I should be frightened a bit, but she is always talking about death."

"Do not fear," said Rutland, "both the doctors seem capable men, and they agree that the fever will cease to-morrow night. It will begin to abate soon now, and then your mother will be better."

"Do you believe in this Bambino, Mr. Rutland?"

"It doesn't matter what I believe. I am sure Father Francis believes in its miraculous power, and that he has implicit faith that it will make your mother well. I suppose he has been praying beside her?"

"Yes," said the girl absently, "and Sister Mary says he is such a holy man. Do you think so?"

"He is doubtless a sincere believer," said Rutland.

The doctors called again during the afternoon, and reported favourably concerning her ladyship's condition. The fever would soon begin to abate, they said. Their words, however, brought no comfort to Sister Mary, who bade Alizon not to trust in the skill of man, but in the intercession of the saints, and in the goodness of the blessed Virgin.

"Whatever happens, her ladyship is safe," she said. "You will be able to have many masses said for her, and perhaps she may be in purgatory only a very short time."

"Please do not talk of death, nor of Purgatory," said Alizon. "My mother must get well, she will get well!"

"Let us hope so," said Sister Mary lugubriously. "The Blessed Santa Bambino will be here to-night, I hope; and its power is wonderful. If she does recover I shall attribute it solely to its blessed power."

The day passed slowly away, Alizon scarcely leaving her mother's bedside. At eleven o'clock at night a messenger came to announce that Father Francis and Father Anthony had come in a carriage, and that they had brought something to take to her ladyship's room.

"Ah, the Blessed Virgin be praised!" said Sister Mary, "they have brought the holy image."

"I shall be glad if you will go and meet them," said Alizon to Rutland.

The young man found his way to the front door, where a carriage and two horses stood, while two brown-frocked friars stood as if guarding a great treasure.

"Have you brought it?" asked Rutland.

"Yes," said Father Francis.

WEST STREET CHAPEL.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

VI.—WEST STREET AND GREAT QUEEN STREET CHAPELS.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

FROM very small beginnings Metropolitan Wesleyan Methodism has gradually developed until it has become a great influence and power amongst the millions of the chief city of the British Empire. The present City Road Chapel—the Cathedral of Methodism—took the place of the old Foundry, which was the “Woolwich Arsenal” of the earlier years of the eighteenth century. It was used by the Government for the casting of cannon, until a terrible explosion occurred, when the works were removed from Moorfields to the solitary Kentish marshes in the Thames valley. Wesley transferred this citadel of destruction into a Temple of Peace, where he preached his sermons, met his classes, and published his books. In this time-honoured Foundry, Wesley founded his church in 1739, and held the first Methodist Conference in 1744.

The site of City Road Chapel was leased from a Mr. Robert Morris, who is described as being “a haberdasher of hats.” At that time City Road was a mere lane, and close by had been the kennels for the Lord Mayor’s fox-hounds. In the original deed, the building site is called “The Tenter Ground,” and is said to lie on the eastern side of “Dog Bar Road.” In the lease it is set forth as being “Mr. Wesley’s Chapel,” and for the first fifty years of its existence it was known as “The New Chapel.” The building was opened in November, 1778. Plain as its architectural features may appear to the present generation, it was, during the last century, the most imposing Non-conformist chapel in London.

West Street Chapel was the first extension of Wesley’s work from the historic Foundry, and it became the honoured birthplace of West End Methodism. Eventually it became the mother chapel of Great Queen Street, Hinde Street, and other important Wesleyan centres in the neighbourhood of wealth and fashion. The old chapel in West Street, Seven Dials, had been built in the year 1700, for a company of Huguenot refugees, who had been driven from the sunny lands of France by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in the year 1685, and who had found a home in the neighbourhood of Spitalfields. By “a strange chain of Providence” a French clergyman offered the chapel to John Wesley, who re-opened it on May 29th, 1743, for the use of “the people called Methodists.” The dedicatory services lasted for five consecutive hours, and some hundreds of devout persons partook of the emblems of the Lord's Supper. The sacramental silver cups became the property of Wesley, and subsequently were passed on to the trustees of Great Queen Street Chapel, where they are still used. They bear a Latin inscription, viz., "These two cups were presented by that honourable man, Peter Fenowillet, on the eighth day of July, 1697, for the use of the French congregation which meets in the Way, commonly called West Street, in the parish of St. Giles, but if the congregation is broken up they shall be sold for the benefit of the poor."

In the spring of 1764, a converted Catholic says: "I attended at West Street, Seven Dials. The great decorum and strict attention of the congregation inspired me with reverence and awe. The unaffected piety, the correct, uniform, and decent responses of the people were very moving, and I may say, to me as a stranger, astonishing. The singing was heavenly, and seemed to come from the heart. How favoured are the Methodists to enjoy such ordinances as these! And yet my heart, my vain heart, is afraid to have it known that I am become a Methodist."

During Wesley's time the West Street sacramental services were so hallowed by the Divine presence, that they became a highly prized "means of grace" to the London Methodists. The communicants became so numerous that Wesley had to make restrictions that not more than six hundred persons should partake of the Lord's Supper on any one Sabbath. Under those arrangements the ordinary service lasted from ten o'clock in the morning until three, and even four, o'clock in the afternoon.

For nearly fifty years West Street Chapel was one of John Wesley's favourite spheres of evangelistic labour. In this historic House of God he gave thanks on an anniversary of his providential deliverance from the devouring flames of Epworth's burning vicarage. At West Street Chapel the accomplished wife of Mr. Rich, the proprietor of Covent Garden Theatre, was converted. At her house Charles Wesley, the poet of Methodism, met Handel and Lampe, who composed tunes for Wesley's hymns, and thus helped the revival of the eighteenth century. In February, 1790, John Wesley preached for the last time at West Street to the "largest congregation" he had ever seen within its walls. During the earthquake panic, Charles Wesley allayed the fears of the West Street Methodists by preaching from the forty-sixth Psalm.

One writer in describing this centre of Metropolitan Methodism, says: "Here John Wesley's coach once stood, and Charles Wesley's little horse ambled on with the absent-minded poet. John Fletcher hurried along to help Wesley in his heavy service, and George Whitefield came to charm the worshippers. The Countess of Huntingdon and her aristocratic friends drove up to these doors. But one loses sight of all distinctions of rank when the true spirit of that spot rises to meet the visitor who has turned over the biographies of 'Early Methodist Preachers' and people. To this place came men and women seeking rest for their souls. Anxious, eager faces are around you. Their lives lie open in their own simple narratives, written for the glory of God and the guidance of pilgrims. The whole street is hallowed by the feet of penitent or of rejoicing worshippers."

The adjoining three-storied dwelling, with its picturesque dormer-windows, and Hanoverian front, was known as the chapel-house. For some years, Mrs. Harper, one of the sisters of John Wesley, lived there. According to tradition, during the earthquake panic of 1750, she was visited by "Old Jeffrey," the mysterious ghost that haunted the Epworth Rectory, and was a source of great annoyance to the Wesley family.

Seven years after Wesley's death, the lease on West Street Chapel expired. Such an extravagant price was demanded by the proprietor for its renewal that the officials regarded the conditions as prohibitory. Through the influence of an enterprising Methodist Scotsman of the name of John Arthur, who resided in Great Queen Street, a suitable property was secured. Adjoining Mr. Arthur's premises, and forming part of the same estate, was a disused chapel-of-ease belonging to the Established Church. From Mr. Arthur's house a private passage-way led to a family pew constructed in an alcove in the wall. In palmier times, the wealthy proprietor could walk from his mansion to the chapel without exposure to the weather. This chapel-of-ease had been built in 1706 for the accommodation of the fashionable families resident in and near to Great Queen Street. The first clerical appointment thereto appears to have been most unfortunate. A man of the name of William Ragulley, under the pretence of being a Church of England clergyman, regularly preached therein, and administered the sacraments, without holding the usual ecclesiastical licence. In December, 1706, two declarations from the Bishops of London and Peterborough were read therein, which eventually silenced the pretending cleric; and a clergyman with the regular credentials and full authority was appointed. In their earlier career, the Wesleys occasionally conducted services in this Episcopal Chapel. Charles Wesley, in his Journals, says: "1738, Sept. 17.—I preached at Queen's Street Chapel in the afternoon. My brother entertained us at night with the Moravian experiences."

Mr. Arthur was delegated by the West Street Church to commence negotiations for the purchasing of the Great Queen Street Chapel-of-ease. He had an interview with the lady who owned the property, who expressed her willingness to sell. The price was settled and the building was secured. The old lady was strongly prejudiced against all Nonconformists. At a subsequent interview she said to Mr. Arthur: "I would never sell it if I thought at any time it was likely to get into the hands of the Methodists." The probability is, that she thought her prosperous tenant was going to add it to his thriving cabinet-making establishment, and would convert it into workshops. Mr. Arthur, however, did not enlighten her that he wanted it for a Methodist Chapel; and he allowed the matter to proceed. His grandson says: "He practised no deception, and doubtless would have felt himself obliged to answer honestly, had the question been proposed at the proper moment, 'To what use is the building to be appropriated?'"

Dr. Adam Clarke and Mr. Joseph Butterworth, M.P., the philanthropist and friend of Wilberforce, completed the negotiations, and purchased the property for £3,500. The deed bears date July 19, 1798, and the chapel was dedicated for Methodist worship on September 30th of the same year. About £500 had to be spent in necessary repairs and improvements to the property. By a special appeal in London, about £2,000 was raised, and at the opening, £2,000 was left as a consolidated debt. The chapel contained eight hundred sittings, and the pew rents during the first year amounted to £305. By September, 1812, the consolidated debt had been reduced to £700.

In the opening years of the century the pulpit at Great Queen Street was occupied by the leading ministers in Methodism. The "giants of those days" included such notables as Dr. Clarke, Dr. Jabez Bunting, John Pawson, Alexander Mather, Walter Griffith, Richard Reece, Robert Newton, James Wood, Joseph Sutcliffe, Jonathan Edmondson, Henry Moore, and others who filled departmental offices, and occupied the chair of the Conference.

Great Queen Street was the home of a Church possessing numerous organisations, and exercising wide-spread influence. In 1803, Dr. Bunting wrote: "When I consider the spirit and abilities of many of its leaders, I cease to wonder that the Queen Street Society should so much excel all others in the London Circuit. Methodism here is conducted on a large scale. They exceed all other societies I ever knew in the liberal provision they make for their poor." Between the years 1764 and 1796, West Street Society alone had raised and distributed amongst the poor of the neighbourhood, some £3,000. Throughout the century of its existence the collections for the destitute and the deserving poor have been continued. As recently as the year 1894, £740 was collected and devoted to the relief of the outcasts and the needy.

The West Street Society established a Charity School for poor children, which was continued at Great Queen Street. The school was originated by a devoted woman named Margaret Stilles, who had been a domestic servant in the employment of John Wesley. She became interested in the circumstances of a poor orphan boy, and she contributed towards his education to the extent of "sixteen halfpennies" which she collected weekly from the fellow-members of her society-class. The ladies of the congregation took a great interest in the welfare of the children, and made them garments. It is said: "The boys and girls were dressed in a homely and distinctive fashion, and formed a picturesque group in the upper gallery on Sunday mornings. The members of the congregation were permitted to take the children home with them to dine."

The old chapel was dismal and inconvenient. It was lower than the street level, and, like other chapels of the past centuries, for the safety of the worshippers, the approach led through a narrow passage belonging to a private house. In spite of all drawbacks, the work of God prospered, and the congregations increased. Consequently, the adjoining property was purchased for the erection of a larger sanctuary. The present enlarged chapel was erected on the same site, and was opened in the year 1817. In the year 1841, the chapel was fronted with four Ionic columns, and the Venetian window was ornamented with Corinthian columns and pilasters.

The remarkable crypt extends under the whole area of the chapel. It was opened for interments in 1828, and was said to be "one of the most complete burial places in London." In 1858, the trustees were compelled, by an order in Council, to remove the coffins from the catacombs, and bury them beneath the floor of the crypt.

The notables who have belonged to the Great Queen Street congregation include the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, of Railway Bookstall fame, and Sir Henry Fowler, who gave the villages the Parish Councils. Both men rose to high position in the British Parliament. Although belonging to opposite political parties, they have gained the respect of all intelligent men throughout the empire. Dr. Ince, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, and Dr. C. Radcliffe, the eminent physician, "who was called in to alleviate the dying throes of such opposite celebrities as Frederick Maurice and Cardinal Newman." Mr. George Pycock Everett Green, the artist, and father of Miss Evelyn Green, the eminent Methodist authoress. The Rev. Dr. Abbott, head-master of the City of London School, and Mr. W. G. Rushbrooke, author of "The Common Traditions of the Synoptic Gospels."

Great Queen Street Chapel is a hive of religious, educational, and social industries. Besides the spiritual work accomplished, there are such varied agencies as the Social Hour, The Church Parlour Gatherings, The Boys' Brigade, and The Girls' Sewing Class, Gospel Temperance Concert, The Slate Club, which have for their object the salvation of the lost, and the ennobling of the degraded.

VIII.—THE IDEAL IMPERIALIST.

UR land echoes to-day, and has echoed for many a day, with loud and somewhat foolish bickerings between what are called "Big Englanders" and "Little Englanders"—the former phrase being understood to indicate those who would have

English rule and influence as nearly as co-extensive with the globe as possible; the latter, those who, believing that we have now on our hands as much territory and as many tasks as we can properly administer, ask that we should henceforth stay our ambition and rest quietly at home. And to say truth, with the record and the memory of our "exploits" in Africa of late years before us, it is well that the voice of protest should be raised against a certain sort of Imperialisers of the Rhodescum-Jameson type. Our treatment of the native races of South Africa, like our relations with the Maories in older days in New Zealand, or with the Kanakas of the Pacific of to-day, will hardly bear the light of a candid moral scrutiny, and it is well that powerful voices like those of Olive Schreiner and her husband should be raised, whether in speech, pamphlet, or story, against the scandal of our heedless cruelty and injustice. It is all very well to fire the imperialistic imagination with the vision of a triumphant iron way from the Cape to Cairo, opening up the whole of Africa to British influence and British trade, but there is another kind of imagination which sees but too well the foul greed and the bitter wrong and the track of blood which will mark that railroad whithersoever it may go. As Louis Becke in one of his fine stories makes an educated Maori say: "So long as we live, breathe, and have our being, so long will the strong oppress and slay the weak; so long will the accursed earth-hunger of a great Christian nation be synonymous for bloodshed, murder and treachery; so long will she hold out with one hand to the children of Ham the figure of Christ crucified, and preach the benefits of civilisation; while with the other she sweeps them away with the Maxim gun." The allegations lodged against British treatment of the wounded in the last conflict in the Soudan have been burked rather than bottomed; and about the most satisfactory feature of the recent debate on the outrageous vote to Lord Kitchener of Khartoum was the practical unanimity with which his gratuitous insult to the head of a fallen foe was condemned from both sides of the House. The Spectator's somewhat sickening and certainly specious apologies notwithstanding, the British conscience sees illustrated in the incident of the "Mahdi's head," the grave moral peril that besets our relations with the inferior or alien races who happen to stand in the way of our realising our dreams of empire. It is all very well cynically to say, as Lord Salisbury said ten years ago at a Guildhall banquet, that "the few small wars we have in hand just now are merely the surf that marks the edge of the advancing wave of civilisation," and the guests, being well out of the way of the surf, cheered heartily; but a spirit is happily abroad which cannot content itself with describing moral enormities in this euphemistic fashion. It cannot subscribe to the doctrine that such killing is no murder.

I am not forgetting my text from Wordsworth, though I have not yet announced it. There never was a finer patriot than he, and never a truer Imperialist. To associate the peaceful recluse of the vales with Imperialism—Wordsworth with war—seems absurd on the face of it; but he was no peace-at-any-price man. He believed in peace, even at that price of war which has unhappily sometimes to be paid for it, and when, in sonnets and tracts, he pleads for Spain against the usurper of France, and sounds forth a ringing call to Englishmen to arm on behalf of the down-trodden and the weak, we fail to see why he should be called less Christian than when he sings the praises of a peaceful and industrious Cumbrian peasantry. His early enthusiasm for the French Revolution, and his indignation that England should take up arms to crush this movement for the freedom of the human spirit, both cooled and changed, as we all know, as the years went on. For that Revolution created a monster whom it could not rule, but who ruled it, and turned its passion to the service of his own base ends, and when Napoleon sought to bestride the world like a Colossus, he had no more passionate opposer than Wordsworth. He was to the poet the hateful incarnation of a false Imperialism. Hear the poet's stately invective:

"When looking on the present face of things
I see one Man, of men the meanest, too!
Raised up to sway the world, to do, undo,
With mighty Nations for his underlings,
The great events with which old story rings
Seem vain and hollow; I find nothing great:
Nothing is left which I can venerate;
So that a doubt almost within me springs
Of Providence, such emptiness at length
Seems at the heart of all things. But, great God!
I measure back the steps which I have trod:
And tremble, seeing whence proceeds the strength
Of such poor Instruments; with thoughts sublime,
I tremble at the sorrow of the time."

In the first Napoleon a base and bastard Imperialism was permitted to show its true face and feature; to appal and sicken by its utter ugliness. "Of men the meanest," truly, was this portent of the time. To amazing ability he joined amazing unscrupulousness. The youth was father of the man, and at school he was described as "taciturn, fond of solitude, capricious, haughty, extremely disposed to egoism, seldom speaking, energetic in his answers, ready and sharp in repartee, full of self-love, ambitious, and of unbounded aspirations." Lying, deceit, and misrepresentation were his forte. His autobiography teems with deliberate and elaborate falsifications. "And thus," says Seeley, "it has been, and is, particularly difficult to eradicate the Napoleonic legend, which has grown up in the very midst of the nineteenth century, and would, perhaps, never have been seriously shaken but for the failure of the Second Empire. . . Look," he continues, "at Napoleon's career between 1803 and 1814, when it was shaped most freely by his own will; here everything is anti-popular, illiberal and immoral, as well as ruinous beyond all precedent. In particular, he stands out as the great enemy and oppressor of nationalities, so that the nationality movement, when it begins in Spain and Tyrol, and spreads through North Germany, is a re-action against his tyranny." The dates just mentioned were just those of Wordsworth's finest poetic productivity, and his patriotic poems are topful of passionate appeals to the spirit of truth and freedom in England and on the Continent. No wonder that a spectre like Napoleon sat heavy on Wordsworth's simple and unsophisticated conscience, whether artistic or moral. Here was a man who lied by habit, who never penned a page but in bad faith; who betrayed his best friends with fair pledges; who promised clemency to his foes, and put them to death as soon as he had them in his power; whose cruelties shocked even his own none too squeamish officers; who hired assassins to put inconvenient antagonists out of his way; who, to give his mistress the pleasure (?) of witnessing a real engagement, ordered a useless attack on an outpost, in which scores of lives were wantonly sacrificed; and finally, whose lust of despotism caused a total mortality of not fewer than two millions of lives from his first rise to power till his fall. Was there any wonder that at a career like this Wordsworth's gorge rose, or that his voice vibrated with a moral anger which seemed to transfigure the whole personality of the man?

But Wordsworth did not content himself with mere negative censure—and here I come at last to my text. His poem, "The Character of the Happy Warrior," portrays, with a literary dignity, a fit terseness and nobility of phrase, and a suppressed moral passion all his own, the true patriot, the ideal Imperialist. Myers well calls it, "A manual of greatness," with "a Roman majesty in its simple and weighty speech." It is an idealised picture, but with real examples on which the idealisation reposes. Englishmen of Wordsworth's day found amongst themselves a fitting foil to the stormy selfishness of Napoleon, and that foil was supplied by the naval hero Nelson. In his prefatory note to the poem, Wordsworth says, "Lord Nelson carried most of the virtues that the trials he was exposed to in his department of the service necessarily call forth and sustain." Unfortunately, however, the poet could not make the whole Nelson his ideal. He continues, "I have not been able to connect his name with the poem as I could wish, or even to think of him with satisfaction in reference to the idea of what a warrior ought to be." In Wordsworth's, and in the common view even until now, Nelson's fair fame was stained by a serious crime—his alleged intrigue with Lady Hamilton, the wife of an English ambassador. But Myers avers that certain recent researches have placed his connection with that lady in an unexpected light, and so practically absolved him from blame. However this may be, Wordsworth was driven to piece out the imperfections of his public hero by borrowing, as he does in a very naïve way, certain traits from the character of his own brother John. Two things are clear: first, that a greater contrast cannot be conceived than that between Nelson and Napoleon, and secondly, that the poem of "The Happy Warrior" hits off the better Nelson

Is such a sermon-poem as this obsolete? Has it not a message, all too well needed, for England to-day? Its manner, its majesty, its rhythm, are all Roman, classic to the highest degree; but its spirit is purely Christian. It rests greatness not on territorial greed, but on truth, honour, mercy and moral sympathy; on service to humanity, on sacrifice, not on base egoism. It is a worthy version of the saying of the Master: "Not so shall it be among you: but whosoever would be great shall be your minister. The Son of Man (the true ideal man) came (still comes) not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom (a means of manhood and enlargement) for many." Happy the Anglo-Saxon people, whether on this side the Atlantic or the other, which for its moral guidance at the beginning and at the close of this wonderful but not immaculate nineteenth century can have sung for it such poems as Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior," and Kipling's call to America not to shirk, in selfish love of wealth, its God-given task and duty.

"Take up the White Man's burden,
Send forth the best ye breed—
Go, bind your sons to exile,
To serve your captives' need ;
To wait, in heavy harness,
On fluttered folk and wild—
Your new-caught, sullen peoples,
Half devil and half child.

Take up the White Man's burden—
In patience to abide,
To veil the threat of terror,
And check the show of pride,

By open speech and simple
An hundred times made plain,
To seek another's profit
And work another's gain.

Take up the White Man's burden !
Have done with childish days—
The lightly proffered laurel,
The easy ungrudged praise :
Comes now to search your manhood
Through all the thankless years,
Cold, edged with dear-bought wisdom,
The judgment of your peers."

VI.

O make an open confession, I am not spending much time in the bookroom just now. Even the book-worm cannot resist the call of the fields and the woods, the country lanes and the hills, the path through the waving cornfield, the riverside and the breezy common with its golden glory of gorse and furze, that made Linnæus, when in England, fall on his knees and thank God that He had made anything so beautiful. And when the month is July, and the summer has put on her royal robes, and every garden is gay with flowers, and you are lulled by the "murmur of innumerable bees," and the birds are joyous in every tree, or chase each other through the air as the day is dying in the crimson and golden and pearly west,—why, then you close the books of man's making and go out to study the great book of God.

I do not say that I do no reading in the summer time. Ask Delia about that, and she will say, "Notice his coat-pockets, and see how they bulge. He always carries some of his treasures with him—not that anyone would want to steal them if they were left at home." Well, I will not attempt to deny it. It is sweet, after a long walk by the side of some purling brook, or seated on a fallen trunk in the glade of a wood, or on a rustic bench beneath some road-side tree, to take out a favourite book and enjoy a few pages of poetry or romance attuned to the surroundings and the mood of the moment. Years afterwards, when I open books so read, it may be on a December evening, with the thick fog outside, or a gale howling down the street, I get pleasant visions of summer scenes again, and can almost hear the lark's upsoaring trill, and almost smell the perfume of roses and lavender.

Thank God for summer! Let us gather its sunshine and its odours as much as possible into our memories and hearts. Some of us, unhappily for ourselves, never get rid of the winter's chill and gloom. Many poets have sung the praises of the summer and the country. Here are a verse or two from "The Garden," of Andrew Marvell, Cromwell's secretary, whom I have already quoted in praise of his master.

What wondrous life is this I lead !
Ripe apples drop about my head ;
The luscious clusters of a vine
Upon my mouth do crush the wine ;
The nectarine and curious peach,
Into my hands themselves do reach ;
Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide ;
Then, like a bird, it sits and sings,
Then whets and claps its silver wings,
And, till prepared for longer flight,
Waves in its plumes the various light.

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man then walked without a mate ;
After a place so pure and sweet,
What other help could yet be meet !
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share,
To wander solitary there ;
Two paradises are in one,
To live in paradise alone.

"The curmudgeonly old woman-hater!" said Delia, when, on returning from a ramble, I read the last stanza to her. I do not quite remember whether Andrew was an old bachelor, but whether that, or an ill-mated Benedict, he would, no doubt, have avoided so ungracious a cadence if he had had a Delia.

ON THE BEACH.

A living lady Irish poet, Katharine Tynan Hinkson, who has written much graceful verse, has also an "Orchard" poem, which has gathered into it much of the spirit of summer. Are not these verses daintily beautiful?

Very good in the grass to lie
And see the network 'gainst the sky,
A living lace of blue and green,
And boughs that let the gold between.

The bees are types of souls that dwell
With honey in a quiet cell;
The ripe fruit figures goldenly
The soul's perfection in God's eye.

Prayer and praise in a country home,
Honey and fruit; a man might come,
Fed on such meats, to walk abroad,
And in his orchard talk with God.

Unhappy those, "in populous cities pent," and especially those in sordid slums, who know little or nothing of the country in summer! How it would brighten tired eyes, and flush pallid cheeks, and impart springiness to limbs that have lost their elasticity! May all the Children's Holiday Funds in this overcrowded London be supported this summer till their coffers run over, and every child has had its fortnight, or at least its week, on the green lap of Mother Earth, and for a time has forgotten the cramped court and the dusty and noisy street!

Delia is busy making preparations for the children's visit to the sea, and one of her worries is my incorrigible propensity to make an increasing pile of books, which I seek to wheedle her to pack with the luggage. She ruthlessly reduces me to half-a-dozen volumes, "and they must be small ones." With a sigh I submit to the restriction, and hope the weather will be fine, for should it rain what will be the use of half-a-dozen small volumes?

"You must learn them by heart," is Delia's unsympathetic consolation.

The charm of the sea is a different charm from that of the country. It is the charm of continual movement and constant change of colour of water and sky, yet both the movement and the change are inexpressibly restful. Walt Whitman, in that uncouth, unlicensed measure of his, has pictured this charm of motion:

O to sail in a ship !
 To leave this steady, unendurable land,
 To leave the tiresome sameness of the streets, the sidewalks and the houses,
 To leave you, O you solid motionless land, and entering a ship,
 To sail and sail and sail.

Well, we are not going "to sail and sail and sail," but we are going to a children's sandy paradise—if paradise is not a misnomer for a beach—on the south coast, where the houses are of the reddest among the greenest of trees, and a grassy common stretches between the marine front and the sand, which slopes so imperceptibly that you can follow the tide out on its shining surface for nearly a mile. On the hottest day you are always sure of a cool breeze on the sands, and it is pleasant to sit there leaning against one of the piles of the wooden sand defences, with a book of poetry, or a story, in the hand, while the children are paddling or castle-building, and now and again one sun-burnt little rogue or another runs up to show you a crablet she has caught in her pail, or some various coloured pebbles that have been rolled smooth by the tide. The sea-side is God's graciously provided sanatorium and strength-restorer. "Why is the sea salt?" somebody asked a philosopher, and he could not explain. Why, surely, because in the chemistry of nature salt is the great preservative, and the salt sea that washes the shores and impregnates the air, fills the lungs and the blood with the purifying particles, and healing and vigour come on the sea breezes.

At our favourite place by the sea there is a river which loses itself in the salt water, and you never weary, as the tide is coming in, of watching the fishing boats, from the pier alongside, racing into the mouth of the river, and racing out as the tide recedes. At the entrance to the pier there is a tiny lighthouse, which at intervals a coastguardsman or the harbour-master mounts, and surveys the sea around with a telescope, and every boy wishes that he could have a look through that telescope. No wonder the children just now, out in the garden, are rehearsing with buckets and spades the occupations of the shore, and Delia and our Abigail are busy as busy can be in getting together and packing the things that will be wanted.

There has not always been appreciation of the sea. It still, too often, claims its sacrifice of ships and lives, although man prides himself on having tamed and curbed its savage ferocity. We build our ships of steel, with mighty ribs, and watertight compartments, and we drive them with engines of a cumulative power equal to that of thousands of the stoutest horses. We snap our fingers, so to speak, at old Ocean, but he bides his time, and in the gloom of some night, or the murkiness of some mist, by some trifling miscalculation, or the insidious force of some unanticipated current, our lord of ocean, that "walks the waters like a thing of life," finds a gaping leak in its bottom, and sinks, perchance with hundreds of lives, or is left ignominiously impaled on some jagged tooth of rock.

Such things happen, and such things, it is too likely, will happen as long as people "go down to the sea in ships," but what must it have been in the old days, when the ships were frailly built of planks, were absolutely dependent on the wind, and absolutely at the mercy of the gale, and when there was no magnetic needle to guide the mariner securely while the stars by which he steered his course were obscured?

As we read old literature, and especially the old epics, and the legends of ancient peoples, we see that it was the terror of the sea, that "mighty monster," that impressed people, and not its beauty and its health-giving qualities. The Greeks were the great sea-rovers of antiquity, and the "Odyssey" of Homer is an epic of the sea. Ulysses appears in that poem as tossed about, up and down the world, for twenty years by the malignant ocean, which seems always to be setting some new snare for him to prevent him ever returning to the faithful Penelope in his island-home of Ithaca. In the epic of "The Argonauts," which tells how Jason and his companions sailed in search of the wonderful golden fleece, we have the same picture of the sea as a cruel and ravaging monster. Even in the Bible there is very little that is good said of the sea. Of course the Jews were, during the greater part of their history, practically shut off from the sea, the coast being in the possession of alien races, but what the Jews did know of the sea inspired them mainly with terror. They associated the sea with the Flood, with the escape from Egypt, when it barred the way till God miraculously divided it, with Jonah's shipwreck. One who loved the sea would not have compared the wicked to "the troubled sea, which casts up mire and dirt." In the New Testament we associate the sea chiefly with Paul's shipwreck, and we have a glimpse of the feeling with which the early Christians regarded it in John's vision of heaven as a place where "there shall be no more sea."

"A CHILDREN'S SANDY PARADISE."

We English people, who boast that we "rule the waves," are probably the greatest sea lovers who have ever lived, and we have reason to be so. Storms may sometimes cast our ships away, yet still it is the sea that brings us wealth from all the world, and it is "the silver streak" that keeps our land secure against every foe. Our English poets and writers, at all events, since Shakespeare, have been the laureates of the sea, because, in Shakespeare's words,

England is
This other Eden—demi-paradise—
This fortress, built by nature for herself,
Against infection and the hand of war,
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea.

Year by year, as we take our seaside holiday, and lazily watch the ships that sail in endless procession along "the silent highway," we become "Big Englanders," in spite of ourselves. Is it because we are proud that our Empire is one "on which the sun never sets," that, in the words of the song, "We've fought and we've conquered again and again?" I trust not. It is an ignoble pride that swells over the mere possession of territory, and the rule over other races. God, we believe, has made our England great, but for what? Not, surely, to flaunt our banner in the faces of our great Continental rivals, not to colour the map of the world our own hue, but to spread among the peoples that glorious Gospel that, we believe, God has given into our charge in fullest measure, and in greatest purity. I like to think of our ships carrying, on every outflowing tide, missionaries, Bibles, and lesson books to those in heathen darkness. I like to think of our Empire preparing the way for that kingdom which—

Shall stretch from shore to shore,
Till moons shall wax and wane no more.

But here comes Delia. "I see, sir," she says, "you are in a brown study. I am just going to pack the box that the books are to go in, so let me have them at once, and then you can come down and cord the box."

Of course, I obey, and descend from high speculation to the prosaic duty of life, but is it really a descent? With Delia and the children in wild excitement looking on, who would not cord a box or do any other thing, and like George Herbert's servant, who swept a room, "make drudgery divine"? How little children twine themselves, like tendrils, round a father's heart, even when the father is a devotee of books! Well Longfellow felt that when he wrote:

Come to me, O ye children,
And whisper in my ear
What the birds and the winds are singing
In your sunny atmosphere.

For what are all our contrivings,
And the wisdom of our books,
When compared with your cares-es,
And the gladness of your looks?

Ye are better than all the ballads
That ever were sung or said;
For ye are living poems,
And all the rest are dead.

Our Lady of Leisure.

WHO IS SHE? WHERE IS SHE? AND WHAT CAN SHE DO?

THE answer to the first question of these three is most easily given by saying who Our Lady of Leisure is not. She is by no means the new woman, not because she is unlike the best type that goes by that new name, indeed she is often inclusive in it, but because she is not at all new, but, instead, of the most ancient lineage. Depend upon it, on that very day on the shore of Coreyra long, long ago, when Nausicaa, kneeling at nature's wash-tub on behalf of her family, saw the hero Ulysses coming along, there was somewhere encourtained in a tent not far away one of the ancestresses of Our Lady of Leisure. Depend upon it too, that lady in the tent had not always been simply a lotus-eater. No; she in her time had also played the handmaid's part by the crested wave, as also within her primitive home. But all this was when the world was young, when every Adam delved, and each Eve span, and no one as yet had seen the fine gentleman nor his feminine counterpart.

But the young world went round and round, and as it twirled in space year in and year out, many wonderful changes were wrought. Farther and farther man developed from his early ancestors, and the always improving cunning of his right hand (or shall we say, with a great naturalist, of his right thumb?) gave him increasing mastery over natural forces, and with that mastery the possibility of leisure came, for some one, at least, and that one, first of all, was the lady of the great war-leader. In course of time her daughters shared the privilege too, and still later, all the ladies of all the war-lords. May we not think that this quieter life of theirs was the earliest germ of our present civilisation?

Everywhere this opportunity for leisure spread, and when long ages after, in Europe, feudalism became the law of the nations, and Christianity the ideal law of life, then also came certain natural modifications of leisured life which have left their impress on society to the present time. Let us look at our own country for an illustration of what we mean. At any moment, in the middle ages, the over-lord could summon his vassals to follow him to battle; what then in such rough times was it best for many ill-protected ladies to do? Nothing was safer or better for them than the refuge of the convent. There, refinement and religion, or should we not rather say religion and refinement, for the one was the parent of the other, went hand in hand. Works of charity, gentle study, meditation and prayer filled up the time till the war-lords returned and the ladies were claimed again to scatter around them, as châtelaines, the improved influence born of their monastic seclusion. But what of those who were never required more for home life, those to whom the battlefield meant both defeat and a huge burial mound, where young life and young hope lay hid together? For these no other spot but the same convent could offer solace, no other aim remained but to spend the still hours of disappointed life in ministering to the needs of other broken lives. And thus the convents were asylums and shelters for the needy, and our ladies of leisure were to be found up and down the land, wherever a convent raised its head, here by a marsh, or there by a primeval forest. No modern rush disturbed their peace, the railway whistle which centuries later should pierce their solitudes was not yet even a dream.

Yes, the religious houses of those twilight times had their uses; they were the flower of their age, and long continued beneficial. But there is an end to all things, as there should be, in order that the beginnings of still better things should be possible. Most institutions, perhaps all, have been right in their inception and in their early life, but the wrong of them comes in when they are allowed to continue with us after all that is good in them has been used up, when they have quite outlived the spirit and the needs of the times that called them into being. What if we should continue to wrap our athletic boys and our graduate girls in the swaddling clothes of their infancy! Charming as the babe looks in these, the growing man requires the outfit meet for the demands of more active, stronger life. And just so is the infancy of the ages over, the nations are now in their manhood, perhaps early manhood only, the perfection of maturity may still be far off. But is there not a glimmer of its coming shining from The Hague at this present moment—a glimmer bright enough to show us, at least, that the leading strings of the darker ages are no longer needed, indeed, that they now stop the way, impede the pursuit, and must be dropped as the crutch is dropped by the lame man when his undeveloped limb becomes strong and straight?

But of those religious houses of which we have been speaking, the beginning of their end was perhaps discernible to the few, who had eyes to see, when the Crusades began; then men first travelled, and is there any eye-opener like unto travelling? When we know each other, mercy and justice have a chance of acting and inter-acting. The Crusades, failure as they were in their prime object, were anything but a failure in their incidental results. They brought into our country the secrets of other lands, the beauties and benefits of other modes of thought, and altogether accelerated the march of our national life beyond the dreams of the most far-seeing of the followers of Peter the Hermit. The Grand Tour of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and the globe-traversing of our own day—are they not the lineal descendants of the Wars of the Cross?

In the many changes they brought, the women of the country could not fail to share, and the chate-laine became the Lady Bountiful of the countryside, with her hand-prepared simples and balsams for the hinds of the estate, and many ladies with fewer claims went still further; for be not surprised, dear reader, to learn that in what we are pleased to call the dark (?) ages, the doctors-in-chief were women.

But peace and war were for ever alternating and staying or spreading progress. The Wars of the Roses came like the blast of death over the land, but, nevertheless, brought life. The nobles left their acres, and the sons of the soil had room to grow, and the impulse then gained went on and on, till we became the free people we now are. And Our Lady of Leisure, through the ups and downs of political life, was also widening her views with the revolving suns, and still better, her number by these changes began to increase. She now took pleasure in the deeper learning, and received her lessons in Greek and Latin from "The Scholmaster," one Roger Ascham, and for diversion read her "Horace" and "Virgil," and if the vicissitudes of high condition claimed her for a victim she knew how to lay her beautiful head on the block and die without a murmur. Or, she was the dutiful daughter accompanying to the scaffold the great statesman who, like the young queen, paid the penalty of greatness according to the grim custom of his time.

Of self-renunciation, of culture, and of heroism, our annals contain many brilliant examples, and the lives of our learned ladies of leisure must have influenced enormously the unleisured and hard lives of the women below them.

But those old times with their wonderful romance, their broad, lurid effects, their deep, dark shadows, went, like the dead, downward with the stream, the stream of time that has taken them to an ocean which we hope will never give up its burden.

And a new England was born, an industrial England; old acres had passed from the sons of the over-lord into the hands of the sons of his one-time serfs,—all old conditions gave place to new. The many were now about to enjoy what had hitherto been only the privilege of the few. And a new Lady of Leisure came along as surely as all the rest. She was herself the sum total of the Labour and Economy which had enabled her father to take the place of the old lords of the soil, and she gave right well of her advantages to all around. She was among the earliest to endow schools for girls to train them in the two principles which were leading the country forward. Alms-houses and hospitals were her especial care. True, convent life had ceased to allure her, but the churches still needed the successors of Martha and Mary, of Phœbe and Dorcas. As such, the Puritans found them true and strong; the early Methodists employed them largely when John Wesley was evangelising the dark Eng and of the eighteenth century, helped in high circles by Selina, Countess of Huntingdon. And those whose bent was for other forms of social work found it in allied paths. As Mrs. Fry, Our Lady of Leisure visited the prisons and rested not till humanity penetrated even there. As Hannah More, she attached herself to a noble sect, and gave her talent to the cause of negro freedom, of improving the manners of the great, of checking the inflow of revolution from the heaving country next us, or, as the quieter years brought the silver hair to crown her brow, she sat down to write at a king's command; those "Strictures on the Education of a Princess," which were to make of the nation's darling, had death spared her, what her successor has been to us.

And then the political economist appeared in Harriet Martineau, to whom the Government of the day appealed for counsel in the surging troubles that preceded the Reform Bill. How much of that Bill, let us ask, do we owe to her clear mind? Perhaps the greatest honour, however, one great enough to satisfy the whole sex were it shared amongst them, was that which fell in the mid-century to Harriet Beecher Stowe, who wrote down in America "that sum of all human villainies," as John Wesley rightly named the slave trade. Her hand may be joined with H. More's—the two women in the two hemispheres who had a passion for freedom for all who breathed in each. At the same time, and in a similar field, our greatest woman-poet, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, was voicing triumphantly the woes of the almost slave children of manufacturing England, and somewhat later we have the story of "the lady with the lamp," and how, through that lady, the nursing-world has been reconstructed is common knowledge, whilst Florence Nightingale is still amongst us. Curiously does history repeat itself—but always with a new-born modification. In the old days of chivalry the knights toasted their "ladye-loves" in a parting-cup as they made off for the battle fray. When the Russian war was ended, and the surviving heroes among the officers met to celebrate their return, a toast was proposed to the one whose name should commend itself to the majority as the name of the campaign. Unanimously was given the name of Florence Nightingale.

But more than a generation has passed since then.

Where now are the descendants of those ladies whom the nation delighteth still to honour? As their prototypes were, they are—everywhere, and as various as all their forerunners joined together. Just as in some parts of the world geological strata crop up and tell the whole story of the earth's pre-Adamite arrangement, so do these tell of all the successive layers of woman-life that have been—the difference is we have them all at once, whilst previous ages had them in succession. They are, indeed, "a quotation from all our ancestors." They represent the spirit of all the past, the manifestation only has changed.

And what can they do? To-day every woman of leisure, and we may divide our present large number into three broad classes, may find something to do that needs doing, and something that in her default might go undone. The first class of them, the young who have not yet taken up the responsibilities of home-life, may receive training to fit them for their chosen work, and they will be the more fit for private life if they give two or three years to the public weal, especially to that department of it where children are in need of care. Then that other class of ladies with small independent incomes and free from personal claims, how many avenues are open to them! the demand is always greater than the supply. And that other class, those experienced ladies who, having discharged faithfully the duties of house matron and mother, and having set their fledglings on wing, still find themselves with plenty of activity and ripe judgment in balance—how very useful they can be. Who so fit for guardians of the poor? We know one such, who, on a suburban vestry, has been able to remedy a state of things with respect to girl delinquents few would have believed possible to exist had not the lady in question narrated it herself. Surely this one act were better worth than petting all the macaws that ever screeched "Pretty Poll" since the world began, and better worth than thousands of yards of unneeded "fancy" work, which frequently gratifies no eye but that of the woman who washes it, if hers be not too tired to take pleasure therein. How one wishes that to such matrons as these the purely domestic side of our social hive were relegated, leaving the spear-side, or the imperial side, or whatever you may choose to call it, to the men. Why should they be burdened with both? No home is a success where a bereaved parent tries to do the part of two; and no community—the larger home—is well served by only half its members. We would give to the spindle-side the management of our streets as the people of Chicago have given theirs. One year after Mrs. Paul's appointment there the improvement was so great, the litter and the unsanitariness so literally swept away, that great New York looked on and said, "We too must have a woman." Whilst our ladies of affluence and influence lead the way in attacking the drink fiend and its corollaries, there are quieter spheres well adapted to the quietest leisured woman that lives. With Miss Rye, or with Lady Aberdeen, some of them can do what so far has not been sufficiently done—they can transfer a part of the too great female population from our shores, where it blocks the way, (for, as Lord Lorne, in reference, naively says, it is quite possible to have too much of a good thing), and place it where corresponding wrongs exist, because there is too little of it. Wherever a young girl is unsafe a woman is needed, and if the way to work is not quite clear, there are plenty of agencies to make it so—Mrs. Booth's, for instance, to name the first that comes to mind. "Too old at forty," is a cry that would be less frequently heard if young women, who would do well in our colonies, were not, as cheaper workers, ousting our men at home.

Nevertheless, the singing of birds is plainly at hand, but in matters social the singing would come all the earlier if every woman whose time is her own were to feel that at least a certain number of its years were largesse due to her generation. In the first place, to be thoroughly useful, her own mind should be thoroughly cultivated. Thanks to such pioneers as Miss Clough and Mrs. Sidgwick and Mrs. Fawcett and many another, the places are well known where the daughters of the well-to-do can improve their natural tastes, as in the last generation only the sons could do. Having found out what they can do best, the work suitable will certainly present itself, and we think that just as men look to politics, or to the professions, or to business for the outlet of their energies and the sharpening of their faculties, so should unencumbered women look to things social. It were well, and of this the older women among our public workers are wisely giving a hint to their juniors just now, to keep up a well marked differentiation of work as between masculine and feminine. Not collision, but distinction in effort will be most successful. There are large areas of need, the fringes of which have not as yet been so much as touched. Besides the incomplete management of our streets, with their weekly, or, at best, bi-weekly sweepings—(just think what a kitchen or nursery would be like with such slight attention, and that is what our streets are like)—where have we any homes for the friendless aged, rich or poor; for young lads and girls alone in great cities, to which they could go of right; any receptacles for the inhabitants of infected homes, too poor to make a removal unhelped, or for little children suddenly bereaved of an only parent, and for many another needy section too numerous to name here? Were the full number of women in England who have the power to help, to set to work on these, or any of these, the volume of sadness and sorrow that night and day is always with us would soon roll away, or take the smallest proportions. The removable would disappear, and the remainder would be assuaged. And how may we know, asks a timid one, if we have a call to such work? This way. Wherever a cry of pain is heard, wherever a weak brother or sister is in danger, wherever some fellow-creature needs what another can give, there may be read her letters patent for social work by every lady of leisure in the land.

RECENT PIONEER EVANGELISTIC AND LINGUISTIC WORK AMONG INDIAN HILL TRIBES.

AMONG the missionary workers of various nationalities, and the heroes of strange experiences who have been trained in medicine and surgery at Livingstone College, London, E., it is tolerably certain that never before in the history of this famous institution has it counted two such students among its numbers, as the subjects of our sketch.

Messrs. J. Herbert Lorrain and Fred. W. Savidge, B.A., Ph.D., having already spent four years in an unsurveyed and comparatively unknown district of N.E. India, have returned to the homeland for a brief furlough. These intrepid pioneers have experienced the immense value of medicine in winning the confidence and love of savage hill tribes, and they are now spending their furlough by bravely working hard at medical and surgical problems in order to still further fit themselves to use this important aid to missionary work.

An enumeration of some of the points of resemblance between their pioneer work and that of our missionaries in the trans-Zambesi mission field, may stimulate interest in the splendid work which has been accomplished by these daring, faithful ambassadors of the Cross.

The two fields—Lushai-land and Mashukulumbwe-land—are under British control.

The two tribes—Lushais and Mashukulumbwes—were previously unevangelised.

When these gentlemen went to their new sphere they found that the language was not reduced to writing—so with Seshukulumbwe.

They were considerably hindered at first in their efforts to enter the country, so were our brave pioneers to South Central Africa.

Mr. J. H. Lorrain went to India when scarcely twenty-one years of age. He has a remarkable faculty for the facile acquirement of Eastern languages, and being still under thirty, there is in him the rare combination of the enthusiasm of youth with a great deal of experience. Mr. F. W. Savidge has special qualifications for his work. Having had a thorough classical education, he acted as a private tutor for several years in this country, and has acquired thoroughly scientific methods of teaching and of learning the intricacies of the highways and by-ways of knowledge.

Our great Indian dependency is a continent of villages. It is estimated that there are 700,000 villages, and their awful need is but partially conveyed when we say that the whole Protestant force in the Empire represents only one worker to four hundred villages!

To put it in another way: It is estimated that the population of India is fully 300,000,000 of souls; and of this vast number there are only 2,000,000 of professed Christians. Especially when we remember that in India one generation follows another at nearly twice the speed as in this country, do we see how imperative is the call for more labourers into this white harvest field.

Therefore we welcome news of missionaries who have attempted to cope with the difficulties of this field, especially when those workers have surmounted the enormous difficulties of reducing a hitherto unwritten language to writing, and have given to the people parts of the Bible in their native tongue, and so have helped to bridge the still yawning gulf between God's revelation and heathendom.

At the beginning of 1891. Mr. Lorrain commenced to learn Bengali at Brahmanbaria, a New Zealand mission in eastern Bengal, with a view to future work among the hill tribes of N.E. India. (Please consult map.) After having been out for a year he was joined by Mr. Savidge, and together they went to Chittagong with the fixed idea of reaching some of the hill tribes. After inquiries they received permission to go to Kassalong, near the Lushai frontier, and there they learned that fighting was taking place in Lushailand. A regiment had been sent by the British to punish the Lushais for their head-hunting expeditions into the plains. They discovered that the Lushais had frequently gone down to the plains with the scarcely benevolent intention of cutting off the heads of the coolies who were working on the tea gardens, and of carrying away Europeans or natives into captivity. Therefore these two peaceful Britishers were not allowed to go into the country because of the danger which the Government officials feared they would incur. In Kassalong they settled down—by the kind permission of the Deputy Commissioner—in one of the Government "rest-houses"—which are provided so that travelling Europeans may stay for a little time. While in this temporary home, which was but a solitary hut in the forest, an epidemic of small-pox broke out among the nearest natives, which so scared the healthy natives that they fled into the adjacent forests, leaving their dead and dying in their huts. Our friends had a Mahomedan servant who knew that they were fresh to the ways of the country and its inhabitants, so he begged piteously that he might be allowed to go to the coast to see "his wife" who was "very ill."

At that time they did not know that "the wives, mothers and other relations have a habit—according to the false pretence of the wily native—of dying periodically." They allowed him to go, and during his absence these two alone did all their own domestic work, including cooking and washing, except when they both together had jungle fever, which caused them at times to be delirious. Occasionally one of the sick men would be a little better than the other, and would painfully creep out of bed, make up some Liebig's Beef Extract, and give to his fellow-sufferer. As the condition of each varied, one waited upon the other. As soon as they recovered, their servant came back, and invented a yarn concerning his doings.

As at Kassalong the climate in the rainy season was very bad, they were advised to return to Chittagong on the coast, where Savidge became ill again. This compelled them to cross the north-eastern portion of the Bay of Bengal to Calcutta, where he spent some time in the General Hospital.

As soon as he was sufficiently recovered to travel they returned to Brahmanbaria. As matters were still unsettled in Lushailand, they endeavoured to reach another hill tribe—the Tipperahs, so among the Tipperah hills they went to interview the Rajah, who, unfortunately, had been converted to Hinduism, and would not allow them to enter. His reason was that he feared that they were "land-grabbers."

On their return to Calcutta, Savidge was again so seriously ill that the hospital doctors advised his immediate return to Europe, but he remained and recovered. After a short stay at a mountainous health resort—Darjeeling, in the Himalayas—they went back to Bengal, and decided to try once more to enter Lushailand—this time from the north instead of the south, as previously. They went up to Cachar, a tea district in Assam, and obtained permission to enter in a year's time! Nothing daunted by this postponement of their plans, they spent the year in further work at the Lushai language as far as possible. With this purpose in view they talked with officers and traders who had been in contact with the natives, and thus mastered words and sentences of the strange tongue. During this time they worked as missionaries among the natives, and, hailing the close of the year's delay, they started for their new home on Boxing Day, 1893. They had an interesting journey by boats on a small river which runs from the heart of the Lushai hills. For seven days they were in the plains, and passed through well-cultivated tea districts, then they plunged into the mountainous districts, where the tropical vegetation of the banks hedged in the narrow rushing river, and the boats had to be dragged up innumerable cataracts. Their various hair-breadth escapes, and the serious accidents which happened to other travellers in this little changing river, which was shallow and slow, or deep and rapid in turns, claimed their constant attention, but they did not fail to note the varied scenery of the river-sides. Here, they were hemmed in by deep cliffs and narrow gorges; there, were banks covered with wild luxuriant vegetation and tall bamboos. Troops of monkeys disported among the leafy branches, or played on the sand-banks, and occasionally tigers crashed through the brittle reeds; wild boars swam across the nose of the boats, while beautiful birds, wild fowl, and millions of mosquitoes made the journey sufficiently interesting, and at the same time reminded them that they were leaving the borders of civilisation. As one evening they were making a fire on the bank with dried bamboos, some snakes, which had been hibernating in the snug cylinders, dropped out, and as the bamboos crackled and the lurid glare lit up the darkening gorge, a wild chase ensued. Our travellers were reminded of the incident recorded in the Acts of another missionary—the heroic Paul.

Day by day they travelled through the uninhabited northern parts with the mountains covered with dense forest towering three or four thousand feet above them, resting only on Sundays, until they arrived at a little settlement of Bengali traders at Sairang.

With much difficulty they carried their goods up the mountainous roads for some thirteen miles—to an elevation of 4,000 feet above the sea—to a place called Fort Aijal, which was occupied by five British officers and two regiments of Goorkhas and Bengal infantry, of which the latter regiment went down when the country was quieter. They set to work to build their house—as depicted in our photograph—for which they paid for labour in salt, as the supply of this commodity had been stopped because of the rebellion. Now that our men are at last fairly settled in their new home, let us look round and describe the country.

Lushailand is about the size of Wales, and has a population of 75,000 people. It is situated away in the N.E. corner of India, south of Manipur, between Upper Burmah and Bengal. With the exception of one or two tiny plains on the frontier of Burmah, its surface has the appearance of parallel ranges, running north and south, of ubiquitous steep-sided mountains covered by thick forests with deep narrow valleys between.

Therefore, in journeying from east to west one must constantly ascend and descend, sometimes an ascent of 3,000 feet is necessitated, then a descent into the valley below, then an ascent to the next summit, and so on, ad infinitum.

In travelling from north to south one may follow the course of the valley streams, or keep to the narrow native paths on the mountain slopes, along which one finds one's progress intercepted by various obstacles, trunks of trees, etc., over which one must scramble ingloriously. On the tops of the mountains travellers find a cooler state of the atmosphere and better paths. As there are no beasts of burden, all journeys must be undertaken on foot.

When they settled among the Lushais, the head-hunting reminiscences were carefully hidden, and the people were apparently quiet, good-tempered and intelligent. However, it was considered unsafe for them to live at more than one mile from the fort, so they settled between two Lushai villages. They trusted the Lushais implicitly, and speedily won their confidence, by kindness and medicines. The value of medical knowledge in pioneering has so impressed itself upon them that they have taken the training while on furlough, believing that it will open up their way to another unreachd tribe, as, without a knowledge of the language they may at once begin to help the people.

The Lushais are of Mongolian descent, they are copper-coloured, have flat noses, high cheek bones, and some have almond-shaped eyes. At first it was almost impossible for the new-comers to distinguish a man from a woman, for the outside dress is practically the same, and all wear their hair long, parted in the middle, smeared with pig's fat and fashioned into a "bob" behind with great brass pins. Also the Lushai "lords of creation" have very little hair upon their faces, as the moustache does not begin to grow until they are well over twenty-one, then they pull out all the centre hairs from the upper lip, leaving just a few at the outer ends. Although there are no Lushai "barbers," yet a man with a beard is a curiosity. Their only garment consists of a large native woven sheet thrown over the shoulder, like a Scotch plaid, which reaches down to the ground. All men smoke long pipes made of bamboo, much like "churchwarden pipes."

Later they were able to distinguish women from men by their pipes. A woman's pipe is a curious structure, having a bamboo receptacle containing water through which the smoke is drawn. This water is impregnated with nicotine, and is then decanted into a small gourd, which is carried about by the husband in his satchel, and is presented to friends whom he may meet, as a mark of good will. The friend and the husband take a sip, hold it in the mouth for a few minutes, then expectorate it. Very occasionally they would come without their pipes, then they detected the difference by the ear ornaments worn. The man's ear ornament consists of a red cornelian bead suspended from the lobe of the ear by a piece of white string. The woman's ornament generally consists of a section of an elephant's tusk. (The writer saw a specimen which is a little larger than a crown piece, and three times as thick.) The method by which the lobe of the ear is prepared for the reception of this huge ornament is highly interesting. A little girl has her ears pierced when quite young, and into the tiny hole a small straw is inserted, later another straw is added, and gradually the hole is enlarged by the addition of fresh straws. By and by she is able to have a disc of clay inserted into the gaping lobe of the ear, which is enlarged by degrees, so that by the time she reaches womanhood she is capable of wearing the heavy ornament described. This custom of the votaries of savage fashions reminds us of the dress of some of the Mashukulumbwes—a quill through the lobe of the ear.

In addition to the long tartan, the Lushai women wear a short kilt of prettily woven cloth. The children, who are not hampered by clothes, are very clever at making traps for wild animals, and at shooting with the pellet bow, with which they are experts. They never wash, but they have an annual shower bath in the rainy season, when they disport in the torrents of rain. The women are very industrious, indeed, they do the lion's share of the work, which consists chiefly in cutting wood for cooking purposes, bringing it from the forests, drawing water from springs in the valleys in bamboo vessels, daily cleaning the rice for meals, cooking and helping their husbands to cultivate their farms. The men build their houses of bamboo, cultivate their farms, and hunt. Men, women and children, all smoke home-grown tobacco incessantly. When an infant is peevish a mother takes her own pipe from her mouth and thrusts it into the infant's mouth to soothe it. Parents are exceedingly kind to children, and seek at any expense to gratify their whims.

Lushai villages are always situated on the summit, or close to the summit of the mountains, never in the valleys. They always build houses upon the steep mountain slope, and, in order to avoid cutting a level foundation, they build upon piles which are of different length according to the distance from the bamboo floor to the side of the hill. Sometimes the slope is at an angle of 75 degrees, so that if one were to enter the front door from the steep street, walk through the house, and step out of the back door, he would have a considerable fall.

The house is made entirely of bamboo woven into mats, and thatched with cane leaves. The house of the poorer people consists of one room with a little front verandah. Underneath the houses the domestic animals are kept: bison, pigs, fowls, goats, etc. The internal arrangements are simple. Three stones on the mud hearth support the clay cooking-pot. The furniture comprises a bamboo bin for the year's rice, a couple of bamboo shelves which act as bedsteads, a few clay cooking-pots, and a family wooden plate, from which the household feeds. The chief's larger house is divided into a number of compartments, an inspection of which would probably disclose an old widow in one, some orphans in another, a madman in another, as his house is an asylum for all who are unable to support themselves. They do as much work for the chief as they are able, and in return are fed and protected. The chief is practically the father of the village. Every village has its own chief, whose office is hereditary. He is supported by the members of the community, who give a certain proportion of their crops, and certain portions of every animal taken in the chase. An interesting building in every village is the "Zawlbuk," or bachelors' quarters. When a boy reaches his fourteenth or fifteenth year he no longer sleeps in his father's house, but sleeps with the other youths of the village in this building. It is a very large place, in the centre is a large mud hearth upon which a blazing fire is usually burning every evening. Around this large numbers of young men gather to recount to each other the folk lore of their people, their own deeds of prowess, and incidents of the day's chase. Here the missionaries found splendid opportunities of preaching the Gospel, as the boys and youths listened very attentively for hours after the day's work. Their method of cultivation is exceedingly interesting. The male population of a village, en masse, armed with primitive choppers, make large clearings in the forest, fire the fallen timber, then plant their crops in the fertile debris. This system of cultivation necessitates the removal of the farms to another site at the end of every three years. This causes the Lushais to be nomadic, as both villages and plantations are often removed. This has influenced the language, so that one dialect is spoken all over the country, whereas in other tribes of settled habits almost every village has its own dialect.

The Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund.

AN EXPOSITION AND A REVIEW.

THE Missionary Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund can hardly fail to form a landmark in the religious and financial history of the Primitive Methodist Church. It is the most successful movement on financial and Connexional lines that we, as a Church, have ever had. It has already had some most important results in many ways, and it promises others equally important when brought to an issue completely successful. It has demonstrated conclusively that, as a community, we can do something on a large scale for objects of common interest, but outside our local and personal concerns. It has shown that we can attempt great things for God and largely achieve them. The amount already realised is not only a magnificent result in itself, but is much more, in the splendid example which it affords, and the inspiration which it supplies, to larger and even more successful efforts on similar lines which will without doubt come hereafter.

THE WORK PROPOSED TO BE DONE.

We had hoped that before this date our work would have been finished; and we were quite prepared to sing a glad doxology over a completed task in the actual raising of £50,000, the sum we set out to reach. But human calculations sometimes miscarry, more or less, and where even a notable success is achieved it may fall short of complete success. And in movements of this kind, it is impossible to foretell with mathematical accuracy, what can be accomplished. The best we can do is to fix our minds on some object that is worthy, and aim to achieve it; to fix a sum sufficiently high as to merit the general support, and sustain the reputation of the Connexion. We did this. We fixed £50,000 as the object to be reached. It was sufficiently large to tax the faith, and even call forth the ridicule, of not a few. Many then thought it utopian, and dubbed its advocates visionaries. It was ten times larger than the most successful Connexional effort on financial lines that had preceded it—ten times bigger than anything we had ever before accomplished. But what has been done proves the wisdom and practicability of what it was proposed to do. In many parts of the Connexion we have had magnificent support, and if all would have done, who could, as many have done, we should have left the mark we aimed at leagues behind, and have had not only the £50,000 in hand, but a handsome balance to the good. The movement has absolutely demonstrated that "the Connexion possesses immense resources for public objects, and that it is prepared to use and consecrate them to those objects which commend themselves to its judgment and sympathy, and which have the support and advocacy of its preachers and leaders.

THE ORIGIN OF THE MOVEMENT.

The origin of this movement is so generally known, that that point needs no extended reference. It is a fund to commemorate the Jubilee of our Missionary Society. We claim to be the offspring of missionary zeal and effort. Revivalism made our Church; and the early years of our history witnessed a succession of great religious revivals, of signal missionary triumphs. Every circuit was then a missionary society of energy and effectiveness. And in this way singularly successful missionary work was done. Circuits multiplied and divided, and then multiplied and divided again. From 1810, when the Connexion was founded, to 1843, the community had reached the gratifying total of about 80,000 members. It was then felt that the missionary work of the Connexion should be organised, its administration consolidated, and its maintenance made a common concern; and in that year the Missionary Society for the entire Connexion was formed. Fifty years—years of splendid work in many lands, followed. We maintained in vigour our Canadian Missions till they got strong enough almost for independence, and eventually they helped to form the Methodist Church of Canada—one of the healthiest and most progressive branches of the great Methodist family throughout the world to-day. We maintained numerous missions in Australia, till they, too, are strong enough to join hands with the other sections of Methodism to form the United Church of the Methodism at the Antipodes. We opened missions in South Africa that have had exceptional success, under the able ministry that we have supplied to them—John Smith, John Watson, G. E. Butt—and now Aliwal North is one of the largest and most prosperous circuits of the Connexion. We opened missions in West Africa—with which the names of Burnett, Maylott, Welford, Luddington, Blackburn and many others are connected—that have wielded an immense influence for good on that coast. And now we have gone into the centre of the dark Continent with a pioneer missionary party—under the leadership of the heroic Buckenham, whom God has called home, and the not less heroic Baldwin, who is still with us, and who, we hope, has yet many years of successful missionary work before him. That is an inspiring record of missionary toil and success, and well worthy of a Jubilee Missionary Fund. So we thought; so we proposed; and so we have carried out.

THE EARLIER PROPOSAL OF A CHAPLAIN LOAN FUND.

Prior to the Jubilee year, 1893, a young minister, perhaps of greater zeal than discretion, proposed in the Bradford Conference (1889) the raising of a Great Chapel Loan Fund to assist in the more speedy liquidation of the debts on our chapels and schools. He named the sum of £50,000. To many it seemed absurdly large—not too large, or large enough for the urgent needs of the Connexion, but much too large in the judgment of many for the resources of the Connexion to supply. "Heads of houses" looked somewhat askance at the proposal as the vision of a young enthusiast. Well! young men see visions, and old men dream dreams. The project, however, was launched, and under a most encouraging promise by Mr. W. P. Hartley to give five per cent. on all the Connexion would raise towards that object up to £50,000, several thousand pounds were obtained.

THE PROPOSED EXTENSION OF THE COLLEGE.

Then in 1892 it was found necessary to enlarge the College for the training of young men for our ministry, at Manchester, and about three thousand pounds were promised for that object. So that when the Conference of that year met, and unanimously approved the raising of a fund of £5,000 to celebrate the Jubilee of our Missionary Society, there were three schemes before the community, each important, each appealing for support to the same constituency at the same time, and each having its special supporters and advocates. A little reflection showed the extreme unwisdom of permitting these competitive, if not conflicting, schemes to proceed on these independent lines; and after friendly conference on the subject, it was determined to unify the proposals and combine them into one appeal with such division of the proceeds as might be determined on. The sum of £50,000 was named as the amount to be aimed at, and the Rev. James Travis (President of Conference), with W. P. Hartley, Esq., and Rev. T. Mitchell, were appointed a Deputation to visit the Districts and Circuits of the Connexion in support of it.

THE OBJECTS TO BE ASSISTED.

The objects to be assisted, it was decided, should be fourfold, and the amount raised was to be given in equal proportions to these objects. (1.) The Missionary Fund, partly foreign, in the opening of new stations in Africa, and partly home, in the extension of our work in large towns and rural districts. (2.) The Chapel Loan Fund, which was now to be absorbed in the larger movement, and the amounts promised and paid to this object were to be credited to the donors in any help they might give to the united scheme. (3.) The extension of the College, which it was thought might cost £5,000 or £6,000, and such a balance it was hoped might be obtained after meeting this cost as could be invested to secure a permanent source of income to the institution. To the new scheme, Mr. W. P. Hartley promised the princely donation of £5,000; and by arrangements made later, at the Edinburgh Conference, he generously undertook to defray the entire cost of the College enlargement, carrying out the plan on a much more imposing and costly scale, and involving an additional liability to himself, beyond his gift to the Jubilee Fund, of about £7,000. (4.) The Superannuated Preachers, Widows and Orphans' Fund, which unfortunately had incurred a considerable debt of about £3,000. These were all objects of great interest and importance to Connexional life and progress; and whilst individual preference for one or other found expression occasionally in different parts of the land, there was general and very commendable unanimity in according support to the scheme as a whole.

THE COMMENCEMENT MADE.

Having decided on the plan and objects of the Fund, it was felt it would be wise to begin at once with the members of the Conference then assembled. The amounts already promised, or in hand towards the Chapel Loan Fund and College enlargement projects, formed a valuable nucleus around which others could gather. The very inspiring offer of £5,000 from Mr. W. P. Hartley, the Treasurer of the General Missionary Fund, gave the movement an immense impetus. A direct appeal made to the members of the Conference and the hearers present, and by letter and telegram to friends in all parts of the land, brought an immediate and most generous response; so that before the Conference closed, about one-third of the entire amount, or something over £16,000 had been promised.

THE DEPUTATION WORK.

The splendid outburst of generosity at the Norwich Conference certainly marked an epoch in our history. It came as a great revelation to ourselves and to other Churches. With such an excellent commencement the Deputation started on their "financial pilgrimage," or as some have called it, their "revival mission;" and they visited during the course of the year, most of the principal centres of the Connexion. Happily the response was usually prompt and generous, and in all, over £46,000 was promised. The measure of support accorded to the movement varied considerably, as perhaps might have been expected. In some districts there was much better organisation, much more enthusiasm and much readier and larger response than in others; but all the districts did something, and in some of the poorer agricultural circuits the contributions were most cheerfully and generously given.

THE FIVE YEARS' INSTALMENT PLAN.

It was arranged that any amount promised might be paid in annual instalments covering five years. This arrangement has undoubtedly its advantages, as it enables donors to give more largely than might be possible if the amount were wanted all at once. But its disadvantages are not small. The term is too long. Many things may happen in five years—deaths, reverses, alienations, etc., and these all affect the final result. Most careful and vigilant local organisation is necessary, and conscientiousness on the part of those who promise. And however enthusiastically the movement may be supported in its initial stages, it is not easy to retain all this warmth to the end. Still, with all its disadvantages, this method has secured considerable success, as the cash actually received proves.

THE ECONOMY OF ADMINISTRATION.

It should be said also, that the Fund has been managed on most economical lines. It is usually understood that Primitive Methodism can secure as much work for as small an expenditure as any Church in existence; and certainly the history of this movement will do much to confirm that opinion. As the cash has been paid in year by year, it has been carefully invested with the Chapel Aid Association, and the accruing interest used to meet working expenses; and as a result of this arrangement it was reported to the last Conference that not only had the interest alone met all expenses, but that there was the splendid balance of £1,200 available from that source alone for the general fund. We imagine that this is an experience altogether unique in any effort of this kind; and it should inspire every contributor with the fullest confidence in the executive of this great movement. The effect of it is that every donation ever given to the Fund—the small gift of the poorest widow amongst us—is available without any deduction whatever, at the close of the work for the purpose for which it was given.

CAN THE FUND BE COMPLETED?

A question that is agitating not a few of the best friends of the Connexion is, "Can we complete the work by raising the full amount?" It would be extremely gratifying if this could be done, especially in view of the success of similar projects in other Free Churches. The Methodist New Connexion, though little more than one-sixth our numerical strength, have recently raised a fund of over ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS. The Baptist Church is just inaugurating a Twentieth Century

Fund for projects of extension of TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND GUINEAS. This is five times the amount we have asked for, and there is every prospect that it will be raised. The Congregational Union has committed itself to the raising of a Twentieth Century Fund of FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND GUINEAS, for the enlargement of the work in various departments. This is more than ten times the sum we have desired, but so far failed, to reach. Whilst our Wesleyan Methodist friends are vigorously at work raising their Twentieth Century Fund of ONE MILLION GUINEAS, or twenty-one times as large as our Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund. In view of these magnificent efforts of sister Free Churches, our movement seems comparatively insignificant, and certainly ought to be completed without delay. Either our resources are much smaller than we believe them to be, or we have less loyalty to our own Church than our neighbours have to theirs, or there is less power of initiative and organisation amongst us than amongst them, or we are less large-hearted and liberal. We do not like to admit the validity of any of these inferences, and yet some of them are inevitable if this Fund fails of full success. In any case, our brethren of other Churches are setting us most inspiring examples of noble generosity in contributing to the enlargement of the Lord's Kingdom amongst us; and we must either fall into line, or lag behind, with all the weakness, and possibly discredit, of such a position.

THE FINAL APPEAL AND ANSWER.

At the recent Conference at Grimsby it was reported that the total amount actually raised and paid, inclusive of Mr. Hartley's entire gift to the College Extension Fund, was now £48,000. As this brought us within measurable distance of the amount originally named, it was thought prudent to at once arrange to complete the work by raising the balance of £2,000. As the gift of Mr. Hartley was just twenty-five per cent. of the entire amount raised, he very generously promised to extend that proportion to the full sum named, and give a further sum of £500 if the balance of £1,500 could be at once arranged for. This spirited offer was promptly accepted, and the representatives of the districts engaged, on behalf of the districts they represented, to raise the amount needed to complete the work. A few private gifts also supplemented these district promises; so that when these sums are paid in, the top-stone of this financial edifice, to the great gratification of all concerned, will have been brought on. When these arrangements were completed the Conference joined heartily in singing the doxology, as an expression of its devout thankfulness to the Giver of all good, for the success with which the work has been crowned.

WHAT WILL BE ITS GENERAL RESULTS?

It is, perhaps, too soon to speak of the effect of this specific work on our Church life and progress in the future, and especially on similar proposals—say the Centenary Fund of the Connexion—which cannot be far ahead. It will form, no doubt, a worthy memorial of half a century of heroic missionary work, at home, in the colonies, and in Africa, that has been done by the ministry and laity of our Church. It will, it is hoped, foster the spirit of Connexional loyalty, making us feel that we are “members one of another,” and that the larger enterprises of the Church as a whole are but the outcome of the individual piety, devotion and generosity of the members that form it. It will enlarge our resources for several departments of our work, notably the speedier reduction of our trust debts, the training of men for the ministry, and for the founding of new interests, and the building of new chapels in the growing suburbs of our large towns. And it will surely prepare the way for a Great Centenary Fund to celebrate the hundred years of the Connexion's history—probably the most remarkable hundred years, commercially, politically, or religiously, in the Christian era—which shall be a memorial worthy in every way, in magnitude, in enthusiasm, and in success of one of the most remarkable evangelistic movements of the last nineteen centuries. We may surely anticipate that the success of our present work will supply the seeds from which shall come a much larger and more abundant harvest of blessing and of power for the generations that may follow us.

Light of Other Days.

HOW A "COMPOUND OF MISERY AND MISCHIEF" BECAME A CLERGYMAN.

BY REV. J. VAUGHAN,

AUTHOR OF "LIFE STORIES OF REMARKABLE PREACHERS," ETC.

AT the house of Mr. George Catlett, not far from Chatham, in 1725, a pious woman, the wife of a seafaring man by the name of Newton, gave birth to a son who was her only child. And like Hannah, she gave him to the Lord as soon as he was born, intending him for the Christian ministry. She called his name

John, and watching over him with all the assiduity of a Christian mother, she stored his mind with useful knowledge, and instilled into his mind the principles of the Christian religion.

The child became a quick learner. Before he had completed his fourth year he understood English, and could read correctly in any commonplace book; and in his sixth year he began to learn Latin. But before he was seven his mother died, and being left to his own will, he began to mingle with children who were careless and profane, and very soon he copied their example, and became headstrong and wayward. Soon after his father's second marriage, which took place before the boy was eight years old, he was sent to a boarding-school in Essex, and as a Latin scholar he soon took the highest place in his class. And before he was eleven he was taken by his father to sea.

His father, who was a high-spirited man, had been educated in Spain, and was much given to Spanish airs and Spanish manners. And such was his conduct and bearing towards his son as to overawe him and fill him with dread. In fact, his father's conduct soured him, and he became very wicked. When from under his parent's eye he frequently gave way to fits of passion, and indulged freely in cursing and swearing. At this time he was exceedingly unhappy.

But the prayers of the poor boy's departed mother seem to have been heard, and God seems to have watched over him with a special care. When on shore one day, after having taken several voyages, he had a narrow escape of being killed by falling from a horse. On another occasion he agreed with a companion to seek employment on board a man-of-war. His companion succeeded, but he failed. The vessel was upset and his companion drowned. These and other Providential interferences seem to have troubled his conscience, and for two years he tried to mend his ways. But unfortunately, about this time the second volume of Shaftesbury's "Characteristics" fell into his hands; this, with the company of a vile young seaman whose acquaintance he had made, nearly ruined him.

In 1742, a Liverpool merchant arranged with young Newton's father to send the youth, then about sixteen years of age, to Jamaica. With this arrangement the lad was highly pleased. But as there were a few days intervening between the ratifying of this agreement and the time of sailing, the father sent his son into Kent on business, giving him strict orders to be in Liverpool ready to join his ship on the fourth day. On reaching Kent the youth made for the house in which he had lived when a child, and in which his mother died. Now the occupant of this house, Mr. Catlett, the host and friend of the lad's departed mother, had two charming daughters, with the elder of whom, a girl of sixteen, the young sailor became so enamoured that, instead of reaching Liverpool in three days as he intended, he did not get there for three weeks; and when he got there the vessel had gone. And such was the impression this Kentish girl had made upon the lad's mind that she was never out of his thoughts many hours together for seven years. In fact he seems to have lived for her, and her alone. With the youth's conduct both the merchant and the father were much displeased. Soon after this, young Newton took a voyage to Venice. In this city he was troubled with dreadful dreams, which brought back to his mind the serious impressions which he received when a child under the tuition of his mother. But the impressions were of short duration.

In December, 1743, he returned to England, and as soon as possible he paid a second visit to Kent, where he foolishly prolonged his stay three weeks instead of three days, as before. With this conduct his father was exceedingly angry, having again had his designs thwarted.

In the course of a few days this young scapegrace entered the navy, and soon found himself on board the Harwich, a war-vessel at the Nore, and, through the influence of his father, he was at once made a midshipman. Unfortunately, the morals of the sailors with whom he associated were exceedingly low, and having no one to guide him, he soon fell into their dissolute habits, became inattentive to his duties, and incurred the displeasure of the captain. In the December following, the Harwich was in the Downs, bound for the East Indies. The captain, being somewhat reconciled, gave him liberty to go ashore for one day, but instead of returning to his ship at the close of the day, he hired a horse and foolishly rode at break-neck speed to the residence of his Kentish girl, and with her he stayed until New Year's Day. By this rash act he lost the little respect the captain had for him, and could never recover it.

At the appointed time his vessel formed part of a large fleet which sailed from Spithead. On the coast of Cornwall the Harwich and some other vessels encountered a severe storm, and had to put back to Plymouth. While at Plymouth he was one day ordered to take a boat and see that none of the people deserted. But instead of faithfully attending to his duty, he betrayed his trust, and was the first to desert the ship. This he did with a view of meeting with his father who was at Torbay, hoping thereby to obtain a berth on some vessel belonging to the African Company, with which his father was connected. On his way to Dartmouth, however, after walking all one day and part of the next, to his great consternation, he was met by a small party of soldiers who eyed him with the greatest suspicion; and as they could not be deceived and would not be bribed, they brought him back to Plymouth and marched him through the streets, guarded like a felon. If ever a man's heart was filled with indignation, shame and fear, it was the heart of Midshipman Newton on that occasion. They kept him in the guard-house for two days, and then sent him to his ship. By order of the captain he was kept in irons for a time, and then stripped and publicly whipped and degraded from his office. At the same time the men received strict orders to show him no favour, and not even to speak to him. How true it is that "the way of transgressors is hard!"

The voyage was for five years, and instead of being humble, penitent and dutiful, with a determination to retrieve, as far as possible, the respect of officers and men, he was not only sullen, passionate and revengeful, but he actually formed designs against the captain's life! And when his designs were frustrated he contemplated taking his own life by jumping into the sea.

But now an unexpected change came over the scene. This degraded midshipman had a longing desire to go to Africa instead of India; and when his ship reached Madeira, to his surprise, the commander of a Guinea vessel sent two seamen to the Harwich requesting the captain to give him two in exchange. No sooner did young Newton hear of this than he begged, in an almost breathless manner, to be allowed to be one of the two to be given in exchange. The captain granted his request, and in a few minutes he found himself on board a vessel bound for Sierra Leone.

On board this ship he met with a man who owned a fourth part of the vessel, and who had made a large sum of money in the slave trade; and so inflamed was the young sailor with this trader's description of slavery as a money-making system, that he obtained his discharge for the purpose of entering this man's service. No terms were entered into; Newton trusted to the man's generosity, expecting to be justly treated, and hoping to make a fortune in course of time by dealing in slaves. But at this time none could be poorer than he, for having received no pay for his services on board this trading vessel, he presently landed on the island of Bananas quite penniless. In fact, he possessed nothing more than the garments he wore. For about a year he served his new master, the slave dealer, upon this and the adjacent islands; and but for the dislike manifested towards him by the big black woman with whom the man lived as his wife, Newton would have been quite comfortable. But for no reason whatever, this woman seems to have been prejudiced against him from the first, and always treated him unkindly. When he was ill with a burning fever, in the absence of her husband, she made him sleep on a hard board with a mat for a covering and a log for a pillow. And when he began to recover and needed food, she nearly starved him, though she lived in plenty herself. And when the poor fellow was strong enough, he was glad to crawl to the plantation and eat raw roots. On his master's return, he complained to him of this woman's conduct, but so far from believing his statement, which the woman contradicted, the man himself became nearly as cruel as his wife. The poor friendless lad was often kept whole days without food, and as for clothes, he had a shirt and a pair of trousers, but nothing more. A cotton handkerchief sometimes served him for a cap, and a small piece of cotton cloth for a coat. At this time he usually washed his shirt on the rocks in the dead of the night, and put it on wet that it might dry while he slept. His sufferings, in fact, at this period were almost unbearable. Occasionally he wrote to his father, and sometimes he snatched a few minutes to look into Barrow's "Euclid," the only book he possessed. And now another turn in his remarkable history took place. He left the service of this cruel couple as soon as possible, and entered the service of another trader, by whom he was better treated. He had been in this man's employment about three months when the captain of a trading vessel from England inquired for him, having received strict orders from his father to bring him home. In February, 1747, young Newton boarded this man's vessel. But as the captain was in search of gold, ivory, dyer's wood, and bees-wax, it took him nearly a year to collect a cargo, and in so doing he coasted away nearly 1,000 miles farther from England. After having several hair-breadth escapes of being drowned at sea, or eaten by wild beasts when on shore, our young friend set sail for home, a distance of 7,000 miles, in January, 1748. The vessel, however, having long been exposed to sun and wind in a hot climate, was very unfit for service. All went well for a time, and as Newton overhauled a few books that were on board, he found a copy of Stanhope's "Thomas a Kempis," which he carelessly took up and read. He was exceedingly wicked at this time, and he boasted in his wickedness; but the reading of this book made an impression that he could not shake off. Shortly after this they were overtaken by a severe storm in which they all nearly lost their lives. And so disastrous was the voyage home, that the captain lost his temper, and knowing the character of young Newton, he declared several times that there was no chance of saving the ship till he was thrown overboard. All this time, unknown to the captain, Newton was coming to his senses, and had already begun to pray. On the 8th of April, in a fearfully shattered state, they managed to reach Lough Swilly in Ireland, where they anchored. By this time this ungodly young seaman had become a true penitent, and was anxious to obtain pardon. His father had now set sail for Hudson's Bay, where he was accidentally drowned, so John saw him no more.

From Lough Swilly Newton went to Londonderry to recruit his health, and here he attended prayers at church, decided to be a Christian, and received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. At Liverpool in May, 1748, the gentleman whose ship had brought him home, offered him the command of a vessel, which he respectfully declined. But after obtaining a promise from the Kentish girl to be his wife on his return home, he engaged himself as the mate of a vessel and sailed to Guinea.

In January, 1750, he was again in Liverpool, and as soon as convenient he again made for the residence of the Kentish girl, Miss Mary Catlett, and on the 1st of February he had the happiness of making this excellent young lady his wife. He shortly after took the command of a vessel from Liverpool to Africa, with a crew of thirty. He set his men a good example in all things, established public worship on board, and himself officiated twice every Sunday by reading the Liturgy. The Bible now became his companion, and much of his leisure time was spent in the study of Latin, Mathematics, etc. He soon became acquainted with the best classics, and among the religious works he read were Scougal's "Life of God in the Soul," Hervey's "Meditations Among the Tombs," and the "Life of Colonel Gardiner," all of which were very helpful to him.

His first voyage as commander was completed in fourteen months; he was then put in command of a new vessel and sent to Africa again. All his leisure time was spent in reading and study as before.

In August 1753, he again arrived in Liverpool, and after a rest of six weeks, was sent a third time to Africa. During this voyage illness tried his faith and drew him nearer to God. He was now much given to meditation, and he spent whole hours in prayer.

In August, 1754, he returned to Liverpool, and thus his seafaring life ended, for this proved to be his last voyage. In all these voyages he had been engaged in the slave trade, and what was most remarkable, he had no scruples of conscience as to its lawfulness, though he often saw something of its cruelty. He was within two days of sailing again on the same business, when illness frustrated his intention. And strange to say, the man who took his place, and several of the crew, died during the voyage, and it was with great difficulty the ship was brought home.

Gabriel's "Call."

It was a quiet evening in early Spring, and the fisher-folk from Rocquaine Bay in Guernsey were making their way to Les Adams Methodist Chapel, for there the annual meeting was to be held en faveur des missions à l'étranger (for foreign missions). The small, cheerful chapel was well filled, and scattered here and there throughout the congregation were members of several old country families, adherents of "the cause." The deputation was from France, and he delighted his audience with his vivacity, eloquence and bonhomie; he gave vivid accounts of his own hard-working experience in the south of France, and appealed earnestly for interest and help in all foreign mission work.

Now it chanced that a certain young farmer was present—an indiscriminate worshipper at church and chapel; from his mother, long since dead, he inherited a strong leaning towards Methodism, but he was under the spell of a gay "church" girl, to whom he was engaged. His father, a staunch churchman, favoured the match, for Georgette Allaire had des doubles (money); and till this evening, Gabriel Breton had never doubted but that his path in life lay through a prosperous region of farming, whereby he was to amass any amount of golden franc pieces. But, as he listened to the appeals of the warm-hearted French minister, a something strange and sweet awoke in his heart, a new-born desire to give himself to distinctive work for others; for the poor, simple creatures in foreign lands who sorely needed help for body and soul. He had a knack of nursing, and a care for sick people which was well known throughout the surrounding parishes; and it struck him forcibly this evening that his skill in sick nursing might be of use in the mission field.

But what a daring suggestion confronted him! Who was he that he should dare to contemplate becoming a minister? He—not even a Methodist—bah! the thing was impossible! And yet, as the meeting increased in fervour, Gabriel's desires turned absolutely towards this work: and with a sudden shock he heard the deputation suggest that Les Adams should send forth one of her sons to the foreign mission field; thus would she feel a specially kindled interest in the extension of this great branch of Methodist effort. With a quickly beating heart Gabriel Breton left the chapel when the meeting was over and walked back to his beautiful old home, not far from the parish church of Saint Sauveur. As he lifted the latch of the door and entered the spacious kitchen where his father sat smoking his pipe, the clock struck nine.

"You are early to-night from the Allaires," said Mess' Breton, knocking the ashes out of his pipe.

"I've not been to see Georgette; it's that I've been to the chapel at Les Adams, there was a missionary meeting."

"Ah!" ejaculated Mess' Breton, with no great interest, "your poor mother, she liked those meetings; she used to say sometimes, that she'd have no greater joy than to see you grow up to be a missionary in foreign lands."

A keen joy smote Gabriel's heart. Surely this night was an eventful one! What did it all mean? What vision of greatness hovered before him? His brain was in a whirl: he must get away to his own room and think; so, rising suddenly, he wished his father good night and stumbled up the circular stone staircase to his room. There he fought with himself, the self of the morning and of the days of his commonplace life; and he contested every inch of the ground. He had always been a good and sweet-tempered fellow, full of a pride in his family name that kept him pure and temperate in the midst of loose companions; and he had always been an observer of Sunday worship. But he had never finally and openly declared himself as a follower of Christ. To-night—his heart and soul went out in love and adoration to the Master; his eyes were opened, and once and forever he decided to serve fully where he saw clearly. Then, as he prayed and meditated, he knew that he must take, at once, the initial step towards missionary work; he must speak to the superintendent minister of the circuit on the morrow, as to the possibility of his being admitted to "class." He fell asleep at last, with a peaceful heart and a determined will.

Much as he dreaded the morrow's interview, it passed off with help to himself and his new life, and with entire satisfaction to the superintendent, who read the fine nature of the young man in his modesty and candour. And now Gabriel had to face his sweetheart, and declare to her the new departure his life had taken. It was late evening before he could start for Les Portelets, the home of Georgette at Saint-Pierre-du-bois; and when he opened the door at the farm he found the family at supper. Thus he was compelled to pass a restless half-hour before he could see Georgette alone; but at last he whispered, "I've something to tell you, let's go out of doors."

Georgette nodded and followed him out to the lane before the house; he led the way up a steep incline to a wooden gate overlooking a slope of fields, misty and silvery in the moonlight.

"It's not cold, let's stop here," he said huskily, "it's that I have something important for to tell you, Georgette."

She drew close to him with a contented sigh, for, of course, it was of their prospects he was going to speak. Taking her hand, he said bluntly,

"I have decided to join the Methodists and go to class."

"Well!" she laughed, "that's nothing, so long as you don't ask me to join them too. I like church best—me!"

"It isn't that I've anything against the church; it's that, well, the truth is, Georgette, I've also decided to be a missionary, and there'll be studying to do, and perhaps, later, college—in England."

"Gabriel!" she interrupted, "what rubbish are you talking? A missionary! Are you mad? And what about me? And your father, what does he say, him?"

"He doesn't know yet; I've come to tell you first. But it won't make such a difference to you, chérie; there'll only be a little longer to wait before we marry, that's all."

"That's all! that's all! Well, I call you a cool one, Gabriel Breton! You expect me to wait for you, perhaps years and years, and then go out to foreign lands to be eaten by wild beasts, or be killed by savages!"

He smiled at her frowning face, though he was grievously disappointed in her. "Nonsense, Georgette, you will like it, helping the poor heathen people. As you know, I have money of my own, and with yours, too—we'll be very comfortable."

"You take it for granted I'm going, Mess Breton!" she said pettishly, turning away from him.

"Georgette!" he cried, "what do you mean? We belong to each other, you and me——"

"We did—yes. But I don't like this nonsense of yours; tell me, Gabriel, what put it into your head?"

He was a reserved man, and it cost him not a little to tell her the sacred experience he had lived through during the past few days; but feeling that such an explanation was her due, he dashed forward with his account. She listened with incredulous stare; her beautiful eyes fixed coldly on his glowing face.

"But," she said, when he stopped speaking, "it's all very sudden this, I didn't know you were so religious. Là! I'm taken by surprise that you set yourself up above us others!"

He clenched his fist at her inability to grasp his meaning.

"Ah, Georgette, you don't understand! Look! It isn't that I wish to set myself above others, it's that I have decided to be a Christian, and it's that something—I can't tell you what—calls me, calls me to foreign lands; perhaps it is my mother's prayers," he added under his breath.

Suddenly she veered round, and with all the coquetry and bewitchment of which she was past mistress, she tried to cajole him into the abandonment of his plans. But it was useless: the new life was already too deeply rooted to be eradicated, and Georgette at last burst out crying, and declared that he did not love her any more, and that she would never marry him if he gave up farming. In vain he tried to re-assure and soothe her; she was inconsolable; and at last he was forced to leave her in tears at the farm-door. Promising to see her the next evening, he hurried home to break his unwelcome news to his father, for he desired to have the worst over all at once. But he was not prepared for his father's anger and contempt, as he refused to believe in his son's plans. A gulf of separation sprang up between the two; and it was many days before Mess Breton became reconciled, after a halting, sullen fashion, to his son's unalterable decision.

Doggedly, and with perfect good temper, Gabriel stuck to his carefully prepared plan of campaign. He studied with one of the ministers of the circuit, in order to prepare for his examinations; he found an excellent helper for his father; he neglected nothing that could add to the old man's comfort; he worked early and late at his theology, and, at last, the day came when he was to leave Guernsey for the theological training college at Richmond.

And Georgette? She played fast and loose with him; sometimes she was pliable and sweet, and went so far as to lay plans for their future life; at other times she sulked or stormed. But at last, when he left home for England, her pride seemed to melt away, and she was all that the most ardent lover could desire—with one exception—he grieved constantly over her lack of spirituality, hoping against hope, and praying fervently that her conversion to better things was not far off. He wrote to her every week, and worked feverishly, spurred on with the picture of her lovely face before him, and the thought of his longed-for mission to foreign lands. Thus two years passed; two years of hard work, broken only by short holiday home-comings; and still Georgette played fast and loose with him, till, at the beginning of his third year at Richmond, he was stunned by a cruel blow. She wrote him a little heartless note, stating coolly that he would never be her husband, she was tired of waiting, she hated the thought of his dull life, she shivered when she so often dreamt of the horrible mission field; and besides—well—it was best to be honest—she was on the point of marrying a London man, who had a fine shop in Oxford Street; and she was not meant to be religious, her! Not a word of regret, not a word of Gabriel—it was a letter overflowing with herself.

But even in his heart of hearts he never uttered a word against her: whatever she was, he loved her, that was enough. Only there was all the more reason to throw himself into the hardest study. He sat up late and rose early; he worked more doggedly than any other man of his time; and he imagined that he did not feel the strain, till suddenly he was attacked by violent headache, that incapacitated him for work. Then, one memorable morning, Mess' Breton received a telegram instead of his usual letter from his son. The old man tore open the red envelope with dread. Gabriel was very ill, brain fever was feared, brought on by overwork and some shock to the nervous system.

Mess' Breton never thought of going to Richmond, he was too conservative for that; but he had telegrams sent him twice a day, and could settle to no work, till after weary days, the crisis was past, and Gabriel was pronounced out of immediate danger. Convalescence was extremely slow; and months dragged by before the invalid was allowed to go home. When he arrived, a white, thin sufferer, Mess' Breton could hardly believe he saw his own son, formerly so strong and brown.

"Father," said Gabriel, a few nights after his arrival, "it is best to tell you the truth about myself; it's that I am worse than you think."

The old man cleared his throat, "Bah! when the warm weather comes, you'll be all right and go back to the college, and—and—well, I am pleased for you to be a missionary after all—là!"

"Ah, father, that's good news to me, to think you're glad; but don't you understand? I'll never be a missionary—I have come home to die in the old place."

"It's her that's done it, it's that Georgette, and the college to England!" cried the old man in bitter grief.

"No, no, father, it's not them—and yet it is them: but, after all, it is the Will of God. . . It's easier to bear when I think of it like that. But, dear father, let's be quiet and happy together in these last days of mine."

"BUT IT WON'T MAKE SUCH A DIFFERENCE TO YOU, chérie."

The stern old man bowed his head, and from that hour he was docile as a child, and wholly wrapped up in caring for his son; and the days and weeks went by. Then, one day, Gabriel received a letter from Richmond College, a letter that brought the blood to his cheeks and the fire to his eyes.

"Father," he cried, "the other fellows have got their 'calls' to the mission field! If I had been there I'd have got mine. Father, do this one last thing for me! Come with me to Richmond. It's a grand time there now."

And the old man could not refuse his son. The farm was left in competent hands, and the two men, the one so hale and well, the other dying daily, went off to Richmond College for the great day. The relatives of the men who were "called" were present, and the great hall was packed with people, whose proud faces and tearful smiles told how they loved the lads bound for foreign parts. A thrill of intense feeling passed over the crowd as the students sang with fervour, and as with one mighty voice, sweet and clear, the missionary parting hymn:

"Blest be the dear uniting love,
That will not let us part!
Our bodies may far off remove,
We still are one in heart."

Then, arm-in-arm, in a phalanx, the men moved through the grounds, to escort their departing comrades to the college gates, where shouts of rejoicing and cries of farewell rent the air. And in the midst of the excitement was Gabriel Breton, none more loved, none more honoured, than he, who had received his "call" too—a "call" of infinite, awful significance, but of sweetness unutterable to his child-like soul of submission.

When the ceremony was over and he had rested awhile, he startled his father with a sudden determination to go up to "town" the next day and see Georgette.

"But, my son," stammered the old man, "I suppose she doesn't know you've been ill. She'll be startled."

"She will not see me," Gabriel said quietly, "I always know about her through a friend; and I hear she is always in her husband's shop about eleven of a morning. I'll be able to see her by looking in at the door, perhaps. I'd like to chance it, father!"

Of course the old man agreed, though he thought it a mad scheme; and Georgette, in her beauty and arrogance, little knew, as she laughed and jested with the customers in her husband's shop, that her old lover was gazing at her with eyes of tenderest devotion and a pure heart of prayer for her happiness.

This last pilgrimage made, they went home together to the farm in Guernsey; and the night of their arrival, as the father sat beside his dying son, Gabriel started up in bed, his face bright with unearthly beauty, "Father! Listen! It's my 'call' to the work! The fellows are singing—

"Blest be the dear uniting love."

It's my turn. Good-bye, adi, mon père. Adi, adi, Georgette—chérie—"

And with her loved name on his lips he fell back dead.

A Holiday Tour in Norway.

BY REV. GEO. ARMITAGE.

THE usually high anticipations with which one looks forward to the annual holiday were, in the case of our Norwegian Tour, by no means over-estimated. Norway is the land of Fjord, Fos and Fell,—of placid, deep, black waters and inaccessible mountains, forest-clad and towering snow-capped into the blue. It is a veritable "land of dreams."

For weeks prior to the cruise, there had been the delight of reading up its myths, legends and history. We had become acquainted with its fisheries, forests and shipping; and went open-eyed to its incomparable scenery, and curious to come into contact with its quaint customs and its simple-hearted and hardy people.

This land of the imaginative Ibsen and the intrepid explorer, Nansen, has fortunately been brought within something like easy access of the tourist, and as a perfect rest for fagged brain-workers, surely it is the ideal spot! Newspapers, telegrams, letters are left far behind, and day after day is spent on deck of the steamer skimming in and out of the delightful fjords, or in visiting, in easy-going stolkejarres, the thundering waterfalls and the majestic mountains. One seems to be living all the time in the open air.

Our party of four embarked on the "Polytechnic" Steam Yacht Ceylon, at Harwich one bright Saturday afternoon in June, and very quickly the shores of Old England faded from our sight. Oh, what an experience when we tried our hands—and feet as well—at getting into a top berth! What "land-lubbers" we were! When we had successfully found our way into the narrow shelf-like bed and settled down to—not sleep, but to listen helplessly to the thump, thump of the engines and the horrid grinding of the screw; didn't one wish oneself at home again!

Sunday morning, however, with its brightness and freshness, made one quickly forget the troubles of the night. In the early morning we met in the ladies' cabin for prayers, and twice, later in the day, most of the passengers assembled on the deck for worship. Churchmen, Methodists and Congregationalists gathered together in one company, and as one looked out across the sparkling sea, and up into the blue above, it was not difficult to realise how near the Divine Father is to those who "worship Him in spirit and in truth." True, there were many vacant chairs at the dinner and tea table that day, for many were giving a private reception to gruff old Neptune, and paying him in secret their lowly tribute. For most of the passengers, however, the Sabbath on the deep passed happily and restfully away.

On Monday morning was sighted the low-lying land of the South West coast of Norway, and with that view, as the genial captain said, the "Doctor came on board." Even the invalids cheered up as the vessel skirted the land, and as the sailors prepared the steam-launch which was to take us ashore.

Soon the important shipping town of Stavanger, with its Dutch-like warehouses and brightly painted wooden houses, lay before us. What fun it was to crowd into the ship's boats to be towed in a long line ashore by the fussy little launch; and what a reception the excited party got from the sturdy-looking crowd assembled on the quay! Soon we were scattered through the quaint streets, visiting the old church with its curiously carved and painted pulpit, and then up to the water tower from which an extensive view of the country was obtained. One's first impression of Norway, as taken from Stavanger, is somewhat disappointing. The scenery is too English-like, soft, undulating, well-wooded and watered; but the streets, shops, manners and appearance of the people kept the few hours full of interest. The snap-shotters were already at work, and who could count the number of plates and films that were used up before that cruise terminated! Watches were put one hour forward, and during the wonderfully light night we were gliding along the smooth waters of the Hardanger Fjord. What an entrancing panorama as one gazed in the early morning through the cabin port-hole! Creeks, mountains, waterfalls, forests, rapidly passed before the eye.

Morning found us at Sundal, our vessel lying apparently in a large lake, locked in by the mountains. The village consisted of about twenty houses, with a small hotel—all of them built of wood. The sun was struggling with the dense masses of mist that rolled about the flanks of the mountains, and excitement rose high amongst the onlookers when at last the snow was seen to lie gleaming in the sun, and clear before one could be seen the famous Bondhus glacier. "In twenty minutes we can walk up to it surely," we said one to another, but that period of time was exhausted before the party had struggled up half-way. Then came the Bondhus Lake, one mile across, deep and icy-cold, which was fed from the snow-fields, and had to be crossed in cranky-looking boats, manned by stolid natives. Immediately followed a stiff but delightful climb through woods and great beds of beech and oak ferns, up to the moraine. The glacier is four hundred feet thick, and of a greenish white colour, lying within the great mountain peak for the length of at least half a mile, and is being squeezed from the great Folgefond snowfield into the valley below. It was a brilliant morning, and the ice caves and immense flanges were lighted up with most exquisite colours, whilst the melting ice spouted from its sides and rushed in a flood from its base. Climbing, by the aid of an alpenstock, to one of its lowest and yet dangerous surfaces, one had the new experience of snowballing amid the heat and blaze of a June sun.

Back again by the side of the foaming torrent, and past the ingeniously constructed little saw mills, the ship's boats were reached. Overtaking a peasant, one of the party asked, "Are there any bears about here?" He slowly shook his head, not understanding the question. "Bruins?" said another, intent on making himself understood. Still no idea was conveyed to the Norseman. "Animals?" a third suggested. "Ani-miles! Oh, yes," pointing with his finger, "from Hotel Sundal to Bondhus Glacier, three and a half Eenglish miles!" So the attempt at conversation had to be given up amid laughter.

Before leaving, a shot was fired from the Ceylon, and the reverberation could be heard for several minutes, then slowly forging ahead, into what certainly appeared to be the mountain side, opening after opening appeared before us, and after several hours, along another arm of the fjord, and still further inland, Norheimsund was reached.

The district there was more pastoral like, the "living green" coming down to the water's edge, and the low rounded mountains were thickly wooded to their summits. Thousands of young people of both sexes were there that day on excursions from the surrounding districts, for the purpose of holding a kind of Norse Chautauqua. Very bright and happy they looked in their holiday attire, and they returned salute for salute with us. Our ringing cheers made them say, "English, English!" and in return for their National anthem, our enthusiastic party sang "God Save the Queen," "Rock of Ages," "All hail the power of Jesu's Name," etc. We then made an excursion along the valley to the fine

Ofthusfoss. The waters here fall from a great height and break into spray before they reach the ground, and the visitor can shelter himself under a huge overhanging ledge of the mountain and gaze upon the waters—if his nerves are strong enough—as it madly rushes in millions of gallons over his head. Who of the party can forget that evening spent at Norheimsund, as the frail native boats, with high sterns and bows, were rowed round and round our steamer by the women and children, whilst the men sat in the stern and steered; and as several of the native maidens boarded our vessel, and with the deepest interest inspected her cabins and saloons!

Soon the screw was revolving and we were off to new delights. It was only when the sailors washed down the decks with the hose pipe that the never-tired passengers turned into their berths. But it was, even then, going to bed in the daylight, for in the summer time in those high latitudes, literally "there is no night there."

Next morning, after a 5.30 breakfast, we were ashore again, at Odde, and one hundred stolkejarres were in readiness to convey the party to the magnificent waterfalls of Lotefoss and Espelandefoss. The stolkejarre is a small conveyance drawn by a sure-footed pony, to accommodate two travellers and the driver, who sits behind. The drive of eleven miles lay upwards along the side of the mountain torrent, past placid and dark lakes, across romantic bridges, and at times immediately under the shadow of mountain peaks 4,000 feet high, clothed with richest verdure and firs, beech and elm.

Then the thundering fall of waters, and the far driving spray announced the falls. Waterproofs and umbrellas had to be called into use as the ponies dashed across the bridges amid the thick spray. The effect beggars description, as the sun made rainbows everywhere upon the spray rising from the boiling and tumbling waters. If words cannot express "Lodore," who can worthily describe the many glories of the triple falls of Lotefoss and Espelandefoss!

Once more on board after an exciting drive along the switchback road, (where recently a German officer lost control over his bicycle and so met his death), the head of the vessel was turned towards the open sea. She was in charge of the experienced pilots who had taken the Emperor of Germany through these dangerous waters, and as the evening drew on we were facing the declining sun and passing through the far-famed Narrows. Imagine the Kyles of Bute a hundred fold increased in beauty and extent, and there is something like a worthy comparison with the Narrows of Norway. Islands, large and small, rose up in all directions, until there at times seemed no possibility of threading our way through them. The mountains were bathed in purple haze, the sky all orange, gold and blue, and the sea of a beautiful light blue—all making up such a picture of beauty as one had never imagined, much less ever before seen. That night it was light enough to read clearly at midnight, and the cabin port-holes had to be blocked up to make one believe it was night.

The following day was without doubt the grandest of all.

Present-Day Prophets and their Messages.

BY JAMES P. LANGHAM.

I.—JOHN PULSFORD, THE MYSTIC.

III.

A GRACIOUS MINISTRY BY CORRESPONDENCE.

INCE writing my last article some friends of Dr. Pulsford have opened for me their cabinets of treasures, and permitted me to look upon their contents—contents to their possessors more precious than gold. The perusal of these letters, so jealously guarded, so affectionately preserved, has been to me a pure pleasure. I have realised while reading them, that rare and rich privilege—the communion of saints. Though I never saw the man who penned them, nor the persons who received them, I have enjoyed a spiritual fellowship which made me say, “Life is worth living, if only to have watched the infoldings and unfoldings of the Divine in the soul of loving John Pulsford.”

Yet some of these letters so carefully preserved refer only to the common matter-of-fact incidents of our every-day life. So strong was the fascination of this great soul for those admitted to his friendship that they treasured every scrap of paper his pen had touched, as if it were fine gold. Great must have been the love that could thus transfigure and immortalise the commonplace.

The letters of Pulsford are necessarily precious to those familiar with his books, because of the additional light they shed on the great themes on which he loved to dwell. Swedenborg taught that, as each earth carries with it its own atmosphere, every person engenders and projects from himself a sphere, which at once protects him from the rude intrusion of the unwelcome, and becomes the medium of true communion with kindred natures. This sphere is the man externalised; for everything within the man feeds and sustains it. The spheres of men differ as the men originating them differ. The spheres of some men are cold and repellent as the hard and selfish natures from which they spring; while those of other men are genial and sweet as the breath of a June morning. In the spheres which men create and carry with them is to be found the secret of the diverse influences which they exert. All who really came within the sphere of John Pulsford's influence felt they had met with a Jesus-like man. This is true, notwithstanding the fact that some men disliked and antagonised him. Such people never entered into the sphere of his life. They could not; for life-spheres cannot mingle unless there be affinity of nature. Yet the man of whom we write ever manifested a Jesus-like disposition towards those who opposed him. The Hull ministers, who excommunicated him from their fellowship, never had to say that he treated them unkindly, or criticised them harshly. When Dr. Campbell attacked him in the pages of the British Standard, a friend sympathisingly expressed his indignation, and almost advised some reply. He smilingly said, "He supposed Campbell had only written what he felt duty and conviction compelled him to write, and therefore it was only for him rather to commend than condemn." Such calmness under bitter attack could only spring from continual communion with Him who said, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." This Jesus-like man had, and has, an ever-increasing number of friends, who are bound to him by subtle chains of love and reverence. Affinity is the key which unlocks the gate of spiritual communion; and when kindred natures discover each other their life-spheres mingle, and they enter into undying friendship. For the establishment of such friendships bodily proximity is not essential, but spiritual agreement is. John Pulsford had many such friends, spiritual brothers and sisters. They treasured the letters of John Pulsford religiously, as memorials of a fellowship which, for a brief space, rendered heavenly the life of earth. Apart from references, which can only be understood by the persons to whom they were addressed, these letters contain sentences which are worthy of the brief immortality which the printed page can give them. In one sense it is unnecessary to print them, because the love and wisdom they enshrine have gained for them an immortality which the printer cannot give or take away. But the persons to whom they were addressed consent to their publication in the hope that others may be drawn within the sphere of the seraphic man who penned them. May such be the case! for he who comes into communion with a Jesus-like man is thereby led into communion with Jesus Himself. In Pulsford's books will be found his messages for the present age, messages brought by him from God, out of the eternities, to show men more clearly the way to the only heaven worth having, the heaven of conscious and abiding fellowship with the source of our being, the great Father-Mother of us all.

A friend asked his counsel on behalf of a seeker after truth. This is his reply.

Jan. 8, 1896.

"I am thankful to hear that my beloved friend enters on the new year in good health; and may that great blessing be hers through all its months. And may she be of good courage, and inspired by the Hope of the ultimate victory over all the evils and sorrows of our degenerate self-hood, and the grand attainment of our Divine self-hood. Deut. xxx. 6; Psa. xxvii. 14; Psa. cxxi. 8.

"Tell your young friend who is 'a seeker after truth,' that Love is greater than Truth, and there is no Truth which is not Love's Truth—of Love, and for Love, and unto Love. Love is 'the bond of perfectness,' both with God and with all our sisters and brothers of the race. 'Love works no ill to the neighbour: therefore Love is the fulfilling of every law.'

"If we walk in Love, we shall have from time to time all the knowledge of Truth that is desirable. The leading of the spirit into all Truth will take ages; and if our hearts are in unity with God, our progress is certain towards ever clearer, broadening, and more harmonious knowledge.

"Think of blossoming spring and all the flowers of the earth, think of the charm and bliss of summer, think of its fruits and fragrance, its singing birds and honey-bees, until you delight in the Infinite Lover, whose nature and character they manifest;—until the inner world of the soul dances for joy before Him.

"Nothing teacheth like Delight. No one ever knows God through the conscience, nor by intellectual searching. But His 'little children' see His face, and rejoice before Him; and are His delight.

"May we be 'little' enough to pass through the strait gate into the Kingdom and home of delights!

"Delight thyself in the Lord and He shall give thee the desire of thy heart."

A much-needed instruction is that which this letter contains. We are all apt to forget that Love is God's gateway to man and man's gateway to God.

In worlds where this truth is universally known there are no theological controversies, and no fierce contentions about the religious instruction of the young; for every child grows up in an atmosphere of love, which makes each truth necessary to its education clear to its mind, just when that truth has become essential to its fuller evolution in the Divine image.

But on this earth, under present conditions, all we can hope for is partial knowledge and limited attainment of heavenly things. Before full knowledge can be the common possession of men, our earth's atmosphere must become open to, and mediative of, heavenly influences, the common air must be continually communicative of heaven's love gifts, and man himself in all things responsive to the touch Divine. Meanwhile, all who follow the angel of Love will be led to the temple of Truth; and those who follow Love undividedly, unreservedly, and absolutely shall come into the Holy of Holies, where Love unveils to wondering eyes Truth's perfect beauty. Pascal said, "Human things must be known to be loved, but Divine things must be loved to be known." The HIGHEST SCIENCE is only possible to the man whom love enfolds, infills, and completely controls.

Let us pass now to another topic. Biblical criticism bulks very largely in the eyes of all earnest readers of the present day; and some persons are puzzled what to do with the problems suggested by the discoveries of the higher critics. They seem in danger of losing the comfort and help of the Bible because they can no longer regard it in all its statements as the accurate transcript of the Divine mind.

To all Christian men the SUPREME AUTHORITY must ever be the MIND OF THE MASTER. The Master does not require any one to hold as sacred, and as of enduring authority, anything which he cannot reconcile with the Master's teaching and spirit. Even of statements made in the sacred books it may be said, "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His."

In support of this position I will give a few extracts from letters now lying at my elbow.

"In reading the 'Old Testament' relegate all that is not Jesus-like to the self-love of the Jews, who were incapable of appreciating true spiritual religion; and could not, and do not, conceive of an impartial, universal, Infinite Father of the human race. What the New Testament does not encourage and endorse has forever passed away. 'If the first had been faultless,' no second would have been needed. 'But finding fault' with Moses and his self-righteous people, Christ condemns his spirit and repeals his hideous laws. See Matt. v. Paul says, speaking of this very subject, 'That which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.'

"Of course, there remain very precious things in the Old Testament—not in the ritualistic priests; but in the prophets and the poets—the Psalms."

In another letter, speaking of the same subject, he says, "The letter of the books we call 'the Bible' is one thing, the spirit of faith and reverence within the letter is another thing. Wheat, the children's bread, is wrapped up in chaff, and we are wrapped up in corruptible flesh. Books cannot be more than partial expressions of 'THE TRUTH,' as a painting representing the sun is distinct from the sun. The most perfect description of bread, or definition of bread, is not bread."

"The Divine Man in the Bosom of God is 'The Truth.' 'I am the Truth'—I am the Ideal of your humanity, and 'I am the Life;' and My Life in them is the Light of men.

"Let us hold our souls sacred to His indwelling, that the ever-ascending flame of His Life may be the top and crown of our powers."

From which statements we learn that the recognition of spiritual truth depends on knowing and obeying Him who said, "I am the Truth."

Men who are guided by the ever-ascending flame of the Christ-life within have no difficulty in recognising in the Hebrew Scriptures that which is Divinely and eternally true; and in rightly appraising that which bears the mark of the perishable thoughts of men.

In the study of the Bible, as in the attainment of personal godliness, Christ is the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

Jesus said to the Jews of His day, "Verily I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world." Again, He said, "I AM THE BREAD OF LIFE; he that cometh to Me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst."

Jesus is saying to the men of this day, Verily, the writers of the Bible do not give you the Word of God; but My Father giveth you the Word from heaven. For the Word of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. I AM THE WORD OF GOD; he that continueth in My Word shall know the truth, and the TRUTH shall make him free.

All devout followers of Jesus find themselves, sometimes, sorely perplexed how to carry out their Master's behests, and how to bear themselves in the evil environment of the present day. The more truly a man is the friend of Jesus Christ the more difficult it will sometimes appear to worthily walk in his Master's steps. At times the depression of spirit, consequent upon weakness and consciousness of failure, is almost unbearable. To one who felt the burden very heavy, Dr. Pulsford thus wrote:

"I love you and your sister, and would breathe strength and rest into your spirits if I could. But the DIVINE MAN, whom we call Lord and Christ, and is our Infinite God expressed and manifested, He, the Firstborn of the Children, breathes Himself into the children for their courage and hope. This is a terrible world to all tender, gentle spirits, whose sensibilities are always keen. To all such the earthly pilgrimage is 'the great tribulation.' 'In the world you shall have tribulation.' The great tribulation is that the world is a huge Pandemonium of corrupt, subtle, self-willed, selfish and competitive spirits: it therefore abounds with everything that is opposite and contrary to God, and His sweet Kingdom of Heaven. But the Divine Man says, 'Be of good cheer.' 'In Me you shall have peace.' 'I have overcome the world.' My human nature has obtained the victory, and is at one with God, and in the order of Eternal Life."

"We must be careful not to give way to depression; for that is the dark element in which the enemy has power. 'Be strong in the Lord;' and defiant against the whole art and power of the enemy. The enemy is very multitudinous; but greater is He who is for us than all that are against us. A little one who nestles in the Bosom of God-man puts ten thousands to flight."

"When your sister feels that a spirit of despondency is stealing over her, let her sit down at the piano and sing some triumphant strain of Love and Joy and Confidence in Christ."

"The DIVINE MAN includes the wisdom of all the theosophies in the world; and a great deal more."

"I speak of the ASCENDED MAN, who is the fulfness of the harmony of all that God is. He is my religion, my wisdom, my glory, my bliss; and His Breath in me will transfigure me and make me like Himself."

What a glorious consummation to contemplate and await; and what divinest rapture to feel the transforming and transfiguring power at work within. The end of God in the salvation of man is seen in the glories of the Ascended Christ. To redeem us from all iniquity, and to conform us to the image of His Son, is God's purpose in redemption. Towards this goal redemptive evolution is continually working; and when once our wills approve and coincide with the Divine will, we learn to say, "I SHALL BE SATISFIED WHEN I AWAKE IN THY LIKENESS."

The divine end in the salvation of the individual is also the end towards which the race is to travel. Meanwhile, let all who feel the call of God to unselfish life draw near to each other that a brotherhood of loving hearts, content to live for their fellows' good, may be established. And may such a confederation as Pulsford saw and prayed for, be soon made actual in the midst of men. I close this paper with his proposals for—

A NEW WORLD-WIDE ORGANISATION.

"The time is come, and is ripe, for a new organisation,—an organisation of humanity irrespective of nationality and religion:—the hearts and minds of men, as men, linked together in mutual and true brotherhood:—open to the good influences of our departed kindred, and waving the pure love-spirit round and round the world, and through and through the whole human race.

"Such a compact of brothers and sisters of all nations, would be able to dictate to the Powers who divide the nations, who foment their prejudices, suspicions, jealousies and animosities; and who hold and defend their divisions, by millions of bayonets, guns of incredibly destructive fury, and naval monstrosities.

"A confederation of loving and pacific men, girdling the earth, and having nothing in view but the common interests of humanity, would soon tell upon the thrones and powers of divided humanity; and make it impossible for them to go on robbing the people of their hard earnings, in order to arm one nation of brothers against another nation of brothers, for purposes of outrage and destruction.

"The Right Fatherly-Motherly, Brotherly-Sisterly Heavens are bending over us, embracing us all, vibrating their spirit night and day through the bosom and brain, reason and Will, of the race, slowly making, and will surely make, a unity below like the unity above.

"For the present, the World, especially Europe, is groaning under her gigantic War-camps. Behind these the millions of Communism, Nihilism, Socialism, Materialism and Atheism, are organising themselves. Political Europe is as surely doomed, as were ancient Egypt, Assyria and Rome.

"Brothers, men of good-will and peace, living in London, Hindoos, Parsees, Jews, Greeks, Mussulmans, Chinese, Japanese, Africans, and Christians of Europe and America,—here you are together in one city. What a grand opportunity you have of triumphing over your divisions, and testifying for your Humanity,—your manifold Humanity.

"Dear Brothers, could you not arrange for an occasional meeting together, in celebration of the essential Unity, which underlies all your distinctions of race and belief?

"Wonderful would be the effect, if once or twice in the year, such a representative assembly came together in friendliness and pure brotherhood, with the One all-embracing Spirit, throbbing in their hearts and beaming in their faces. There need be no speaking; the meeting itself would speak louder than any possible preaching.

"But under the worshipful Inspiration of Music, we might all open ourselves to the Influx of One Spirit of Sympathy, and breathe together for an hour, in Perfect Unity.

"Following it, centres and confederacies of united Humanity would be formed in all the great cities of the World."

The Methodist Minister's Wheel of Fate.

By REV. S. J. WALLIS.

V.—CONCLUDING REVOLUTIONS.

REQUENT change of ministers is often, to the people themselves, of very great advantage. The itinerant principle, like the circulation of the blood in the human body, is the life of Methodism. Water that travels not, stagnates. There may be cases where it is requisite for a minister to stay in his station for six or seven years, but such cases are very rare indeed. On the whole, ministers

"Are like our noble fruits improved
By being transplanted and removed."

Barnabas and Saul knew when their work in Jerusalem was finished, and left. Some ministers don't know as much as the Apostles. It is to the advantage of the whole Church that a minister's gifts, like money capital, should be well circulated. Variation is the order of Nature. Who likes fifty miles of dead level dirt? It is not good for the people to have to live upon food they don't relish, or to have to put up year after year with a round man in a square hole. A minister may be so cold in the pulpit that a small iceberg beside him would seem like a furnace, and who, if he ever stirs up his audience, it is like being stirred up by the North Pole. Would it not be a blessed change to have a large-hearted preacher, whose thoughtful sermons are so bathed in feeling that one after another in the congregation wipes his eyes, and the proud man that does not want to cry blows his nose?

Or the minister may be the Rev. Mr. Thundergust, who roars like one of the bulls of Bashan, and beats more dust out of the pulpit cushion than he does sin out of the hearts of his hearers. Is it surprising the people would like to have a parson who would thunder less and lighten more?

Or it may be one so argumentative that he would dispute with a tombstone as to the truth of its epitaph, or cavil on the ninth part of a hair, and who will not believe that all heads are not made square, and that belief is not always to be worked in like a screw. Would it not be better to have a man with a little more metaphor in his preaching, which is the algebra of language, and which is more effective with the average mind than pure logic? Or it may be one who is continually repeating himself, like some old clock ticking in a cathedral tower; who has always a new text but an old sermon, which is to his hearers like a country lane, where the traveller can see the end from the beginning; who has preached so often and so long about "The wise and foolish virgins," that he has made real old maids of them; and who, if he ever tells an anecdote, it is sure to be one of Noah's old stories which he told to his family in the ark to while away the time till the flood abated. Need we wonder after such sameness and tameness, his hearers are longing for one who can make new things familiar, and familiar things new?

Or it may be a brother who always preaches from his text, so much so that if it had the scarlet fever the sermon would never catch it. Is it not natural for his people to wish for one whose sermon grows out of the text like the oak from the acorn.

Or it may be one who, before he throws a stone at a sin, wants to know who is hiding under it; who, if the landlord of the Dew Drop Inn, (do drop in), is a seat-holder, will deal as tenderly with the drink traffic as a cow with a thistle. Sure the man for such a church is one who will roll the thunders of faithful rebuke as well as breathe the words of sympathy and hope, until the publican, who is a rogue in spirit, and the miller, who is a rogue in grain, and the milkman, who does not put milk enough to his water, and the baker who makes his bread so light that his one pound loaf only weighs twelve ounces, and the lawyer who never tells a lie—outside of business hours, and the grocer who uses long prayers and short weights, are all driven into a corner and made to feel that hell's policeman, with his red-hot truncheon, is after them, to "run them in."

It is well in this matter that once a year our people, without any friction, can be relieved of their ministers if they wish.

We knew a pastor of one of the sister churches who preached year after year to the same congregation, until his sermons, like meats served up too often, had lost their relish and their wholesomeness, and who continued to occupy the pulpit against their wish, and in spite of their efforts to starve him out, until he had made three hundred hearts to beat as one, and was left to preach to a wilderness of empty seats as wooden as himself. True, in making the change, there is the risk of getting out of the proverbial frying-pan into the fire, for while we may succeed a brother, we cannot always replace him; and though we may be a poor preacher, we may be followed by one that is poorer still. The old lady said she had been a member twenty years, and every change of preachers had been for the worse, so that she expected Satan himself would be coming next. But we don't forget that "a poor, dry stick" may set fire to a green one, and if, like Aaron's rod, we get in contact with the Holy of Holies, we may enter the pulpit with a bloom on our garments that breathes of a distant and a purer clime. Nor have we any fear of any great change being made in the itinerant system. The Connexion exists for the whole of its members, and not for a privileged few, and what brings the greatest good to the greatest number is bound to hold the field. And should any serious attempt be made to radically alter it, as sure as death and taxes, from all parts of the Connexion a voice would come pealing like thunder in the ear of the Conference, saying, "Woodman, spare that tree." And sure we are the ministers need no reminder of that ancient brother of the cloth, who had to be well whaled before he would go to Nineveh, for though now and then one may take a plunge into the sea of Baptism, and one find that refuge for the destitute which the Church of England supplies, and another, on receiving a fortune, retire from the work through failing health, yet on the whole they are as loyal to the Connexion as the sunflower to the sun. So that if sent to the poorest of stations, they are enabled, by grace Divine, to spell disappointment with an h— His appointment. And knowing that God's "go" is always followed by, "and I will go with you," bate not one jot of heart or hope, but continue doing their level best to raise the fallen, shield the oppressed, dethrone tyranny, banish ignorance, make earth like heaven, and every man like God, and who, whether living to see the millennium's dawning beauty or dazzling perfection, care not so long as sin is destroyed, truth triumphant, humanity saved, and God's work done.

S. J. WALLIS.

Our Conference Chronicle.

BY THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

The delegates appointed to attend the Conference of this year assembled in the town of Grimsby on June 14th. It is the third time the Conference has met in this Lincolnshire town, and, perhaps, in no other town with the same population does the Connexion occupy a position so influential. The population is only about 60,000, and we have three circuits connected with the town. In these three circuits there are thirty Connexional Chapels, which have cost £38,895, and are valued to-day at £39,275, with a debt of £8,822. The membership of the three circuits numbers 2,156. There are twenty Sunday Schools, with 433 teachers and 3,955 scholars. Why there are no schools in connection with ten of the chapels we are not in a position to say. Possibly they are situated in small hamlets where workers are difficult to obtain. Such, however, we understand is the case. We cannot give complete statistics so as to bring this year into complete comparison with the previous years when the Conference met at Grimsby, but we can compare progress in one or two respects. In 1869 there was but one circuit, with a membership of 770. In 1880 the one circuit had become two, with a membership of 1,370, so that in the eleven years the Church had well nigh doubled its membership. During this period, four large chapels were erected in the town in addition to the two excellent properties already in possession of the Connexion. One of them, the Flottergate Chapel, was opened during the visit of the Conference in 1880. Now the two circuits have become three, and the membership has risen to 2,156, a considerable advance upon 1880, though not so great as that made between 1869 and 1880. Still, if all our circuits had made proportionate progress we should have occupied a position considerably in advance of that occupied now.

Most of the men who attended the Conference of 1869 have "crossed the bar." Two, however, were members of the Conference this year, and were to be seen in a position where survivors of that remote period might be expected to be found—on the Deed Poll benches. The Revs. James Huff and Robert Church sat in the Grimsby Conference of 1869, and were able to compare that day with this. The Rev. R. Tanfield, who attended the Conference of 1869, attended this year in the capacity of Connexional Treasurer, though not as a member of the Assembly—though, by-the-by, there would have been serious complaints on the part of the delegates had he not been present to honour their demands. A lay delegate from the Brinkworth District bears the name of one present in 1869, Mr. J. Sweeper, and possibly he may be the same person, though we have some doubt respecting him. It was pleasing to find a link or two connecting the Assembly of this year with that of 1869.

We noticed a few more who were present at the Conference in 1880. But as we surveyed the delegation from the various Districts, the links with the Assembly of 1880 were not many. The chief Conference officers of that year—the President, Rev. C. C. M'Kechie; the Vice-President, Rev. M. Clark; the Secretary, Rev. J. Barfoot, have been called to the higher service of the skies, and so have all the Deed Poll members of that year, save one, Mr. W. Dean, who still lingers among his brethren here. The Connexional officers then in charge of the affairs of the Church have filled up their day of work, and entered into rest, while other men have entered into their labours, and sustain the responsibilities they so cheerfully bore in their day. Workers pass away, but the work halts not. The Divine purposes depend not on any one man, or any set of men. Sometimes a man bulks so largely in the service of the Church that it is thought almost impossible to do without him, but he goes, and then it is seen some other has been quietly prepared in the Providence of God to take his place. Moses dies, but Joshua is ready, and He who was with Moses abides with Joshua, and neither fails nor forsakes him. So it has ever been, and so it ever will be.

At the Conference of 1869 the first proposal to establish a Loan Fund in connection with our chapel property was considered, and instruction was given to the General Committee and General Chapel Fund Committee to prepare a scheme for the formation of such a fund, and report to the Conference of the following year. Beyond this no far-reaching proposal was mooted. At the Conference of 1880 a number of proposals were submitted for consideration, but none of a specially important character, save, perhaps, one which had reference to an inquiry into the constitution and working of the Missionary Society, and which resulted in the discontinuance of the office of Deputy Treasurer and Secretary of Foreign Missions, an office which had been created by the Conference of 1877, as it was found the work could be done by the General Committee's Secretary and the General Missionary Secretary.

In 1869 the Connexional statistics showed 943 ministers, 14,169 local preachers, 9,673 class-leaders, 161,229 members, 3,282 Sunday Schools, 46,193 teachers, 258,857 scholars, 3,360 chapels, and 2,963 rented rooms and other places where service was held. In 1880, ministers 1,142, local preachers 14,507, class-leaders 10,561, members 182,691, schools 4,046, teachers 58,371, scholars 372,570, chapels 4,302, rented rooms and other places where service was held 1,922. This year the value of Church property was given as £2,531,328, and the debt as £1,003, 811. Another feature of these statistics absent in 1869 was Sunday scholars above fourteen years of age who were members of the Church 11,546, under fourteen years of age 9,117. For the eleven years there was an increase: 199 ministers, 338 local preachers, 888 class-leaders, members 21,462, schools 764, teachers 12,178, scholars 113, 713, chapels 942, rented rooms and other places decreased by 1,041. These statistics show an average progress in members for the eleven years of nearly 2,000 a year, while during the same period the Connexion built well nigh two chapels every week. In all other respects, corresponding progress appears to have been made, save in the total number of places at which service was held. The rented rooms, cottages, and other places decreased by 1,041, while new chapels only increased 942, so that the area occupied had been abridged, but this probably arose mainly in the Colonies, where the migration of population led to the abandonment of many outlying stations.

The Connexional statistics submitted to Conference this year, of which we shall have to take further notice, and simply introduce here for comparison with 1880, show members 198,930, ministers 1,102, local preachers 16,617, class-leaders 10,604, Connexional chapels 4,643, rented rooms and other places at which service is held 891, value of Connexional property £3,921,621. Debt on this property £1,082,138. Sunday Schools 4,341, teachers 61,015, scholars 467,884, scholars over fourteen years of age who are members of the Church 27,631, under fourteen years of age 24,548. These statistics show for the nineteen years an increase of 16,239 members, 159 ministers, 2,110 local preachers, 43 class-leaders, 341 Connexional chapels, £1,390,293 in value of Connexional property, and only £78,327 increase of debt upon this property, 295 Sunday Schools, 2,644 teachers, 95,314 scholars, 16,085 scholars above fourteen years of age members of the Church, and 15,431 under fourteen years of age members of society classes. But these figures only imperfectly indicate the progress that has been made during this period. In 1884 the Canadian section of the Connexion separated from the British Conference, and united with other Methodist Churches to form the Methodist Church of Canada. When this separation took place the British Conference transferred to the United Church 8,223 members, 99 ministers, 246 local preachers, 330 class-leaders, 169 Sabbath Schools, 1,253 teachers, and 9,343 scholars, 237 Connexional chapels, and 64 rented places of worship. In 1897 the Queensland section of the Connexion separated with a view to form a United Methodism in that Colony, and the Conference then practically transferred 2,120 members, 30 ministers, 160 local preachers, 71 class-leaders, 83 Connexional chapels, 143 rented places of worship, 95 Sabbath Schools, 642 teachers, 6,306 scholars. Taking these transferences into account along with the consequent loss of agency and area of work, and noting the actual advance made, it will be seen that the Connexion during the period from 1880 to 1899 has made no inconsiderable progress. It was not a decadent cause, but a living, vigorous and progressive cause that was represented in the Grimsby Conference this year.

There were two or three features connected with the Conference of this year that will contribute to render it somewhat memorable. For the first time in the history of the Connexion a lady sat as a member of the Conference. This innovation proceeded from the Bradford and Halifax District which elected Mrs. Townsend, of Shipley, as one of its representatives, and with a quiet dignity she fulfilled the duty that had been assigned to her. Had some other members of the Conference exercised the same self-repression there would not have been the repeated complaints about the escape of "gas." Mrs. Townsend made in all respects a model delegate; punctual and regular in attendance, giving careful consideration to all questions, and using her voting power with discretion, she gave an impressive object lesson in favour of her sex as delegates to Conference. If all lady delegates who may be sent act with the same prudence as Mrs. Townsend, there will be no need to regret the pious wish of the ex-President that she may be the precursor of a considerable importation of the gentler sex into the chief Assembly of the Connexion.

For the first time, too, in the history of our Church, a native African sat as a member of the Conference. The Rev. John Msikinya has been connected with our Aliwal North Station in South Africa for twenty-one years. He has served the Connexion during these years with great fidelity, as native teacher and minister. Brought from Lovedale by the ex-President when he was in charge of the Aliwal Station, he has witnessed the growth of that station till from a very small beginning it has become one of the most important stations in the Connexion, and promises, by its evangelism and educational institutions, to exercise a growing influence upon the progress of Christianity in Africa. Mr. Msikinya while in this country wishes to raise £1,000 toward the erection of a native church in Aliwal to accommodate 1,000 persons. The undertaking will cost £2,000, and the native Church has taxed itself at the rate of £5 for every male member, £1 for every female, and 10s. for each young person. A church of native Africans prepared to do this deserves support, and we hope that Mr. Msikinya may have the gladness of returning to his native land, having accomplished this part of his mission and more. His devoutness and gentlemanly bearing endeared him to all who met him at the Conference, and will commend him to all with whom he may sojourn in this country. It was fitting that when present in this country he should have been elected to a seat in the Missions District Meeting, and sent to Conference as a representative of that District.

In the record of our Church the death of Dr. Joseph Wood will stand inseparably connected with the Conference of this year. It was with a feeling of profound sorrow that the Conference learned at the opening of the Sessions that Dr. Wood's life could only be measured by hours, and that he was unable to see the friends with whom for many years he had laboured in varied service. For more than forty years he has been a striking personality in our Connexional life. At a very early period in his ministry he took a foremost place amongst his brethren, and though at that time he belonged to the extreme left, he was recognised as one of the coming men to whom the Connexion would owe much; and this forecast has been amply verified. Possessing intellectual gifts of no mean order, combined with a devout spirit, and the courage of deep conviction, a hard student and a keen controversialist, he won his way to the highest position to which the Church could call him, and in every office he filled he commanded the admiration and respect of the churches. In pulpit and on platform he had few peers, and in administrative work he manifested conspicuous ability. His retirement a few years ago from active service was a subject of universal regret, and his failing health evoked the continuous sympathy of the whole Church. His death, which occurred on June 17th, shed a sadness over the Conference, and especially over many who had been closely associated with him in official life and work. The Conference adjourned for his funeral, and all the delegates attended. It was an impressive scene, and one that those who took part in will not readily forget. He has passed to the higher service of the Kingdom of God rich in the esteem and love of his brethren, and has left behind him a memory which will abide as one of the treasured possessions of the Church.

The Conference when assembled presented a striking evidence of the beneficial influence of the Christian faith. There were indications of comfortable positions in life to which many had risen under the influence of Christian teaching. There was a brightness, cheerfulness and hopefulness in the Assembly that afforded the strongest testimony in support of the Apostolic saying, that "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." The known faces were fewer this year than in any previous year of which we have remembrance, many of the delegates evidently attending Conference for the first time. It is commendable that a fair proportion of new representatives should be introduced every year, but at the same time it is very desirable that a fair number of those attending should have some knowledge of Conference procedure, and be able to exercise a degree of leading influence in the Assembly. In some District Meetings, when delegates have to be appointed, an inquiry is made as to how many times a candidate has been to Conference, and a number of attendances tells against appointment, as if the possession of experience and knowledge constituted a disqualification for election. By all means let us have new men, but combine them with a fair proportion of "old parliamentary hands." The Conference was by no means exciting; there was no lack of talk, much of it of an adulatory character—in fact, too much—but no real debate. In this the recent Conference differed from any previous Conference of which we have any remembrance. There was, however, general good feeling, and no one, we think, would carry away any unpleasant remembrances of his short visit to Grimsby.

INITIATORY PROCEEDINGS.

When the delegates had quietly settled in their places, the retiring President, Rev. J. Smith, proceeded to open the Conference. He departed from the usual course of announcing the time-honoured hymn for such an occasion, "And are we yet alive and see each other's face," etc., and gave out hymn 378, which seemed more suitable and fitting. The customary hymn may suit well enough for an assembly constituted mainly of the same persons each year, but in an assembly like the Conference, in which only a few see each other's face again, it hardly seems fitting. The Conference evidently appreciated the selection, and the hymn was sung with much feeling. Then after reading the Scriptures, the President called upon the Rev. G. Seaman and Messrs. W. Glass and T. Lawrence to lead the Assembly in prayer. Here Mr. Smith observed the constitutional order of Conference, one minister to two laymen, and we did not observe that the devotions were either better or worse for this conformity to Deed Poll regulation. Mercies of the past were remembered and thankfully acknowledged, present blessing was duly recognised, and the Divine presence and guidance solicited for every Session of the Conference. It was a solemn and hallowed time, and a graciously subdued feeling pervaded the Conference. It was a meet preparation for the work that was to follow. The roll-call then followed, and most of the delegates answered to their names through the General Committee delegate of each District—a decided improvement upon the old method of each answering for himself. Satisfactory information was given respecting the few absentees, and then the usual temporary officers being appointed, the Conference properly constituted, proceeded to the election of President. Three nominations were made: Revs. W. Goodman, H. Clarke and G. Seaman. It was confidently expected that Mr. Goodman would be elected, and this anticipation was confirmed by a splendid majority, and a better appointment could not have been made. As General Committee Secretary, Mr. Goodman has won golden opinions, and the efficient manner in which he has discharged the duties of this important office had undoubtedly great influence in deciding the election for the Chair. With a knowledge of Connexional law and usage that cannot be surpassed, cool in judgment, prompt in decision, firm, yet kindly in bearing, Mr. Goodman made a model President. Never for a moment was he at a loss in relation to any ruling, and in no single case was his ruling at fault. Permitting a fair degree of liberty in the expression of opinion on any question, he, nevertheless, soon brought up any delegate disposed to wander from the point at issue. He ruled with a kindly and impartial hand, and however high he stood in the estimation of his brethren when he took the Chair, he stood still higher when the Conference closed its Sessions, and during his year of office he will command the confidence and esteem of his brethren in an even higher degree than he has done in the past. For the Vice-Presidency, which for some years now has been allotted to a layman, five candidates were nominated, all good men and true, and if the other four had only been absent, any one of them was worthy of the confidence of the Conference. The choice of the Conference fell upon Mr. William Windsor, of Manchester, and an admirable Vice-President he made. The President gave him a full share of work, and it would have been difficult for any man to have performed it better. Alert, resourceful, genial and brotherly, always "on the spot," the Vice-President when in the Chair directed the proceedings of the Assembly with remarkable skill and wisdom. Mr. Windsor is highly respected in his own District, and unless we are mistaken, he will command an equal respect and esteem throughout the Connexion during his year of office. The chief seats filled, the Conference proceeded to the election of the Secretary. This is a responsible and arduous office, but there was no lack of candidates. Evidently the prospect of hard work and close confinement in writing up the Journal does not intimidate the brethren. Five nominations were made for this position, and much was said for each nominee. If a man wants to know how clever and excellent he is let him get nominated for Conference or Connexional office, and he will know ever after. The Conference settled upon the Rev. D. S. Prosser, and appointed Rev. J. T. Parr as his Assistant, and admirably these two brethren fulfilled their duties; the Journal was found written up each morning, and so accurate was it found when read daily, that comparatively few corrections had to be made. Other necessary appointments were then made on the nomination of the General Committee Secretary, and the organisation of the Conference for work was completed. The induction of the President was deferred, after the example of last year, to the afternoon, and this formality is now likely to become part of Conference procedure. It invests the entrance upon the office with a little more ceremony, and may be regarded as a compliance with the advice to "Let all things be done decently and in order." The service was attended by a large congregation, the Hainton Street Chapel being filled to its utmost capacity. The retiring President, in a few well chosen sentences, handed over to the President the insignia of office—the Conference Bible and Hymnal, each of which he described as "perfect," though we judge the adjective was not employed in exactly the same sense in each case. He then introduced him to the President's Chair, the custody of which forms another part of the responsibilities he has to sustain for the year. The President then gave his address, the earlier part of which consisted of interesting reminiscences of his early life. He then put in a plea for the young, and expressed his hope that the year might be "the children's year." He referred to the growing influence of Christianity as seen in the repression of the Sunday newspaper movement, and desiderated an expression of the same influence in relation to other evils which prevailed. He rejoiced in the revelation of the power of the Christian Church which recent events had made manifest, and expressed his conviction that the Gospel would bring the discord in the world to an end, and unite all in a glorious harmony. The retiring Vice-President, in a very happy mood, handed over to his successor the duties and honours of the position to which he had been elected, and Mr. Windsor, in a few felicitous sentences, expressed his anxiety to serve the Church which had called him to this office, for he regarded the position as affording an opportunity for service that, so far as ability and circumstances permitted, he would gladly use in the interest of the Church in which he had been cradled, and which it had been the joy of his manhood to serve. Heartily did he join with the President in desiring that this year might be known as "the children's year," for it had been his greatest joy to labour in the service of the youth and child-life of the Church.

THE CONNEXIONAL CENSUS.

To the Conference are sent various reports from the Districts concerning the numerical position of the Connexion, and though these reports are generally received without much remark, they constitute an important part of the record of Conference proceedings. The membership of the Connexion stood at the close of the past Connexional year at 198,930, being an increase of 1,748. Six Home Districts and one Colonial District reported decreases amounting in the aggregate to 363, and nineteen Home Districts and three Colonial Districts reported increases, so that the increase, though by no means large, was spread generally over the Districts, and not confined in any large proportion to any one locality. This is so far satisfactory, and indicates a generally vigorous condition. With two exceptions, the decreases occurred in Districts made up mainly of agricultural stations, where migration to the mining and manufacturing localities in search of better conditions of life draws off the youth of both sexes. Surely something will be done some day to make it worth while for the people to remain on the land and place the foundation industry of the country upon a more satisfactory basis. As it is we have to witness the depletion of our rural Stations year by year, and it is to be feared that not a few who in their youth thus migrate yield to the many seductive attractions found in largely populated neighbourhoods, and are lost to virtue and to God. The land laws of this country have much to answer for in relation to the social and moral condition of the people. Reform here would render evangelistic work much easier and much more fruitful, and the power to accomplish this much-needed reform lies largely with the Churches. The responsibility of citizenship realised by the followers of Jesus Christ, and the duties of citizenship diligently discharged by them, would lead to a reformation that would in a great measure transform the social life of the country. We note with some satisfaction that the number of regular ministers has increased by fourteen. We would it had been four-fold that number, as many of our Stations are understaffed, especially in the more northerly part of the Connexion, but this increase is gratifying and we hope may be the precursor of further advance in the same direction. The number of local preachers, singular to say, is stationary, being 16,617, the same as last year. This is to be regretted, for the Connexion depends much upon these unpaid ministers, and it will be an ill day for it when the number does not advance with the increasing membership. The number of class leaders however has advanced from 10,418 to 10,604, a very fair increase in these local pastors affording promise of better oversight and care for the membership. In the Home Districts the number of Connexional chapels has been increased from 4,167 to 4,243, an increase of 76, but other preaching places have decreased from 781 to 728. Doubtless at many of these places chapels have been erected, but it is gratifying to find that while we have added 76 new chapels to our Connexional property, the other places have only decreased by 53, so that we have, though not in a large degree, widened the general area of our Connexional work. In the Colonies, however, it has been otherwise, the number of chapels reported is 400, the same as last year, while other places are given at 163, a decrease of three. There can be no doubt that the agitation for Methodist union which has prevailed in the Colonial Districts for some time has put an arrest upon chapel extension, and we fear has not been favourable to evangelistic work. However, in a short time the period of agitation will be over, and we may then expect to hear of the progress of Methodism at the Antipodes. The value of Connexional property in the Home Districts has increased from £3,618,489 to £3,664,253, an addition to value of £45,764, and as the increase of chapels is seventy-six, it is evident that many of these new erections must be village chapels, and in this we rejoice. Evidently we are making for ourselves permanent homes in many of the villages of the land. Averaging the increase in value over the increase in the number of chapels, and the cost runs about £600 each. Of course some have been built in populous centres, but the increase in value taken along with the increase in chapels favours the inference that a fair proportion are village erections. The liabilities of our Connexional property in the Home Districts have been reduced from £1,018,794 to £1,009,198, so that though there has been considerable addition in value of property, the total liability is less than it was a year ago. In the Colonial Districts the value of Church property has deteriorated to the extent of £3,494, but the liabilities have been diminished to the extent of £2,581, still the reduction of liability has not kept pace with the deterioration in value. This is to be regretted. The Chapel reports are perplexing in no small degree, and there evidently needs some improved method in securing returns. In the Conference Minutes of 1898 the statements respecting debt and value given on pages 52 and 105 are conflicting, and neither debt nor value works out accurately when the returns published in the Conference Blue Book of this year are compared with the published accounts in the Conference Minutes of 1898. Better have no returns at all if greater accuracy cannot be secured. We offer these Chapel statistics with diffidence, as we have been unable to harmonise the various published statements so far as comparison is possible. We wish, however, to invite attention to one important matter to which we have made reference in previous years. According to statistics published this year we provide accommodation for 960,958 worshippers, but only 557,152 persons are in average attendance. It can hardly be possible to secure the occupation of every sitting, but it is surely possible to come nearer to that position than these figures indicate. Nearly one half of the accommodation we provide is unused every Sabbath day. Then again, 557,152 persons are reported as in attendance upon the public ministry of the Connexion, and yet the membership of the Church in the Home Districts is returned at 186,359, so that we have attending the services of the Church from Sabbath to Sabbath, 370,793 persons who are not in fellowship with us, though they may be more or less closely connected with us, and possibly many of them persons of exemplary lives. Is there not scope here for evangelistic and pastoral work that might yield fruitful results, and add largely to the membership of the Church?

The Sunday School report is on the whole very encouraging, and shows general progress in this important sphere of Christian work, though we fail here to find the agreement desirable in the statistics given. For instance, in the report of last year the number of scholars in the Home Districts was given as 436,905, in the report of this year the number given is 439,783, an increase of 2,878. The aggregate increase this year is given at 18,990, and the aggregate decrease at 15,910, showing an increase of 3,080; which of these numbers is the correct increase we cannot say, but it is plain both cannot be correct. It is gratifying to find that whichever number is correct, the Home Districts show a substantial increase in the children attending our Sabbath Schools. The report shows an increase of fifty-five in the number of teachers, but as there has been an increase of 198 female teachers, there must have been a falling off in male teachers to the extent of 143. This is rather serious, for while it is pleasing to learn that an increasing number of females are entering upon school work, we see no reason why the number of male teachers should be diminished, yet such it appears is the fact. Let us hope that this decline of interest in Sunday School work on the part of the male members of the Church will not continue, for a more important work does not invite the thought and attention of Christian men. There has been a pleasing increase of thirty-six in the number of schools in the Home Districts, a larger increase than we remember to have been reported in any one year in the past. There is also a pleasing improvement in the average attendance of teachers at the Sunday morning session; the children, too, are attending much better both morning and afternoon. In one paragraph of the report it is stated there is an increase of 813 in the number of scholars over fourteen years of age. This is so far satisfactory, but it would have been easy to complete the report by giving the total number, then we should have been able to judge to what extent we were retaining our senior scholars. The number of scholars above fourteen years of age who are members of the Church is 27,002, an increase for the year of 1,562;

the number under fourteen years of age is 24,253, an increase of 635. It will be seen that these figures represent but a small percentage of the children committed to our care. The present General Secretary has devoted himself to special work among the children, and reports a considerable number as led to decision at meetings he has addressed. Miss Perrett, the special Sunday School Evangelist, has been abundant in labour during the past year, and with much success. But the work of these agents among the children needs to be followed by careful shepherding, and this, of course, devolves upon the local school workers. It is a good thing to bring a child or a youth to decide for Christ, but for that decision to eventuate in a steady growth in grace, constant care and guidance is needed by those who have charge of our schools. The Bible and Prayer Union makes steady progress. At the close of 1898 1,226 branches had been registered, and since that return was made up 161 new branches have been formed, and to the 49,896 members at the end of last December, there has been added 15,407 more. This Union is intended to promote the daily reading of the Scriptures, and the practice of daily devotion, and its steady growth cannot fail to strengthen youthful piety and prepare the youth of the Church for future service. The Christian Endeavour Movement makes steady progress. The returns of this year show that 1,042 of these Societies are now established in the Connexion, with 26,744 active members, and 8,750 associate members. These statistics show an increase for the year of 476 Societies, 11,093 active members, and 2,976 associates. We gather from the report that 4,499 active members are not in Church fellowship with us. We presume from the fact that they are active members that they are in fellowship with some Church, but we should have been more satisfied had this been explicitly stated instead of left to inference. Temperance work, another branch under the direction of the Sunday School Union, is by no means neglected. There are 1,999 Bands of Hope in active operation, though we regret to note that thirty-eight have been discontinued during the year. This is to be regretted, for in the presence of the growing power and influence of the drink traffic no labour ought to be spared to create in the minds of the young a feeling of hostility to it. There are 316 Adult Temperance Societies reported, and these are mainly in connection with our schools. Altogether there are reported 220,803 juvenile abstainers—over one-half of the scholars reported. Why not get the other half? Adult abstainers reported number 87,777, but these figures must not be regarded as representing the strength of total abstinence in the Connexion. There are thousands in membership with us who are not enrolled in any of the 316 Societies reported. Taking the Adult and Juvenile Sections, we have a Temperance Organisation connected with our Church containing 2,315 Societies, and a membership of 308,680 pledged not only to abstain, but to promote the spread of abstinence from all intoxicants in the respective spheres in which they move. During the past year the number of juvenile abstainers connected with our Bands of Hope have increased by 6,564, and to the Adult Societies 3,496 members were added during the year.

DEPARTMENTAL WORK.

Encouraging reports of the year's work were given by the various departments. The Book-room continues to do a large and increasing business. The sales have reached the sum of £35,462 10s. 10d., which is £906 more than the highest figure of any previous year. Considering the large turn-over, the profits are only small, but it is satisfactory to note that they are £115 in advance of those of last year, and are the highest during the past nine years. In the old premises in Sutton Street, the expenses were less, hence, with a smaller business it was possible to obtain a larger profit, and considering the unparalleled competition in the book and magazine trade, it is no small achievement to succeed in increasing the sales and securing the substantial profit shown in the balance sheet. Unquestionably the least satisfactory items in the report are those relating to the circulation of the Serials. Until this year the general tendency for a long time was towards a smaller circulation, and had this tendency not been arrested some of them could not have been produced except at a loss. Happily this year there is a substantial improvement, and this is the more gratifying because an important part of the improvement is in connection with the "Aldersgate Magazine," where it was most needed. The issue of this valuable monthly this year is 1,375 copies per month in excess of last year. "Springtime," too, has advanced 4,250 copies per month. These are encouraging figures, but, even so, the circulation of the magazines as a whole, is scarcely one-half of what it should be. This conclusion is based on many considerations. First of all they appeal to a large constituency. If we say there are 100,000 families who should be subscribers we are within rather than outside the actual number. Many of these should take the whole set. Then the quality of the literature they offer should commend them to all who desire good reading for themselves and their children. For their character as literature is beyond dispute. Independent persons, editors of newspapers, and others whose judgment must be respected, have frequently pronounced them the best Connexional magazines published. We know a Wesleyan who takes a dozen copies of "Springtime" to distribute among young friends in whom he is interested; and a short time ago we knew of a Presbyterian Sunday School which took two dozen of the "Sunday School Journal" for its teachers. Such testimony speaks volumes for the literary quality of our Serials. Further, it should never be forgotten that no one is building up a private fortune out of the profits of the Book-room. The whole of it is devoted to worthy Connexional purposes. We are surprised, most of all, that the "Quarterly Review" has the meagre circulation of 1,150. Its praises are spoken everywhere, by intelligent and highly educated ministers of other denominations, by University professors, and able editors. There is nothing quite its equal, of its kind, in the market, and yet with 700 circuits, in some of which ten and twelve, and even a larger number are circulated, the total is less than 1,200. We hope for an improvement in the immediate future in the "Quarterly," and should not think it a great achievement if both the "Aldersgate" and the "Juvenile" should double their circulation next year. Those who have watched the manner in which the Book-room has conducted its business in recent years must have been impressed with the ability and enterprise displayed by the Editor, the Book Steward and the management. The magazines improve in quality every year, and new departures are constantly being made. Works of permanent value are now becoming the property of the Book-room, recent additions being Dr. Watson's Hartley Lecture, "The Fatherhood of God"; Rev. R. Bryant's Hartley Lecture, "Revelation and Inspiration"; and Rev. John Atkinson's "Life of Colin Campbell M'Kechie." The Hymnal sells well, over 68,000 having been sent out during the year; and a large business is done with other publishing houses. For other than trade reasons, we should be glad if the sales of the Conference Minutes could be increased ten times. In a Connexion that has over 16,000 local preachers and 10,000 class-leaders, more than 4,000 persons should feel that this valuable year-book is indispensable to them. A careful study of its contents would give them a better conception of the large and manifold work that is being done by the Church of which they are members and officials.

The Missionary Committee presented a report buoyant with success achieved, and full of hope for the coming time. It has had a larger revenue than usual at its disposal during the past twelve months. The abrogation of what is known as the 75 per cent. rule in part accounts for this, but in addition a considerably larger amount has been sent by the Stations, both to the General Fund and the African Fund. The total income for the General Fund was shown to be £18,395 6s. 9d., being £1,193 15s. 3d. more than the previous year. The total for the African Fund was £8,205 15s. 11d., which is £1,394 1s. 2d. more than the preceding year. But in reckoning the actual amount raised, £2,418 7s. 1d., balance in hand at the beginning of the year, must be deducted from the General Fund, and £2,665 12s. 6d., balance from last year, from the African Fund. This leaves a net aggregate for the two Funds raised by the circuits of £21,517 3s. 1d., to which there should be added £17,716 10s. 1d. raised by the Mission Stations themselves, which brings the actual amount raised from all sources for missionary work at home and abroad to £39,233 13s. 2d. This is a substantial sum, though perhaps in a time of unexampled commercial prosperity, nothing to boast of. Still, there were many gratifying facts named in the report. Every District had increased its contribution to the General Fund, and out of the twenty-five, only five had sent a smaller amount to the African Fund than in the preceding year, so that the improvement is general throughout the Connexion. And the generosity of the General Missionary Treasurer, who has given twenty-five per cent. on the increase has helped to swell the income. It will not be surprising if the income for both departments of missionary effort continues to increase year by year. The number of those able to give to a substantial amount is increasing, and, what is of more importance, we are confident that the missionary spirit was never so strong in our Church as it is to-day. Special attention was called to this fact on the Missions' day at the Conference, and grateful acknowledgement made of the zeal and enterprise both of the management and the missionaries. The devotion and self-abnegation of men like Thomas Jackson, of Clapton and Whitechapel, and of those who have laboured in the foreign field, appeal powerfully to the imagination and conscience of our people, and whilst missionary work is carried on with zeal, ability, and courage, there will not be wanting those who will find the money necessary for it. Three mission-vans have worked successfully, and more agencies of this kind may soon be started. Miss Perrett, who last year was set apart for work among the young, has laboured with gratifying results. She is a very devoted servant of Jesus Christ, and of so sweet a disposition that she could hardly fail to be effective among the children. On the foreign field the work is being pushed forward vigorously. Aliwal North this year seems to have recovered from the misfortunes that impeded its progress somewhat for a year or two, and is again reporting an increase something like those to which we were formerly accustomed. After filling up all vacancies there have been added 155 to its roll of membership. In Mashukulumbweland the people have begun to gather round the missionaries, and the staff of workers, both English and native, has been increased. The outlook in that far-off land to-day is very promising, and though we would not be unduly in haste, we anticipate that soon we shall be hearing of converts to the faith of the Gospel.

CHAPEL FUNDS.

To the uninitiated there is sometimes a difficulty in understanding the special character of the various funds that have been established to assist trustees to reduce their debts, and it may be well here to offer a word of explanation on the subject. They are four in number, the Chapel Aid Association, the General Chapel Fund, the Chapel Loan Fund, and the Insurance Company. The Chapel Aid Association is worked on purely commercial principles. It has a board of directors, and a strong body of shareholders who are guarantors for the money loaned to it. It pays $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest on the money it borrows, and then lends to trustees who have paid one-half of the cost of their property at the rate of $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., thus leaving $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for working expenses, a small margin, but it has been found sufficient. The special advantages offered to trustees borrowing money by this Association are: (1) a low rate of interest; (2) very small legal charges when the loan is made; (3) the opportunity of paying off the debt by easy yearly instalments. The Association has proved a great boon to trustees in every part of the Connexion, and is yearly growing in favour. At the present time it is working with the splendid capital of £228,230 12s. 6½d., deposits having been made during the year of £68,519 5s. 6d., and the amount now loaned to trustees is £216,323 1s. 11d. These are large figures, and there is little need to appeal for patronage to this Fund. Persons having money to lend must see that this is an absolutely safe investment, their deposits being secured in the first instance by property more than twice the value of the loan made to it, and in the second place by the share capital. The rate of interest is as good as it is easy to secure; and it will be found convenient inasmuch as the company are ready to repay deposits at very short notice. Trustees everywhere are taking advantage of the offers of the company, so that we anticipate its growth, rapid as it has been, will not be arrested for some time to come.

The General Chapel Fund is benevolent rather than commercial in its character, and up to the present time has been largely engaged in assisting trustees whose liabilities have become too heavy to be worked successfully without special help. To such chapels it has made grants from time to time, on the condition that a given sum was raised locally. The benefit rendered to the Chapel properties of the Connexion by these grants is almost incalculable, and is not to be measured by the amount of the grant. Heart and hope have been given to the local authorities, who, stimulated by the offers of the General Chapel Fund, have worked strenuously and successfully to meet the conditions laid down. During the year the grants made have amounted to £1,100; not a large amount in itself in a Connexion whose Chapel debts total just over one million pounds. But the grants have led to local efforts by which £12,100 has been paid off the debts, so that the total debt reduction effected by means of this Fund is £13,200. The Committee are hopeful that ere long they may turn their attention to another class of interests than those that have mainly commanded their sympathy hitherto. Gradually the number of distressed chapel cases is becoming fewer, and it is anticipated that instead of the larger portion of the grants being devoted to such cases as in the past, more will be done for new erections, and thus a more rapid extension of Connexional interests be secured. A modest start has already been made in this direction, grants amounting to £55 having been made to new chapels during the year. Besides, the Committee expects to have a larger sum of money to disburse year by year. One of its main sources of revenue is an annual gift from the Insurance Company. But this Company's funds have now accumulated to a large sum, so that the grants it will make will be more substantial than hitherto. We should not be surprised if the £500 per year recently given to the General Chapel Fund does not in the near future become £1,000, and even more. This is to anticipate, but the Insurance Company has always shown an anxiety to help the General Chapel Fund to the utmost extent compatible with maintaining the financial soundness of their own company, and therefore we believe our anticipations will be realised.

The Chapel Loan Fund is also, in part, benevolent in its character, though not to the same extent as the General Chapel Fund. It lends money to trustees free of interest, the loans to be repaid in a term of years by yearly instalments. It has a capital of £11,373 6s. 11d., which has been mainly derived from the Jubilee Fund, and this sum will be increased to £13,000, or a figure closely approaching it, during the current year, by the last instalment of the Jubilee Fund. This might be made the most useful by far of all our Chapel Funds. The trustees of the Connexion are at the present time paying about £40,000 per year in interest alone. But probably the further development of the Loan Fund would bring this amount down to £10,000. If we could have a Loan Fund of £100,000, no interest would be paid on that amount. But, in addition, the years of repayment might be limited to ten, which would tend to the very much more rapid reduction of the actual debts, and thus in two ways the amount of interest paid would be decreased. Might not the Insurance Company, now that the number of distressed chapels is so much fewer every year, devote part of its gift to the Loan Fund?

The Insurance Company has prospered from the time of its establishment. It has now a Reserve Fund of £24,325 14s. 6d., and cash balances amounting to £3,098 3s. 7d. These sums, with £50 paid on the share capital, bring the total funds in hand up to £27,473 18s. 1d. In the past twelve months the trust estates have received from the Company in the shape of grants £1,616 13s. 8d. Since the formation of the Company Connexional trusts have been relieved out of the Company's profits, in all £12,141 3s. 8d. That is a fine record, but as has been already indicated, more may be expected of them in the future. Several circumstances have contributed to enable the Company to help embarrassed chapels in this manner. First of all, unlike some fire insurance companies, they have had no dishonest customers, and as a consequence their payments have been comparatively small. The year under consideration has been exceptionally good in this respect, only £127 15s. 9d. having been paid for fires. As the premium revenue alone was £2,367 7s. 11d., the margin of profit was proportionately large. Then again, shareholders receive no interest on their capital, nor directors any fee for their work, and the working expenses are exceedingly small. It follows, therefore, that nearly the whole of the profits go to the reserve fund, and to the relief of embarrassed chapels. Such an institution deserves well of the Connexion, and we are not surprised to be informed that nearly the whole of the chapels in the Connexion are insured in this office. Another advantage attaches to it which should not be overlooked. The office, when there has been a fire, never haggles about paying what is due, and paying it promptly. How much this means will be known best by those who have been insured in offices of a different character. Help might be afforded the Company in various ways. It will be seen that two or three large fires would swallow up the whole of a year's income, and care should be taken that nothing of the kind happens. In the case of new chapels, the hot-air method of heating should be avoided. Most fires occur in places where this method has been adopted. In addition to the risk of fire incurred, it is not healthy. Where the hot-air method has been adopted the flues and ranges should be carefully cleaned out in the autumn.

A useful institution is the London Chapel and School Extension Fund. The difficulties of chapel building, on account of the expensiveness of sites, is great in all large towns, in London it is especially so. With very limited means the friends in London are rendering help and stimulus in many directions. Last year the income, exclusive of the balance in hand, was only £176 12s. 10d. Wealthy friends in the provinces, and trust estates in easy circumstances would do well to consider the need of our London brethren.

EDUCATIONAL AND KINDRED INSTITUTIONS.

In the Manchester College sixty students have been training for the ministry, forty-two a second year and eighteen a first. At present the recognised term is two years, though any one desiring it is at liberty to remain a third, a privilege of which occasionally a student avails himself. The subjects of study are linguistic, biblical, theological, and philosophical, all of them of first class importance to one who desires to be an efficient minister of Jesus Christ. If only during their college term they acquire habits of study that will remain with them to the end of their life, all will be well; if they allow their college studies to be the end of all hard reading and thinking on their part, they will become that most pitiful of all objects, a minister whose intellectual faculties are stereotyped. On the whole we believe that a very superior class of young men for some time past have been coming out of our college, and we trust that at least a fair proportion of them will rise to eminence in the Connexion. Elmfield College presented a good report. In the London University Matriculation examinations two won a place in the first division and one in the second division. In the Cambridge Junior Locals two secured third class honours and eight others passed. In the College of Preceptors, forty-eight entered and all passed. At this examination out of eighteen prizes and medals available for the whole country, four were won by Elmfield boys. In this particular, Elmfield is ahead of all schools in the kingdom. Thirty-eight boys were placed in the Honours Division of the First Class for the whole country, and of these one Elmfield boy was third, another fourth, another thirteenth, and another fifteenth. Several other distinctions were gained, and altogether this institution appears to maintain the high reputation it has held from its foundation. Bourne College also had a gratifying report to submit for the consideration of the Conference. Particulars need not be given here, but the report shows a splendid list of prizes and distinctions gained by its boys. The balance sheet is also very satisfactory, the net financial result being that after paying five per cent. to shareholders a fair amount was carried forward to the reserve fund. We recall the time when the financial position of this excellent institution was a cause of some anxiety to its friends and well-wishers, and rejoice that it is now enjoying prosperity in all respects. This, no doubt, is the result of the splendid ability and devotion of the directorate, and especially of the Governor. In this section of our Conference Chronicle we may be allowed a reference to one of the most popular and prosperous of the Connexional institutions—the Orphan Home. Last year the Committee reported the largest income it had ever received, this year the revenue has increased upon that of last year by £129 11s. 5d. During the ten years' history of this institution over 100 orphans have been cared for, educated, and many of them started on what it is trusted will prove an honourable and successful career.

THE JUBILEE FUND.

At last the Jubilee Fund is to be closed. It has taken seven years instead of five to accomplish what was contemplated, but, at last, the £50,000 has been raised, or, at least, will be by December of this year. Taking it all in all it has been a decidedly successful effort. It is the first attempt the Connexion has made to raise a really large amount of money for great Connexional objects, and very splendidly have those at the head of the movement worked for its success. Mr. W. P. Hartley, whose courage and liberality conceived and made the scheme possible, had also the honour of preventing it from failing of its complete realisation. Instead of giving £5,000 as he had promised, ten per cent. of the whole, he gave £12,500, twenty-five per cent. This left the Districts £1,500 to raise at the Conference, and the delegates, one after another, engaged to secure each a sufficient amount by December to make up the £1,500. No doubt, after such a manifestation of liberality on the part of Mr. Hartley the Districts without more ado will send in their quota.

CONNEXIONAL OFFICES.

Two of the Connexional offices having fallen vacant this year, according to the usual order, the Vices appointed five years ago were appointed to the principal secretaryships: Rev. John Hallam to the Secretaryship of the General Committee, and Rev. R. W. Burnett to the General Missionary Secretaryship. There was no lack of candidates for the new appointments, but eventually the Rev. R. Graydon Graham was appointed Vice to the General Committee Secretary, and the Rev. J. Sater Vice to the General Missionary Secretary. Both of them are important offices, and perhaps their importance lies least of all in what is most apparent to the ordinary observer. The General Committee Secretary bulks large to the eye of the delegates, and of the Connexion at large, during the sittings of Conference, and unquestionably much depends on his business aptitude and quickness for the despatch of the business. But a much more difficult function connected with the office is the consideration of the appeals for legal guidance coming to him throughout the year, both from official bodies and individual men. Keen perception, the courage to give a direct answer, and the nice balance of judgment that saves from claiming too much authority, are needed to fill the office with success. And on the part of the General Missionary Secretary, much more is needed than popular platform gifts and zeal in missionary work. He should have the gifts of a great administrator, the power to perceive clearly the distant issues of any given policy, and great tact in dealing with men. In addition, both these officials should have the personal ability and dignity to represent the Connexion well on all sorts of occasions and among all conditions of men. Rev. W. Goodman has been an ideal Secretary, and the Rev. John Smith has filled his position as chief of the missionary department with eminent ability. A third appointment was made, and the election took an unusual, not to say unique, turn. Rev. R. Tanfield had intimated his intention of retiring from the Treasurership of the Connexional Fund at the end of the current year, that is in March, 1900, and the Conference was therefore required to appoint one to succeed him. Hitherto the office has been given to a man who has been a long time in active work, but by a very large majority, and after a discussion, in some respects rather painful, it resolved to appoint the Rev. James Polwarth, a young superannuated minister. Whereas in the other two elections the final result was only reached after a long series of ballots had been taken, and a dozen votes or so changing sides would have given the appointment to the second in the list, in this case, Mr. Polwarth was elected on the first ballot by 119 votes against 45 cast for the other three nominees. It was said that there was an element of surprise in all the three elections, but probably the last named was the most surprising of all.

THE MINISTRY.

Barring two cases, one regarding a Station, and the other regarding a minister, the work of stationing this year was comparatively easy. Most of the Stations had made their own arrangements, and the Conference has learned from past experience, to be rather chary of interfering with these arrangements, as such interference is apt to create almost endless complications. When a case is introduced requiring special consideration, an inexperienced delegate is apt to think that when a proposal is made to appoint a minister who seems singularly adapted to take up the work, that the circuit to which he had before been engaged should not hesitate about sacrificing its own interests for the general good, but it becomes a different matter when in the complications following, that delegate's own circuit is likely to be affected. The Edinburgh Station occupied much of the time of the Conference, both in the full Conference itself and in Committee. For a few years past it has been seriously declining in finances and other respects, and a committee, which had been appointed by the Missionary Quarterly Committee, had been to Edinburgh and reported its findings to the Conference with a strong recommendation that, as a special case of special need, a man of ability and energy be appointed who should be empowered to sell the present chapel and erect new premises in a more suitable locality. Several efforts were made to secure the appointment of a minister who had been one of the deputation, but he felt he could not honourably break engagements already entered into. Afterwards Rev. S. Horton's name was brought forward, but the delegates of his District naturally objected. A representative from another District pleaded strongly for a manifestation of the spirit of self-sacrifice, urging that all should be prepared to yield somewhat for such a pressing need. Eventually Mr. Horton was appointed, and then the delegate who had pleaded for self-sacrifice when another was being touched, was placed in the position of having to object to the removal of the minister from her own circuit to meet the emergency that had been created. So Christly and beautiful does self-sacrifice in another seem, so objectionable is it to ourselves. However, it is to be hoped that every one will find his providential sphere of work and large opportunities of useful service. In another case the Conference was under the painful necessity of superannuating a minister who had intended to continue in active service for some time longer, but it is difficult always to find suitable stations for men long past their prime who have not given evidence of special aptitude as Methodist ministers, and we can but hope that our brother may find the rest in the eventide of life not ungrateful to him. Eleven other ministers were superannuated, making twelve in all. Several of them had travelled forty years and more, the shortest term we believe being that of Mr. Robson, who had travelled thirty-five years. Some of these men had been singularly distinguished for piety, devotion and ability. It was met that a special resolution should be passed on the retirement from active work of the Rev. James Jackson, who but two years before, by a very striking vote, had been appointed to the Presidential Chair. The Connexion loses greatly when ministers so gifted and wise are compelled to retire. Mr. Jackson's general health, we were glad to note, is still good, and we trust he may yet for many years render service to the Church of which for so long he has been a distinguished ornament and servant.

Reference has already been made in this Chronicle to the death of Rev. Joseph Wood, D.D. Thirteen other ministers were on the death roll, who had reached a ripe age and in their time manifested diverse gifts in the service of the Church. A fine tribute was paid to their worth by the Rev. James Travis. The average age of the thirteen was seventy-seven years. One of them was born three years, and another seven years, before the birth of the Connexion, so that the Church of which they had been ministers and which had reached such vast proportions, had been created during their life-time. They had been in active work on an average thirty-eight years, and since their retirement had not ceased to labour for the Church. They were all men who had a vivid consciousness of the great change which Methodists call conversion, an experience that had altered all their inner and outer life, and the memory of which remained with them ever as the most important fact of their life. They had all died in the faith, and entered into the rest of the people of God.

With them, 2,800 other members had crossed the bar during the twelve months. How large the army of the saints who now stand on the other side of the flood! In 1835 the practice of reporting deaths was begun, and since then not fewer than 126,000 had been reported having passed "To that fair realm, where,

Sin and sorrow o'er,
Thou and Thine own are
One for evermore."

NEW LAWS.

The first new legislation proposed was defeated by a very decided vote of the Conference. The legislation aimed at providing for the representation in Conference of the more important Connexional institutions. The chiefs of these institutions of necessity must be present to give their report and speak to any question arising immediately affecting their department. Hence they are compelled to sit through the Sessions, and are not allowed to speak, save on one or two occasions, and only on their own special subjects, and are never allowed to vote. They have no chance of being elected to Conference, as the Districts hardly own them, and they are all men of experience and ability. Otherwise they could never have reached the positions they hold. A former attempt to secure them all the powers of representatives failed; but this year the legislation had been drawn, whether consciously or not, in a manner peculiarly adapted to win the suffrages of a large number of Districts, more especially the laymen of the Districts. Still it was cast out by an overwhelming majority. It is, no doubt, a fine question as to whether it is wiser to deprive the Conference of the counsels of so many of its ablest ministers, or introduce a new element into the constitution which is not thought very democratic. For the present, however, we judge that no further attempt will be made to legislate in this direction.

The second piece of legislation met with a vastly different reception. Not a hostile word was spoken about it, and so it has come to pass that at the end of the century the lowest salary that can be paid a married minister is £25 per quarter and children's money. Judging by the manner in which this legislation was adopted it might have been carried much sooner had a serious attempt to do so been made. The effect of this new rule should be to raise the salaries of those who are receiving more than the minimum. It has often appeared strange that the Stations do not take a greater pride in paying good salaries, instead of acting on the principle which we are afraid is far too common, of keeping them as far down as possible. We shall be greatly surprised if there is not a general rise at the next Quarterly Meetings.

The most considerable piece of legislation passed by the Conference was the new constitution for the Connexional Christian Endeavour Societies forwarded from the Sunday School Committee. Practically the proposals as a whole were adopted, though a few amendments of no special importance were made. We must refer our readers to the legislation itself, embodied in the Conference Minutes, as it is too lengthy and complicated to lend itself to summarising. On the whole, the new constitution will be found to be a great improvement on the old. This was to be expected. The rules made in 1896 were purposely left incomplete because at that time our people were only feeling their way towards a Christian Endeavour movement that would operate in harmony with the other institutions of the Connexion, and the local organisations were left with large powers in the management of the Societies. It is to be feared that this liberty has not been used in all cases in the wisest manner possible. We have been told of Societies that contribute nothing to the funds of the Quarter Day, and that hitherto have had no actual connection with the Leaders' Meeting. Active workers in the movement who have been anxious to make it Connexional have thought this an almost fatal mistake, and will be glad to note that the new rules seek to remedy this evil. The class meeting is of the essence of Methodism, and the more the principles of the class meeting obtain in Christian Endeavour Societies, both in regard to the methods of conducting the meetings and the financial support given by them to the Church, the better they will harmonise with the genius and constitution of our Connexion. Whilst, however, it must be admitted that the new constitution is a great improvement on the old, it is to be feared that there is some ground for the contention made by more than one delegate to the effect that there seemed to be a greater anxiety to bring Primitive Methodist Christian Endeavour Societies into line with the National movement, than to bring them into line with our own genius and polity. This, of course, was stoutly denied, as was the statement that we were yielding up elements distinctly Primitive Methodist in order to meet the demands of the National Council. And yet almost in the same breath as the denial was made (in perfect good faith, no doubt), it was said that one of the reasons for this legislation was that Primitive Methodist Christian Endeavourers desired to have fellowship with those of other denominations, a privilege from which at the present they were debarred on the ground that they did not take the International Pledge. It is to be feared that too much is made of this pledge. At least it impresses us as a crude and faulty production, and certainly the narrow-mindedness that refuses to have fellowship with other Christian workers who do not feel inclined to adopt their pledge is not a spirit that should be yielded to, or treated otherwise than with pity. At the Conference a show of answering these objections was made, but the attempt was futile and unconvincing. There is danger, too, of damage being done to the conscience of the young people. When it was argued that the International Pledge was too exacting, and in large Societies, where more than a hundred were present at the weekly meetings, for the want of time impossible of being fulfilled, the reply was made that in such cases the President could ask all who had not otherwise taken part in the service, save in singing, to repeat together some suitable passage of Scripture and thus meet the requirements of the pledge in a manner at once easy and expeditious! Surely this is to trifle with a serious subject, and to violate the evident intention of the pledge. It must also pervert the conscience of the Endeavourer. Indeed, the pledge, which the National Council regards as absolutely essential, impresses us as being the one objectionable thing connected with the movement. For this reason the Conference acted wisely in providing that Societies already established who have used another pledge shall not in future be bound to use the new pledge adopted by the Conference of 1899. In all other respects the new rules are an improvement, and we trust the Head of the Church may use this new machinery for the more rapid advancement of His Kingdom.

THE UNION QUESTION.

The gentlemen who have acted on the Committee of the proposed union between the Primitive Methodists and the Bible Christians were re-appointed with one or two additions. A strong attempt was made by a small section who are strongly opposed to the movement, to end the negotiations and render the effort wholly futile, but the Conference manifested no disposition to adopt such a course, and by large majorities it was resolved to submit the question to the District Committees and the Quarterly Meetings. We should be glad if the answer of these Courts is favourable to union. We have here an opportunity of proving the real value of the spirit of unity that we say has been growing so rapidly during the latter half of the nineteenth century. And there is really no principle to keep the two Churches apart from each other. In doctrine, forms of worship, religious sentiment, ecclesiastical polity and methods of work we are one. And it is safe to say that the proposed new constitution is a much better and more democratic one than the present Primitive Methodist constitution. Two other facts should be remembered. We proposed union to the Bible Christians, they did not propose it to us. Further, they have yielded nine points for every one we have yielded, in this, manifesting the broader and more Christian spirit. Even on the question of the proportion of ministers and laymen to be chosen as representatives in the higher courts they have yielded, as will be seen when the proposals are submitted to the Quarterly Meetings. Let the officials approach the consideration of the question in an unprejudiced and prayerful manner, thinking chiefly of the result to the Kingdom of God as a whole, and they will hardly fail to affirm the desirability of union.

GREETINGS AND RECEPTIONS.

The Conference received two deputations from local bodies, one representing the Nonconformist Council and the Free Churches of the town, and the other representing the various organisations connected with the Temperance movement. The deputations were large and influential, as was to be expected in a town where Nonconformity holds so strong a position, and the function was in all respects imposing. A change has taken place in the character of the addresses on these occasions. Time was, and not in the very distant past either, when the speeches on the one side and the other were so much "small talk," superficial, and perhaps a little humorous, but all that is changed. We stand in the presence of evils of the most serious kind that threaten the nation, and especially the Free Churches themselves, and the consciousness of the gravity of the situation imparts a seriousness to these occasions that makes them all the more interesting. We do not remember an address more finely conceived and expressed than the one presented by the Nonconformists, nor a speech at once more felicitous and timely than that of the Wesleyan superintendent who spoke in support of the address. The burning questions of the hour were presented as matters which were of the deepest concern to the Free Churches, and whilst the danger was realised, there was no lack of courage in the contemplation of the situation, rather the speeches breathed a certain eagerness for the fray. The delegate who replied caught this spirit exactly, and whilst manifesting some care in expressing what he believed to be the sentiment of the Connexion on these matters, was clear and bold in indicating the real remedies for the evil. The Temperance deputation recognised the unique position our Church holds in relation to the temperance movement, and the delegate who replied on behalf of the Conference spoke wisely in urging that we should seek for one thing at a time, and that Sunday closing should be the first aim. The British Women's Temperance Association gave a splendid reception to the delegates in the Town Hall. Quite six hundred persons were present, and the function altogether was a pleasant variation from the usual order of Conference proceedings.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

As is well known, in Australia union is in the air, and in the course of two or three years there will be in that great island continent what there is already in Canada, a great United Methodist Church. Certain questions in relation to the Preachers' Friendly Society and other matters needed settlement, and the Australian Churches sent the Rev. William Hunt to represent them in the negotiations with the home authorities. From first to last he won on the Conference. Mr. Hunt is a gentleman of considerable ability, resourceful, fluent in speech and of a decidedly judicial mind. In the Committee on Australian Union he represented his side of the case with great tact, and perhaps gained more by his geniality than he would have done by hard conflict. The Conference was also favoured for a short time with the presence of another Australian, a gentleman of great distinction and even fame, the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, author of "Deeds that Won the Empire." He is a fine speaker, and greatly interested the Conference by the address he delivered on Australia and its relations to the Home Country.

A CONCLUDING WORD.

The Conference of 1899 on the whole has been a pleasant gathering. The friends at Grimsby have been hospitable, and the religious services spiritual and effective. One of the main lacks was one or two sustained debates, which would have lifted the dialectic to a higher standard than the loose talk which characterised the Sessions to a large extent. Some soreness was felt too, that no speeches were allowed on perhaps the most important business transacted, the appointment of Vices to the Connexional offices, whilst two whole days were wasted in adulation that became wearisome and a little contemptible and undignified. But the business was done in good nature and friendliness, and on all hands it was agreed that seldom has there been abler conduct in the Chair, both on the part of the President and Vice-President.

Connexional Biography.

MRS. MARY CRAVEN.

THE Whitby Street Society of the West Hartlepool Station has recently sustained the loss by death of some of its most useful and prominent members, and in the death of Mrs. Craven, which occurred on March 31, 1897, it has also lost one of its most loyal and helpful members. From her girlhood, when she was brought into contact with Primitive Methodism in a small village, Grain-o-hey, near Pateley Bridge, till she died in her eighty-fifth year, she maintained her interest in the local and general affairs of the Connexion. She thirsted for Connexional information, and even got the Conference Minutes for a number of years. She was a regular subscriber to the Missionary, and Superannuated Preachers, Widows and Orphans' Funds. The early preachers were her ideal ministers, and of Moses Lupton, Joseph Spoor, William Dent, William Lister, C. C. M'Kechie, and others, when they were young and vigorous, she had happy memories. Her happiest remembrance was an interview with Hugh Bourne, with whose piety she was deeply impressed, but of whose social qualities she had no high opinion. Being poor in her early married life, her husband, who predeceased her seventeen years, and she used to deny themselves the luxuries of tea and sugar to have sufficient for the preachers when they came on their rounds to stay with them. This habit of self-denial she practised till the last, that she might have the means to support the cause of God, and assist her friends and relatives. Her long acquaintance with the preachers, and her respect for them, gave her a prescriptive right to advise and even to admonish the circuit ministers, and not unfrequently her favourite preachers have winced under her plain but well-meant words. Her piety was sincere and strong, but a shade sombre. It lacked brightness and hope. It suffered from her inveterate habit of introspection. She accused herself of weak faith and formal devotions, and often feared that she would fall short at the last, but some months before her death her confidence increased, and she rejoiced in the hope of the glory of God. She highly esteemed the class meeting, and having preserved her tickets for many years, she gave instructions that they, and the leaflets of the Bible and Prayer Union, should be laid in her coffin. She put her heart and conscience into her contributions to the Church. Latterly, she was not able to attend the chapel, but every Sunday she sent her shilling for the collection, and to the Trust and School Funds she generously subscribed. She was anxious to have the debt paid off the Whitby Street Chapel, and for that purpose she has left a legacy of £200.

The funeral was largely attended. In the chapel, which was specially draped by her executors, an impressive service was held. The Rev. T. H. Richards led the devotions, Rev. C. Longstaff read the Scriptures, and the Rev. D. McKinley gave an address. She was buried beside her husband in a vault in the West Hartlepool Cemetery.

D. MCKINLEY.

MR. G. PERKINS.

MR. G. PERKINS was born in Devonport, Devon, on June 3rd, 1811, and died at Bishop's Waltham, Hants, January 8th, 1897.

At the age of twenty he left his native place for London in company with a gentleman, to explain the working of the model of a copper-mine; he soon got into bad company, and gave way to intemperate habits. After some years he was prevailed upon to sign the pledge.

About thirty years ago he sought and found the Saviour, and from that time he took a delight in working for Jesus. He took a deep interest in the young, and for many years he was a faithful class-leader. He also held the office of society steward as long as his health permitted.

For some few years before his death he was laid aside by affliction. The enemy of souls often tried him, but he told him he was trusting in the finished work of Christ. The writer often visited him, and found him very happy and hopeful. He often spoke of death, and said to die would be gain. The morning before his death he said, "I am in the valley, but Christ is with me." In the evening the enemy made his last attack, but our dear brother told him he was sealed.

For the last seven years his wife has been confined to her bed by affliction, but she is one of the brightest and most happy Christians we have ever met with. She still does what she can for the cause of God. She spends much time in prayer on behalf of the servants of the Lord Jesus.

Our brother was buried in the parish churchyard by the writer. Large numbers gathered at the grave to show their respect for him, and sang, "Safe in the arms of Jesus." May the wife and children and friends meet "Where the former things will have passed away, and where all things will have become new."

REV. A. HEBBLETHWAITE, B.D.

Rev. A. Hebblethwaite, B.D.

HE indebtedness of Methodism to the villages for its useful ministers becomes more manifest year by year. The subject of our sketch is of village origin. Albert Hebblethwaite was born at Wooldale, Yorkshire, June 26th, 1840. His parents gave him a godly training and a liberal education. In early life he became a follower of Jesus Christ, and the reality and depth of his piety were manifest. He soon proved himself to be a diligent student of the Bible, and the works of Wesley, Watson, Locke and Butler he carefully read. Before his seventeenth birthday he was a most acceptable local preacher; and he had the joy of seeing many souls turn to Christ. Though much pressed to enter the ministry he did not obey the call until he was twenty-three years of age. Halifax was his first circuit; and for fourteen years he most acceptably laboured in the great centres of the Leeds District. Then he went to Great Yarmouth, where he had three years of great spiritual and material prosperity.

He subsequently laboured in Cheltenham, Redruth, Halesowen, Workington, Wigan and Manchester; and in those places he saw souls saved, debts reduced, and chapels and schools built, three of which were opened debtless. He is now stationed at Stowmarket, where there are signs of prosperity.

While it often has fallen to his lot to provide for the needy poor, his work of relief at Workington, consequent upon the stoppage of the Iron Works, was very heavy; and during his last twenty-eight weeks there he provided 20,000 free meals, and distributed large sums of money. The noble part he took in the relief of hundreds of families of miners in Wigan Circuit during the coal stoppage, will never be forgotten.

He has written upwards of forty pamphlets and books, and more than 200,000 copies have been circulated. Of one of his recent books, Dr. John Watson says: "It evinces very extensive reading, and is enriched with classical passages from some of the greatest thinkers of this and other ages. You have brought to bear upon your themes light from almost every quarter." This may be said of most of his books. Did I not know his early rising and economising of time, I should wonder how he has been able to get through so much work. In his debates with Secularists, Christadelphians and other opposers of the truth, he has not proved himself weak in argument, or unfair in spirit; even his opponents have acknowledged his ability and fairness.

A recent reviewer of the Churches wrote:—"Mr. Hebblethwaite preaches extemporaneously, in a clear, incisive voice, turning the profoundest truth over and over till he has made it plain to the children even. The sermon was a mixture of scholarship with homeliness of illustration; and the deliverance was most effective." In a finely executed illuminated address given to Mr. H. when he left his last circuit, there are these words: "One feature of your ministry, and one which has been much appreciated by us, has been the highly spiritual and intellectual level of your discourses. They have made many dark problems plain, and removed many a stumbling-block to spiritual progress."

When Mr. Hebblethwaite was made Bachelor of Divinity, he received the following note:

"London, December 5, 1879.

DEAR BROTHER,

You are hereby informed that the General Committee is satisfied of the validity of your degree, and you are free to use it.

"Truly yours,

"ROBINSON CHEESEMAN."

Mr. Hebblethwaite was most happy in his choice of a wife who has been his better half more than thirty years. In all the stations through which she has passed, she is sweetly remembered for her generous deeds and labours of love; and not a few ministers have found under her hospitable roof a home away from home.

It would be difficult to find a more kind, sympathetic and genial man than Mr. Hebblethwaite. Two or three times he has found that reformers have to suffer; but this has not kept him from doing his duty.

He is, perhaps, a little liable to that super-sensitiveness which is peculiar to the thoughtful and pure-minded. Had he been as ambitious of official position as he is able to fill it, he would have been more before the eyes of men; but that position would have robbed him of the many quiet hours needful to the production of literary matter that has life in it. If a man is to be judged by his works, the labours of Mr. Hebblethwaite prove him to be a workman that needeth not to be ashamed; and to know him is to love him. If appearances be a safe indicator of unused physical power, there are years of useful labours in Mr. Hebblethwaite; and his unpublished manuscript is proof, that by far the best work of his brain and pen has yet to see the light of day.

A STORY FOR THE TIMES.*

By JOSEPH HOCKING,

AUTHOR OF "THE BIRTHRIGHT," "MISTRESS NANCY MOLESWORTH," "ALL MEN ARE LIARS,"
"THE STORY OF ANDREW FAIRFAX," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.

HOW THE BAMBINO CURED LADY NEVILLE.

RUTLAND led the way while the brown-frocked friars carried their precious burden along the corridors of the hotel and up to her ladyship's room. Most of the visitors had gone to bed, and none but the few waiters who watched the proceedings, some with awe, and others with a look of amusement, knew of the advent of the sacred image. Brother Francis and Brother Anthony carried the thing into her ladyship's drawing-room, and then took off its many wrappings. Then when its outer adornments had been pulled aside, the little thing appeared to Rutland's gaze, just as it may be seen at the Church of The Aracœli, (Altar of Heaven), by any visitor to Rome. He saw that it was about two feet long, and was lavishly decorated with gaudy ornaments. The young man looked at the relic long and steadily, while the monks knelt before it and muttered a prayer. The figure of the little child interested him greatly, not simply because of the stories told about it, but because of the system of which it formed a part. This little inanimate figure was blessed by the Pope, a pamphlet had been written on its virtues, and issued with the approval of the ecclesiastical authorities. He had gone into the Via Condotti after dinner, and had bought a picture of the image, and had carefully read the inscription and the prayer which were associated with it. On translating the former, which was written in French, he read as follows:

"Prayer in honour of the Infant Jesus, whose miraculous image is venerated within the Church of the Altar of Heaven in Rome, and crowned by the Authorities of the Vatican on May 2, 1897."

The Pope and the Authorities of the Vatican then had declared the little wooden figure to be miraculous; therefore it formed a part of the faith of the Church. As the priests knelt before it, he could not help thinking of the second commandment, and of the battle-cries of the sturdy Protestants of the Netherlands. He saw, moreover, that the Bambino had a round, badly-carved face, and was altogether destitute of beauty; but no part of the body could be seen because it was covered with gaudy apparel. On its head was a crown surmounted by a cross that glittered with jewels. On every part of the body gay-coloured stones had been placed. A golden chain was hung around its neck, and on its little arms all sorts of baubles were placed. The clothes which covered the shapeless form were decorated with all sorts of designs wrought in gold and precious stones. On its breast was a glittering star, while at the part of the form where the knees should be, a cross was placed, and underneath the letters I.H.S. were traced in shining stones.

While he looked Alizon entered.

"Is this it?" she asked.

"Yes, my child," said Brother Francis, "I was able to prevail on our Superior to let me bring the Holy Child to your mother's bedside."

Alizon looked at it like one fascinated. She had been bred a Catholic, and had been taught to believe in Catholic legends; but as she gazed at the little thing a cold feeling came into her heart. A chilling wave of doubt swept over her. What good could this poor little doll do to her mother? It was only painted wood covered with tinselled drapery and gaudy ornaments. What miraculous power could it have? Was it not foolishness, yes, worse than foolishness, was it not blasphemy to fall down before the senseless object and offer prayers?

But this was only for a second. She drove her doubts from her. Who was she to doubt what the Holy Father and the Vatican Council had declared miraculous?

"Will you take it in at once!" she said.

The two monks carried the Bambino into the sick room and placed it on the bed.

Lady Neville looked towards them as they entered, but there was no look of intelligence in her eyes. The priests performed the customary rites, but she heeded them not. She was moaning something about the deer-parks around the Priory, and then she spoke of Sir Charles Neville her late husband.

"Her hand has touched the hand of the blessed Bambino," said Brother Francis presently. "By the blessing of our Holy Mother, she will get better."

Meanwhile Sister Mary was frantically praying, the other nurse looking on with a scornful smile.

For a few minutes Alizon watched. She had heard how in olden times when the sick had touched even the robe of Christ that virtue went out of Him and He healed them. But her mother had touched this figure, and nothing had happened.

"Oh, she will die!" thought the girl, "my mother will die!"

Ordinarily Alizon was self-possessed; but the thought of losing her mother had unnerved her, while the continuous moanings of Sister Mary had made the young girl anticipate the most terrible things.

An hour passed away, during which time the monks remained, and the Bambino lay on the bed beside her ladyship; but the patient seemed worse rather than better. The fever rose rather than abated, and she talked more incessantly, more incoherently.

"Be patient, my child," said Brother Francis, as he noted Alizon's grief; "the Blessed Child will heal her."

"It is time her ladyship took her medicine," said the nurse who had not participated in the rites.

"There is no need," said Sister Mary.

"I obey the doctors," replied the woman, pouring out the medicine.

She gave it to her ladyship, and then retired from the bedside. About half an hour later the patient became better, and fell asleep.

"Did I not tell you?" said Brother Francis. "Her recovery is beginning. I take this as an omen from heaven."

Sister Mary sobbed out her thankfulness, and the two priests spoke to each other in Italian; but Alizon spoke no word. In her eyes was a strange expression. Bewilderment, faith, doubt were all there.

Meanwhile Duncan sat in the drawing-room. He had slept a little through the day; but only a little. The thought of Alizon's anguish made rest almost impossible. He was anxiously awaiting news, for he was afraid lest all the excitement should hinder her ladyship's recovery rather than help it. Presently Alizon and Brother Francis returned.

"Mother is better," said the girl. "For an hour or so she seemed worse, but she has fallen asleep now."

"Yes," said the sceptical nurse, who had followed them, having to fetch something from the drawing-room, "the medicine I gave her is very soothing."

Brother Francis looked at her indignantly, but said nothing. He disliked this woman very much.

"Yes," he said, "her ladyship is better. Ah, it is not the first time I have taken the blessed Bambino to work its cures."

Rutland did not reply, he felt the utter uselessness of saying what he thought to the old monk. Besides, why should he speak of his unbelief to Alizon? If she derived comfort from the presence of the wooden figure, he would not seek to take it away. And yet the whole episode was a revelation of the mental condition of the Roman Church. From the Pope down to the brown-frocked friar, they all regarded the Bambino as a miraculous image. They venerated it, and believed in its healing power.

"I am glad her ladyship is better," he said to Alizon. "I hope you will be persuaded to take a little rest now."

"I cannot, I cannot," said the girl. "I shall not be able to sleep until I know that mother is out of danger. You see, everything has come on so suddenly, and—and I am all alone!"

"No, no, my child," said Brother Francis, "the blessed Virgin will be near to help you. Do not be afraid."

The girl started up and went to her mother's room. Lady Neville was still sleeping quietly, while beside her was the Bambino. Alizon thought of her own childhood's days when it comforted her to have a doll by her side when she went to bed. She remembered how her playthings became real persons to her, and how she used to talk to them and call them by their names. But she was no longer a child, and she had discarded dolls with the rest of her childish associations. For a moment it seemed as though her mother was a child again, and that she was soothed by a senseless bit of wood. She looked at the grotesque form by her mother's side, and wondered. It was painted wood, that was all. Just a bit of lifeless stick carved into the likeness of a child. Its eyes were glass, and stared vacantly at her, there was no volition, no intelligence, no soul in the poor little thing. But then it was declared miraculous by the Pope himself; it was crowned by the Vatican Council, its power was claimed by Cardinals and Bishops, it was venerated in one of the most renowned Churches in Rome.

She left the room hurriedly, and came back to the room where Brother Francis and Rutland were sitting.

"Yes," the old priest was saying, "the sainted Bambino has had a most remarkable history. It was carved by one of our brothers in Jerusalem. The wood was cut from the Mount of Olives. Doubtless the tree must have been at some time associated with our blessed Lord. After he had carved it he was ordered to Rome, and so he had a box made, and brought it with him. While on the sea, a dreadful storm arose, and there was great danger lest the vessel and all hands on board should be lost. The captain gave orders that everything in the shape of baggage should be thrown overboard. This was done, and everything immediately sunk beneath the waves except the box containing the figure which our brother had carved." After a time the captain and the crew noticed that wherever the ship went the box followed. Some one said that it belonged to a Franciscan friar. Our brother was called, who immediately told the captain that if the box was taken aboard the ship should be saved, and all hands should safely arrive at Naples.

"The blessed Bambino was taken on to the boat and immediately the storm ceased. As you may imagine, the joy among the sailors was very great, and all of them knelt before the figure which had saved them from death.

"When our brother reached Rome, he found that news of the wonderful child had gone before him, and the Araceli was simply thronged with people to see it. Sick people came, and went away well, and then our brothers at the monastery saw that the blessed Bambino had healing power. After that he was taken to the houses of sick people, and immediately they got well. No matter to whom he was taken, rich or poor, noble or humble, wherever he was received with faith he healed the people."

Brother Francis took a pinch of snuff, and looked towards his listeners to see what impression his tale was making. He noticed that Alizon was watching him with wondering eyes, and that Rutland sat looking on the ground.

"Ah, but," went on Brother Francis, "there were those who took advantage of the kindness of our Church, and the healing powers of the sainted Bambino. One day a woman came to us telling us that her child was ill, and asked that the Bambino might be brought. Nothing doubting, our brothers took it to the woman's house, and left it there. The woman's child got better, and so three days afterwards our brothers went for the image of the infant Jesus. The woman said she had carefully packed it in the box, and it was taken back to the Church, and put behind the altar. When all the brothers had got to bed that night, they were wakened by someone knocking at the monastery door. One got up and looked out. It was a bitterly cold night, and freezing hard.

"'Who's knocking?' asked Brother Philip, who had got up.

"But the only answer he heard was the cry of a child. Brother Philip immediately went downstairs, and opened the door, and there he saw the blessed Bambino, who had come all the way through the cold night.

"Then we all saw how the woman had deceived us. She had made an image in the likeness of the one we had taken to her, and had kept the real one. But the blessed Child, seeing how the brothers had been deceived, came back of its own accord."

Brother Francis ceased, and took another pinch of snuff.

"I suppose there is no doubt about this story?" asked Alizon.

"Doubt, my child? Oh no! Ever since that time two brothers have always accompanied the blessed image. It is always brought in a carriage, and taken away in the same way."

"And how long need it stay in my mother's room?" asked Alizon.

"If she continues better in the morning, I should say it would be long enough," replied Brother Francis. "With your consent I will lie on the sofa until then."

Sister Mary came into the room. "Her lady-ship is much better," she said, "she is sleeping like an infant, and the blessed Bambino is by her side. Oh, it is beautiful! beautiful!"

"Then surely you can rest," said Rutland, turning to Alizon, "you may sleep in peace now!"

"I cannot, I cannot," said the girl. "I am too excited, I feel as though I want to go out into the open air."

"Well, it may do you good," said Rutland. "The hotel is not closed. The last train has not arrived from Genoa yet. Let me go with you, shall I?"

Alizon threw a shawl over her shoulders and the two walked down the stairs and along the corridor towards the entrance hall. The hall-porter rubbed his eyes sleepily.

"The last train has not arrived yet, I suppose?" said Rutland.

"No, signore," replied the man, "it is late, very. Half hour yet, I think."

"This door will be open till then, I suppose?"

"It will, signore. The Countess better is, I hope."

"Yes, I think her ladyship is better."

"And signorina," said the man, bowing politely and looking at Alizon, "she is not bad ill, I trust?"

"Very tired, that is all," said Alizon, with a wan smile. "I am come down for a little fresh air."

"The air is good to-night," said the porter, "multo bello, what you call very beautiful. It is not always so here at night."

The two walked towards the Piazza di Spagna. Neither of them spoke while they were in the Via Del Babuino, but when they reached the monument in the middle of the Piazza di Spagna, they both stood still. It was one of those nights the like of which can only be seen in Italy. Above, the moon sailed in a cloudless sky, and shone so brightly that only a few stars were visible. Around them was utter silence. The artists' models, the flower-sellers, and others who ply their trade in this spot had all gone, the steps which led up to St. Trinita di Monti were empty. The great church with its two towers seemed to look down upon them sadly. Behind, the night-wind blew softly through the leaves of the trees on the Pincio. The air, though chilly, was pure and bracing.

As they looked up, more stars appeared to their gaze, the heavens seemed to be peopled with new worlds.

"How little we are!" and Alizon shivered.

"How great God is!" answered Rutland.

"But He came to earth as a little child," said Alizon.

"Yes, to reveal His love, and to show us the way of life," replied the young man.

Alizon was silent.

Rutland saw that she was strangely wrought upon.

"See, yonder is a tablet erected to the memory of the poet Keats," said Rutland, seeking to distract her mind, "the light is so good that we can read it."

"Let us go back," said Alizon.

The young man obeyed without a word, and a few minutes later they were back in the hotel again.

In the corridor they saw one of the nurses.

"Her ladyship continues better," said the woman. "Everything is happening just as the doctor said."

"Oh, I am glad!" cried the girl.

"I hope you will get some rest now," said Rutland. "You ought for your mother's sake. Believe me, you will be a sorry nurse unless you study your own health."

Alizon answered him by a wan smile, and then found her way to her mother's room. Lady Neville was sleeping quietly. The fever had much abated, and her whole appearance bespoke a change for the better.

"Thank God! thank God!" she ejaculated. "Yes, I can rest now."

She went to the drawing-room where Brother Francis lay on the sofa. His mouth was wide open, and he snored vigorously. Alizon could not help smiling, for a more grotesque form it would be hard to conceive. It would be difficult to find a man whose personal appearance suggested spiritual things less than that of Brother Francis. His red pimply skin, his widely-extended mouth, and his fat stodgy figure, told of good living and freedom from care. It was impossible to conceive that this man had ever grappled with intellectual difficulties, or faced the great problems of the spiritual world.

The girl was about to leave the room when she caught sight of a book lying on the table. On examining it she at first gave a start, then cast a hasty glance around the room. Yes, she was unobserved, no one was there but the sleeping priest. With hurried steps she went to her bedroom, taking the book with her.

Arrived there she examined the room as though she were afraid, but after making sure that she was alone, she locked the door, and then drawing a wicker-chair under the electric light, she sat down and buried her face in her hands. For more than an hour she sat thus. Evidently she was thinking deeply, and when presently she lifted her head, her eyes shone with a strange light. She rose from her chair, and for some time walked to and fro in the room, then she sat down and began reading the book she had brought with her.

"Mr. Rutland must have left it there," she said, "yes, it is his, his name is on the title-page."

For a little time she seemed to be in doubt about something; she was evidently nervous too, for her hand trembled like an aspen leaf.

"I can't sleep," she cried impatiently, "I must do something. I will go into mother's room again."

The girl hurried out, locking the door behind her, and a few seconds later she was standing by her mother's bedside.

Lady Neville was still sleeping quietly. There could be no doubt about it, she was much better. By her side was the grotesque little figure of the wooden Bambino, whose glassy eyes seemed staring into vacancy.

Alizon turned away hurriedly, and returned to her bedroom again, locking the door. Taking up Rutland's book again, she read for more than two hours. Evidently she was much interested, for she turned the leaves hurriedly, never lifting her eyes from the pages. When she had finished, she glanced around the room like one afraid. She looked at her watch, and her eyes expressed wonder.

"I had no idea it was so late," she said, pulling up the blind. The sun was rising in a clear sky, all nature was awaking into life.

She fell beside her bed, and remained kneeling until she heard someone knocking at her door.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SIGHT-SEEING.

THREE days later Lady Neville, although still weak, was pronounced by the doctors to be out of all danger. Her illness had been short, but it had been severe. Brother Francis attributed her speedy recovery to the healing power of the Bambino, Sister Mary uttered many pious ejaculations, and praised the virtues of the sainted child.

The other nurse smiled scornfully, while the doctors shrugged their shoulders.

"Pah," said the Italian physician, "did I not say that we should cure her and the doll would get the credit? But what does it matter?" and he laughed contemptuously.

Meanwhile the Bambino was taken back to the Franciscan Church, and placed in its little cabinet behind the altar. Rutland said nothing about Lady Neville's cure, and Alizon was also very reticent. She was overjoyed at her mother's return to health, but spoke to no one concerning the means which had been used. Indeed, she seemed anxious to abstain from all reference to the Bambino, for when one day Sister Mary, the pious Catholic nurse, assured her ladyship that her recovery had been a miracle, and then looked to Alizon for confirmation of her words, the girl left the room hastily without replying.

For several days Rutland scarcely saw her. She remained in close attendance on her mother, and did not appear in the public rooms even at dinner. And so the young man continued his tours around Rome, sometimes in company with Father Matthew, sometimes alone. He said nothing concerning his opinions of what he saw, but he was none the less observant. He asked many questions, and took careful note of the answers given. Evidently, too, he was deeply impressed. On one occasion when Father Matthew accompanied him to the great Church of St. John's Lateran, where a number of young priests were ordained, the Jesuit observed that he never took his eyes away from the officiating Bishop, and the young men who claimed that morning to be endowed with priestly power.

"Very impressive, isn't it?" asked Father Matthew.

"It is exceedingly interesting," replied Rutland, but although Father Matthew asked him many questions, he did not tell him what he really thought of the gorgeous ceremonial.

Also when visiting the renowned Jesuit Church of Rome, and the rooms where Ignatius Loyola wrote his famous Constitutions, he seemed like one in a trance. Father Matthew had difficulty in getting him away. He went from one room to another, and then revisited them as if anxious that nothing should escape him. Especially did he linger in the apartment where Ignatius saw a vision of the Trinity, and where a picture, which translated the vision to canvas, was exhibited. He asked many questions concerning the circumstances which attended the vision, and appeared much disappointed at the vague answers given. Then again, when examining the many relics for which this, the head-quarters of the Jesuits, is famous, he asked for some proof of their miraculous power, he was evidently much disappointed in the priest's replies.

"Oh, there can be no doubt about their healing power," Father Matthew would say again and again.

"Yes, but what proof do you offer to a sceptic?"

"Well, now," replied the priest, "take this finger. It belonged to a most holy nun. There was a movement set on foot for her beatification, and, of course, before this could be done it had to be proved that the nun, whose name was Teresa, had worked a miracle. Well, this finger," and the priest pointed to a bit of dried bone which lay under the glass case before them, "had been preserved. It was taken to a woman, who, the doctors declared was dying, and immediately it was placed in the dying woman's hand she got well."

"Who was the woman?"

"I really don't know."

"Where did she live?"

"Here in Rome."

"How long ago?"

"Oh, sixty or seventy years since."

"But you don't know her name?"

"Oh no."

"But who were the doctors who declared that she was dying?"

"I really don't know,"

"But did they sign a certificate to the effect that the woman was dying?"

"I really never thought of it."

"Do you know if these doctors were deeply learned in the laws of health, and in the science of medicine?"

"Oh, there can be no doubt they would be. You see Teresa was made a saint, and consequently the matter would be carefully investigated. The Devil's Advocate would see to it that every point was discussed. Why, it took a long time to prove the case; indeed, it is one of the most expensive cases of the century. It cost over £3,000."

"Cost over £3,000 to make a saint! How?"

"Well, you see, when the desire was expressed to make her a saint, there was a lot of opposition on the part of the Devil's Advocate. You see, there are always two advocates appointed by the Church when there is an attempt made for the canonisation, or beatification of any one. One advocate argues in favour of the holiness, and the miraculous power of the departed one; and the other argues against it. The latter is called the Devil's Advocate. Of course, a Council of the Church is called to adjudicate; and thus you see what with fees paid to the advocates, to the Council, and to the Holy Father, it becomes a very expensive matter. In this case there was much controversy, and it swallowed up over £3,000."

"Of course, this money goes to the funds of the Church?"

"Of course; and to the advocates."

"I see. That is always the case, whether the man or woman is made a saint or not?"

"Certainly."

The foregoing is a sample of many of the conversations which took place as Rutland visited one sacred shrine after another. The young minister gave no opinion on anything he saw or heard; but he was evidently deeply impressed.

When Lady Neville was sufficiently recovered, she asked Rutland to dine with her in her private dining-room, and the young man, although almost dreading spending the evening with Alizon, consented. Try as he might he could not destroy the love which he again and again told himself was madness. And thus it was while it gave him pain to be near her and to speak with her, he was unable to resist the spell which she had cast upon him. No man knows how weak he really is until he falls in love. Then, in many cases, reason goes by the board, and men who are sane and strong in other matters, become the sport of passing impulses.

"I am afraid," said Lady Neville during the evening, "that Alizon is having what the Lancashire people call a 'weary time.'"

"No, mother," cried Alizon, "I am very happy now you are getting well."

"I don't like your pale cheeks, my darling," said her ladyship, "and yet I am not strong enough to take much exercise."

"Can I be of any service?" asked Rutland. "If Miss Alizon will accompany me on my journeys around the city, I shall be delighted."

"No, no, mother," cried Alizon, "I do not wish to leave you. I am much happier with you."

"But there is no reason why you should stay with me, my dear," said her ladyship. "It is a fortnight now since I was taken ill, and in that time you have scarcely left my side."

"I have a splendid excursion mapped out for to-morrow," said Rutland, yielding to his longing to spend another day in Alizon's company. "In the morning I am visiting 'the Sacred Steps,' close by St. John's Lateran. After that I am going to a church where a part of the true Cross is exhibited. Then I have arranged to go to the Trappist Monastery, where it is said St. Paul was beheaded. On my way there I pass by the church built on the spot where Father Matthew says St. Peter saw our Lord. On the following day I hope to visit the Forum, and also to see the dungeon where St. Peter was imprisoned. If I have time I shall call at the church where the miraculous image of the Virgin Mary is placed. Possibly also I may be able to visit another church, where the chains which bound St. Peter are kept."

"Can you resist such a programme?" said Lady Neville smiling. "I feel I must accept Mr. Rutland's kindness for you, if you will not do so for yourself."

The girl's eyes kindled as Duncan mentioned the places he intended to visit, and yielding to the impulse of the moment, she accepted.

Rutland had now been more than a month in Rome, and was becoming acquainted with the city. He had also been able to pick up a smattering of the language, and could read the Italian papers without much difficulty. Each day, moreover, he was understanding more and more, the spell which Rome casts upon all who really breathe her atmosphere. He felt the truth of the saying that no man can understand the history of civilisation until he has spent some time in Rome.

He was now sufficiently strong to bear a day's sight-seeing without being fatigued, and it was with a fast-beating heart that he took his seat beside Alizon on the following morning, and told the cabman to drive to St. John's Lateran. He felt that the gulf between himself and Alizon was deepening and widening. Rome was affecting him in many ways, and in spite of their being thrown together by Lady Neville's illness, he knew that Alizon was less frank with him than she had been during the first part of her stay in Rome.

Close to St. John's Lateran is a little church called the Santa Scala, or the Church of the Sacred Steps. It is so named because it is ascended by a number of steps which St. Helena brought from Jerusalem. These steps, it was asserted, were those on which our Saviour trod when leaving Pilate's house.

When Duncan and Alizon arrived here they found Father Matthew awaiting them.

"This place is most interesting," said the priest. "Whoever goes up these steps has 1,000 years' indulgence granted."

"I see there are two sets of steps up to the church," said Rutland.

"Ah, yes, but it is only these on the right by which you can gain the indulgence. Look at those people."

The sight was indeed interesting; for just before them were about thirty people going up the marble stairway on their knees. Some were stooping and kissing the cold stones.

"You see," went on the priest, "the only way to get the indulgence is to go up on your knees. Indeed, you are not allowed to ascend any other way."

"A thousand years," said Duncan, "it is a long time."

"Yes, one of the Popes granted this great favour."

"Have you ever ascended them?" asked Rutland.

"No, I never have."

The young minister smiled, but he said nothing. Alizon looked at his face steadily, as if she wished to read his thoughts.

"Why do those poor people kiss the stones?" she asked.

"They are kissing the places where drops of blood fell from our Saviour," replied the priest. "It is very beautiful, isn't it? On certain days it is very crowded."

"I wonder it is not always crowded," said the girl, "that is——" but she did not finish the sentence.

"I suppose that arch-heretic Luther came here when he first visited Rome," said Father Matthew.

"Indeed," said Rutland, "did he go up?"

"Yes;—that is he went up part way. Then—he came down again."

"I can quite believe it," laughed Rutland.

"He was always a doubter," said the priest sharply.

"Are you not a doubter yourself?" asked Rutland.

"A doubter? Most certainly not! Why do you ask?"

"I was only thinking that if 1,000 years' freedom from purgatorial flames were granted to you by such an act, that it is strange you have never taken advantage of it."

The young priest coloured, but did not answer.

"Would you like to walk up by the other steps and see the picture painted by St. Luke? It is a likeness of our Lord, and the chapel is called the Holy of Holies, and no one is allowed to officiate there but the Pope."

"What proof is there that the picture was painted by St. Luke?" asked Rutland.

"Oh, we have the tradition of the Church!"

"Nothing else?"

"We want nothing more."

"Let us see it by all means; that is if you would like," and he turned to Alizon.

"Oh, yes," said the girl absently, "let us see it."

"I suppose you depend on the tradition of the Church also in proof that Christ ever trod those steps?" said Rutland, as they walked up a stairway close by.

"Yes. That is, St. Helena discovered them."

"But she lived 300 years after Christ. How did she know that He walked on them?"

"I really have not studied the matter, but no doubt there is ample proof in the Church records."

"Just so." Rutland did not speak while they looked through a grating at a blurred piece of canvas, neither for that matter did Alizon. Both of them seemed thinking deeply.

When they left the little church a crowd of beggars thronged around them, showing diseased and mutilated limbs, and soliciting alms.

"Let us get away!" cried Father Matthew. "It is a shame that these wretches are allowed around the church doors."

Alizon threw them a handful of small coins however, and they entered the carriage.

"I am sorry I have not had time to gain a permission for a lady to enter that church yonder," and the priest pointed to a building which stood some little distance away.

"What is it?" asked Rutland.

"It is a monastery," said Father Matthew, "and ladies are not allowed to enter without a special permit. It is a pity, because a part of the true Cross is exhibited there, also one of the nails driven through the hand of our Lord."

"I am very sorry," said Rutland. "You would have liked to have seen it, wouldn't you?" and he turned to Alizon.

"Oh yes!" said the girl, "of course you have proof that it is the true Cross?"

"Undoubted proof," said the priest. "After St. Helena was converted, she found three Crosses one day, and she came to the conclusion that they were the Crosses of Christ and the two thieves. Naturally she wished to discover which was the Cross on which our Lord hung. Near by was a sick man, and she took these Crosses to him. The man touched one of them and he was made no better; he touched the second and he was made rather worse; he touched the third and he was made quite well. She concluded that this was the true Cross, and a part of it is in that church."

The girl was silent.

"On certain days," went on Father Matthew, "these relics are exhibited and people are granted special indulgences. I am sorry you cannot see them to-day. I will however get permission to take you there. Meanwhile we can go and see the chains which bound St. Peter."

A little later they came to an old church, in which were magnificently carved statues, and many fine paintings; indeed the churches of Rome have a wealth of art within them, which may well make the rest of the world envious.

They went to a room beneath the Altar, and there saw a piece of chain, which certainly did not look nearly two thousand years old.

"This is a very valuable relic," said the priest. "Fancy the chains which bound him to whom the Keys of the Church were given."

"Yes, it is very interesting—if it is the very chain," said Rutland.

The priest laughed. "Oh, but you are a doubter, Mr. Rutland," he said, "you require as much proof as St. Thomas himself."

But Rutland did not reply, instead he found his way to what is perhaps one of the finest pieces of statuary of which the world can boast. It was the figure of Moses, carved by Michael Angelo.

"Do you know," said the young minister, turning to Alizon, "that when Michael Angelo had finished carving that magnificent figure, he tapped it with his chisel, 'Speak,' he cried."

"And no wonder," said Alizon. "It looks as though it could. The sculptor has conceived Moses grandly. He is prophet, warrior, statesman, and leader of men, all in one."

"You seem to think more of the figure of Moses than of St. Peter's chains," said the priest. "Ah, but it is lunch-time!"

In the afternoon they visited the dungeon where legend had it St. Peter was imprisoned. The priest told them that here St. Peter converted one of his gaolers, but he was in a dilemma, as there was no water with which to baptise him. But the Apostle struck the floor with his foot, and immediately water sprung up.

"Here is the well now," said the priest, lifting a cover. "It has existed ever since, and the water has healing power. Will you drink?"

Rutland drank, but Alizon refused.

"You see this mark here on this stone," went on Father Matthew. "One of the gaolers got angry with St. Peter and struck him. St. Peter's face fell against the stone, and the likeness is here now. Wonderful, isn't it?"

"Very," replied Rutland.

"I suppose you are wanting proof again," laughed the priest.

"I want proof that Peter was ever in Rome at all," said Rutland. "Honestly, I know of none. At any rate, if he ever was here the writers of the New Testament regarded it of such little importance that they never mentioned it."

"But we have history."

"What history?"

"The Church traditions."

"Oh yes; but outside them?"

"Well, really, I have never given the matter special attention."

"But is it not a matter of vital importance?"

"Yes, it is, and doubtless proofs can be forthcoming, but I have not given attention to them. Shall we drive to the Trappist Monastery out beyond St. Paul's Church? St. Paul himself was beheaded there."

"Yes, by all means let us go," said Rutland.

CHAPTER XXVII.

HOW RUTLAND AND ALIZON SAW THE POPE OF ROME.

THE rest of their experiences during the day need not be described in detail. Although they saw many sights, the true inwardness of everything was the same. They saw the church built on the spot where legend said that Peter saw Christ, and where the Apostle's death was foretold. They visited another shrine where Peter and Paul met and embraced, and they heard stories of the most wonderful nature. For not even Jerusalem itself can boast of as many legends as Rome. The Eternal City is the home of romance. Perhaps their most interesting visit was to the Trappist Monastery, where it is said Paul was beheaded. The old Trappist monk who had a dispensation for the occasion, told them that when the headsman's axe fell the Apostle's head gave three leaps, and each time it fell a fountain of water burst forth. He showed them the three wells, and told them that the water was much in demand for the cure of diseases. When Rutland asked for evidence in support of the statement that St. Paul was beheaded there, and that his death was attended by such miraculous circumstances, the monk pointed to the wells of water. The proof, he said, that St. Paul's death caused the three fountains lay in the fact that they were there before them. For his part he wanted nothing more.

The second day's experiences were like unto those of the first. Objects of wonder appeared galore, miraculous stories were told freely, but historical proof was always wanting. To those who can believe on the authority of tradition, Rome is the home of wonders, the very Mecca of faith. But to those who ask for proof, it offers nothing. And yet the two days which Alizon and Rutland spent together in the company of the young priest were full of interest. Stripped of all the gew-gaws of superstition Rome is still the cradle of history, the home of civilisation. More, the history of Roman Catholicism in Rome is the history of art, the history of the struggle of noble souls to find truth.

The stories told concerning many of the pictures might have no foundation in fact; but the pictures themselves might have been painted by the hands of angels. The wealth of the world has been poured into Rome, the genius of the world is represented there. Italy itself is a bankrupt nation, it shivers on the very verge of destruction, and yet there is stored in the churches sufficient wealth to lift from the country the incubus of its crushing debts. Its squares are triumphs of art, its statues are the highest expressions of the sculptor's power. In many respects Rome is a disappointing city, but in its disappointments it arouses admiration, enthusiasm. Every inch of the ground on which it is built is historical; on its stones is written the story of the nations. The inwardness of Rome has yet to be unfolded. To the thinking man, the city is not helpful to faith, nay, its history has been the history of error and superstition, and yet the system which it represents must at one period have been the inspiration of the world. The atmosphere of the Papal capital is the atmosphere of mental disease, and death, and yet every one must feel that in the zenith of its greatness it must have possessed a wondrous life, and that at every beat of its mighty heart it sent its life-blood through the veins of the nations.

Every stone, every statue, every picture of Papal Rome tells of unrivalled devotion, of implicit faith, and of boundless enthusiasm. They speak of a nation which blindly obeyed, and which never thought of questioning priestly authority. But they also proclaim the fact of childish credulity, of black ignorance, and of mental poverty. It is a city of contrasts, mentally as well as materially. It tells how genius can for a time go hand in hand with ignorance, and that reason can even be friendly with baseless superstitions.

The hand of death is on Papal Rome to-day, and its struggles are but feeble. It possesses but little intellectual or national power. True, many pay allegiance to it, but that allegiance is paid not because of what it is, but because of what it was. Step by step the Vatican is yielding to the Quirinal; day by day the papal chair is sinking, while the throne is rising.

Faith is no longer the keynote of the land. Atheism has lifted its scowling face, and although superstition shrieks out its anathemas, the hoarse shouts of unbelief grow louder, while the shrieks of a dying faith become more feeble and more despairing. The ignorant still believe, and the hand of the ages is still felt by a number of the people. But the hand is cold, and gives neither hope nor confidence. Papal Rome is regarded by a vast number of Romans simply as a system, it is not felt as a life. Gorgeous ceremonials still abound, all the old forms are still maintained, and many there are who do not see that Death has set his mark. But the mark is plainly to be seen.

Rutland felt all this during the next few days. The truth came to him slowly, but when it came there was no gainsaying it. Once or twice Alizon Neville accompanied him on his journeys, but he said nothing to her concerning his thoughts.

When he had been in Rome between six and seven weeks he seemed to grow restless. He gave up sight-seeing, and wandered aimlessly around the city.

"Are you not well to-day?" asked Lady Neville, as they sat down to lunch one morning.

"Oh yes, I am nearly as strong as ever. But I am thinking of leaving Rome," he replied.

"When?"

"Oh, in a day or so! I thought of going to Naples and Pompeii for a few days, and then of returning home by way of Assisi and Florence and Venice."

"But I have a great treat for you," said her ladyship smiling.

"You are always kind to me," replied Rutland, "and I am at a loss to know in what way you can grant me further favours."

"I have had an interview with Cardinal Lostella this morning," said her ladyship. "He informs me that there is to be a great Papal function at the Sistine Chapel on Friday next, and he has secured tickets for Alizon and myself, and he told me that he would also reserve one for you if you cared to come with us."

"This is good of you!" cried Rutland. "I was talking with Father Matthew yesterday, and he was telling me that it would be extremely difficult for me to see the Pope. There was a great demand for tickets, he said, and as the chapel is so small, only a chosen few could be present."

"Well, we can be among the chosen few," replied her ladyship. "You will not, I am afraid, be able to have a seat in the chapel itself, but you will be able to stand in the passage, and see his Holiness as he is carried from the Vatican into the chapel, and also see him on his return after the function is over."

"I am favoured," cried Rutland. "I have wanted to see the Pope more than words can say. At first Father Rizzio thought he would be able to secure me a ticket, but lately he has been very dubious. But your acquaintance with Cardinal Lostella makes all the difference."

"I am sorry you cannot see the function itself," went on Lady Neville, "but Cardinal Lostella could obtain only one ticket for that, and he insists on giving it to me. So you will have to take care of Alizon."

"If she will trust herself to me, I shall be delighted," said Rutland.

The girl flushed slightly, and expressed her eagerness to witness the procession; but she did not seem so pleased as Rutland expected she would be. Indeed, the young man realised with an aching heart, that he was becoming more and more alienated from Alizon Neville. Her manner became more and more reserved, and her interest in his conversion seemed to have gone altogether. During the first few days of her stay in Rome she spoke often to him about the glories of the Catholic faith, and of the pain and poverty of those who stayed outside the fold of the Church; but latterly she had adopted a different attitude. She appeared to regard his conversion as hopeless, and the fact had evidently made the gulf between them impassable.

When Friday came Rutland was excited beyond measure. He reflected that he would that day see the Pope, king of two hundred and fifty millions of people, he would behold the last in that long succession of men who had shaped the destinies of the nations. However groundless the claims of the Papacy might be, the sight would be of paramount interest. For Leo XIII. claimed to be the Vicar of Christ, the Vicegerent of the Almighty; and there were thousands in Rome, and millions throughout the world, who conceded all he claimed. Even although power was slipping from his hands he retained its semblance, and the unthinking multitude did not distinguish between the two.

Having dressed himself in accordance with the instructions given, he accompanied Lady Neville and Alizon to St. Peter's, where a great crowd had gathered. There was something electric in the atmosphere. It seemed as though the dying embers of faith were being fanned into a flame in many hearts. The fact that they were going to see the Pope made men and women forget their doubts and their fears. Even the sight-seers who had gathered to see the favoured ones who possessed tickets of admission into the building, were evidently filled with enthusiasm. After all, human nature is the same all over the world. Mankind loves gorgeous spectacles, and there is a tendency on the part of the unthinking to regard the great ones of the world at their own estimate. Just as those who believe in a republican form of government will cry, "Long live the King!" or "Long live the Queen!" at the sight of a royal procession, even although they would in their calm moments vote for their dethronement, so there are many who have given up their faith in the Papacy, who will shout at the approach of the Pope.

"I WISH TO SPEAK TO YOU ALONE."

On reaching St. Peter's, Lady Neville was conducted into the chapel, while Alizon and Rutland stayed in the corridor through which the Pope was to pass. It wanted more than an hour to the time before Leo XIII. would appear, but every inch of space was occupied. Through the influence of Cardinal Lostella, however, both Rutland and Alizon obtained a position close to the door of the chapel where they could see everything very clearly.

"We are fortunate," said the young man.

"Yes, it is delightful," she answered, and Rutland saw that her cheeks were flushed, and that her eyes flashed with excitement.

The great majority of the people in the corridor were women. Many of them were English Protestants, but they were devoured with curiosity. Seeing the Pope was to them the proper climax of their visit to Rome. They would have been just as excited if they were in a Mohammedan or Buddhist country, and were about to behold one of their spectacular displays. Others, on the contrary, were ardent Catholics. If their faith had been dying, it was now roused into life again. Some of them were weeping with very joy. Rutland marked the trembling lips and clenched hands of the people. For the time, at any rate, the vision of the Pope was as the vision of God Himself.

"I have longed all my life for this hour," he heard them say one to another. "Oh, to see him! to be close to him! to breathe the same air which he breathes!"

Nothing is more contagious than enthusiasm and excitement. It is like the spread of a fever, for the same laws obtain in the mental and physical world. Nothing of importance was said, and yet the enthusiasm grew. Men, who when they first came, were calm and almost indifferent, became infected with the atmosphere they breathed, and were as eager as the others. Rutland felt the same influence himself. Under the excitement of the moment he felt like saying with the others, "Long live the Pope-king!"

And yet the Pope had not appeared. Leo XIII. was noted for being late, and it might be an hour before he would pass by, but the thought that he would come, made him forget his early training and the study of years. He was possessed with the idea of the Papacy. The unreasoning faith of those around him made him feel the mystery, the majesty of Papal claims. For the moment it did not matter whether these claims had any foundation, the fact that many around him believed in them made him forget to criticise. At that moment the chain of succession seemed unbroken, and in the eye of imagination he fancied it as a channel through which the life of God flowed. The thought was awe-inspiring. This man whom he would soon see possessed the keys of heaven. He had the power to bind and loose, to curse and bless! He was the manifestation of God on earth! All around him were those who believed it implicitly, and the wave of faith which covered the waiting throng covered him also.

Just as the multitudes in heathen lands have looked up to their wise men and witch-doctors, believing that they had power from the spirit-world, so did the eager, panting crowd regard the Pope as the mouthpiece of God!

The minutes passed slowly by, and the air grew hot almost to suffocation, but the excitement did not grow less, rather it increased until some of the women grew hysterical. Presently however, there was movement among the people, and the cry went up, "Here he comes! Here he comes!"

Rutland felt his heart beat faster, he knew not why, while Alizon grew pale to the lips.

The procession passed slowly along the corridor. It was evidently carefully arranged, but Rutland paid but little attention to the giant forms of the Swiss Guards, or the gorgeous attire of the domestic prelates, who preceded the Pope's cortege. He strained his eyes to see the one central figure in the procession, the one man he had so longed to see. He came in sight presently, and for a moment there was a great hush, like the hush of death, and then immediately after a cry of gladness arose, as if Christ Himself had come back to earth.

Rutland saw him plainly; he was seated in a kind of chair, which was carried by strong hands. Around him was much gaudy drapery, and the old man was clothed with costly white vestments. But the young man took no notice of all these; his eyes were fixed on the features of the aged pontiff. For a moment a feeling of pity came into his heart. He was so weary, so frail, so thin, so weak. His face was as pale as death, his hands were almost transparent, he looked little more than a skeleton covered with dried parchment. He might have been dead but for his eyes; they were black and piercing, and burnt with the fire of life.

He put out his hands feebly, as if in the act of blessing, while some of the people fell to their knees sobbing hysterically, and others shouted with wild enthusiasm.

Why, he could not tell, but directly the Pope was carried near to the spot where Rutland stood, and he saw the little old man plainly, then all his excitement and enthusiasm departed. He seemed to see through the trappings, and beheld the heart of it all. The Pope struck no awe into his soul, he aroused no reverence. All around him the vast majority of the people knelt and sobbed and shouted; but he stood quite still, he was utterly unmoved. He could no more kneel before that frail man, than he could kneel before an Indian idol. All his claims were the creations of an ignorant age, they were born in darkness, and they were dying in the growing light.

Just as the Pope's cortege arrived at the spot opposite where Rutland stood, the procession was delayed for a minute, so that the Pope remained near him for that space of time. So close was he that he could have touched him if he had stretched forth his hand; indeed, some around him frantically reached forward that they might put their hands upon the chair which bore him.

How weary, how very weary he looked, and so old, so painfully old! He seemed to the young man as the symbol of a religion that was near its death, rather than as the expression of that which would never die.

"Santa Padre, Io impetro la vostra Santa Benedizione!" sobbed the Italians.

"J'implôre humblement votre sacré bénédiction, sainte Père!" cried the French.

"Bless me, bless me, Holy Father!" prayed the English.

The old man smiled. There is always something sweet in an old man's smile, especially if he be pure and good. Rutland's heart melted as he saw it. Why should he not kneel and receive the pontiff's benediction? But he could not. Not because he did not desire the blessing, but because he could not kneel to a man who made claims to power that he did not possess. He could pay him homage as a good old man, the head of a vast organisation, but he could not kneel to him as the only living successor of Peter. It was all a vain show, and the pretensions of the Popes had checked the march of civilisation, they had hindered the light of God, they had inspired bigotry and persecution, they had turned Europe into a field of carnage and bloodshed. No, he could not kneel, he could not! It would be sacrilege, blasphemy!

The Pope lifted his frail hands again, and his keen, dark, penetrating eyes swept over the crowd. He saw Rutland, one of the few standing figures, he saw the look of unbelief in his eyes. He lifted his hand and spread three fingers over the crowd, and the procession passed into the chapel.

Still the people waited. The excitement had somewhat passed away, but none of them would leave until the Pontiff returned from the chapel. They had not to wait very long; evidently the service was only brief. A little more than half an hour later he was again borne through the panting throng. This time, however, the old man paid but little heed to the shouts and sobs of the people. He was evidently worn out with the service within the chapel, and desired the quiet of his own apartments. Still he again lifted his hands as if in the act of blessing, and then dropped them wearily. A few minutes later the door had closed, and the aged head of the Roman Church was hidden from their sight. At first there was a murmur among the people as of disappointment, but little by little the feeling passed away, and they prepared to depart. It was surprising how suddenly the interest of the gathering had ceased, surprising, too, how quickly the wave of emotion and religious enthusiasm departed. In a few minutes they were able to speak of the procession as a wonderful spectacle, and to express gratification at what they had seen.

"I wouldn't have missed it for anything," Rutland heard one woman say. (He had noticed that she had been hysterical a little while before.) "I don't think the Holy Father will last long, do you? Oh! I hope I shall be able to be present at the coronation of the new Pope! Who will it be, I wonder? Cardinal Lostella, perhaps."

"Yes," was the reply, "it was splendid. You Catholics can arrange processions far better than Protestants. It was very fine, but I don't believe much in it."

The crowd passed into the open air. They were able to gossip freely now, and to exchange views on what they had seen.

When Alizon and Rutland reached the square they waited for Lady Neville. Rutland's heart was as heavy as lead. He had during the last few minutes formed a great resolution. He looked at the girl by his side, she was subdued and did not seem inclined for conversation.

"When can I have a few minutes' private conversation with you?" he asked suddenly.

The girl looked up inquiringly.

"Oh, I must!" he cried, almost rudely. "I shall not keep you long. I wish to speak to you alone. It is most likely the last favour I shall ever ask of you."

"You wish to speak with me alone?" she repeated.

"Yes, on an important matter. What we have just seen has decided me."

Again the girl flashed an inquiring look.

"I shall be alone after dinner to-night," she said. "My mother has invited a lady to dine with us. They will be glad to dispense with me afterwards." "At nine o'clock you will meet me in the hall, then?"

"Yes, if you wish."

Soon after Lady Neville joined them, and they drove back to the hotel together.

A LUSHAI VILLAGE.

Pioneering in Assam

IN Lushailand the gathering in of the harvest is an occasion for much feasting and drinking. Large quantities of beer are made from rice, and the older men spend three or four days and nights singing dirge-like songs and drinking without cessation. This drink has a soothing effect upon them, so that when drunk they are exceedingly friendly. It is interesting to note that the Lushais as a tribe are exceedingly good-tempered, anger being almost unknown. Like all other primitive folk they are exceedingly improvident, and use so much rice in the manufacture of beer, that long before the next harvest is due, they are without food. Women then have to go to the jungles to hunt for roots, leaves, etc. Consequently, there is then a great deal of sickness. When ill the Lushai calls in the doctor, who is called the "puithian." He feels the pulse, looks wise, and advises the patient what animal should be sacrificed "to appease the evil spirit" which is supposed to be the cause of his illness. (Truth compels us to state that the cunning "doctor" prescribes a large or small animal proportionate to the extent of his appetite, which is the only deity which he cares to appease.) The animal being at once provided, the gleeful doctor and a few friends retire just outside the village, and while he sacrifices the animal under a tree, his friends prepare a fire and pot of boiling water. The sacrifice completed, the friends quickly boil and serve up the offering. In fairness it must be mentioned that a small portion of the sacrifice is saved and carried to the house for the sick man to eat. The uneatable remains of the slaughtered animal are left upon the tiny altar for the consumption of the spirit, who comes along in the shape of a hungry dog. As may be imagined, if the patient is seriously ill, the administration of a piece of half-cooked pork will probably hasten his departure, or at all events, be a distinct disadvantage.

These pseudo-doctors never offered any opposition to the administration of the missionaries' drugs, in fact, often both missionary and doctor were in the house at the same time.

When a Lushai dies, his friends gather, dress him in his best clothes, and put him in a sitting posture in the house. Several of the older men of the village come to the house, brew beer, sit and drink and sing about the house, while around the corpse gather his nearer relatives, and fill the air with wails, calling the dead man by his name, and beseeching him to speak. The younger men assemble outside the house, and soon begin to dig a deep grave near the front door. At sundown the deceased is interred in his clothes with his pipe, chopper, and other worldly possessions, as it is believed that the spirits of these inanimate objects accompany the deceased to the other world. If the man is wealthy, some domestic animal is sacrificed in order that its spirit may accompany him, and be his property in the Great Beyond. The "Dead Man's Village," as the Unknown World is called, is supposed to lie away to the east of the Lushai mountains.

When a little child dies it is often put into an earthen pot and buried underneath the house. When a mother died and left a little child who was too small to feed itself, their custom was to bury the live child with the dead mother, as the Lushais have no means of bringing up a child "by hand." Within the last few years this custom has been prevented by the British, as the good wife of the political officer has kindly undertaken to have such infants cared for until they are able to feed themselves, when they are returned to their homes.

When a chief dies he is not usually buried at all. The corpse is laid in a coffin, made by hollowing out a large tree, and sealing the cylinder with mud, which is placed in the middle of the house, in front of the family fire-place. A small bamboo tube communicating with the bottom of the coffin passes through the floor of the house, into the ground below. A fire is then lighted on the hearth, which the chief's widow keeps burning night and day for about three months. At the end of this time the coffin is opened with much ceremony, and is found to contain nothing but dried bones, which are carefully preserved in a basket in a corner of the house. Upon special occasions the skull is taken from the basket, wrapped round with a sheet, placed upon a dummy body, and paraded around the village with great pomp.

The religious ideas of the Lushais are very vague. Happily they have no Hindoo caste system with all its exclusiveness. They believe in a Good Spirit, a Creator, and also in an Evil Spirit, who has multitudes of emissaries. Every valley, mountain, tree and stream has its own peculiar evil spirit. These are constantly trying to harm man, and all sickness is attributed to their malignant influence. Believing that the Good Spirit will do him no harm, the Lushai spends the whole of his religious energies in striving to appease the evil spirits with whom it is good policy to keep friends. Only before, and at the harvest, do they think of sacrificing to the Good Spirit. The story of the resurrection of Jesus Christ appeals most powerfully to these people, as in it they recognise that the Son of the Good Spirit is stronger than all the powers of the evil one. They believe that after death the majority of people are carried away by evil spirits.

One of the first questions which the Lushai asks upon hearing the Gospel, is: "If I believe in Jesus Christ shall I always keep quite well?" so that the missionaries have to combine the teaching of hygiene—of which the Lushais are utterly ignorant—with Christianity.

Their materialism is also seen in the fact that with them "wealthy" and "good" person are synonymous terms. The Gospel appeals most to the poor, for the wealthy are believed to go to the better place, no matter what their deeds may have been. If a wealthy man is able to sacrifice a certain number of domestic animals during his life he will possess the spirits of these animals in the after-world, and they will be his passport into the happy hunting grounds. A poor man, on the other hand, has no hope whatever of going to the happy abode of the departed wealthy ones, but will have to live and work very much as he does in this state of existence. There is some faint idea of transmigration in the minds of some, as they believe that after many years, the spirit of the departed one returns to this world in the shape of an insect, which in its turn is transformed into a dew-drop, and eventually becomes re-incarnated.

The amount of linguistic work which our friends have accomplished is truly remarkable, and they willingly gave some information with regard to the acquirement of an unwritten language. This strange people say that they never had any written language of their own, but they have a tradition to the effect that when all the nations were assembled to receive the gift of writing, the Lushais had theirs written upon a piece of leather. They were so pleased that they all got drunk, the piece of leather fell into a stream, was fished out and put upon a stone to dry; a hungry dog came near, saw the tempting morsel and appropriated it. From that time they had not a written language, so that they hailed the work of these missionaries as the restoration of their long-lost treasure.

As may be anticipated in an uncrystallised language, there are differences of opinion among the natives themselves with regard to the exact meanings of words. They were at the outset confronted by this difficulty:—they found that the Lushai word for the Good Spirit was the same as was used down south for the Evil Spirit. When our linguists wished to know definitely whether "Pathian" were the Good Spirit or the Evil One, and interrogated six Lushais, three gave one version, while three gave another, and they were quite unable to get a satisfactory solution of that problem.

For the first two years the missionaries concentrated their attention upon the language, as they feared that with their crude knowledge of the language, they might give the people misconceptions of the actual truths they wished to teach. This policy was justified by their subsequent knowledge of the subtle differences of words which were entirely opposites in meaning. During all this time they mixed with the people, tried to identify themselves with them, and, as some people built near their bungalow on each side, the missionaries found themselves finally living in the centre of a large Lushai village. Eventually the natives made confidants of the strangers, told them of their joys and sorrows, asked their advice on many points, and acquainted them with their folk-lore and history. They found that the natives were fond of hearing about the wonders of Eng'land, of its Queen, and of its facilities for travel. While they showed the people their picture books and stereoscopic views, the learners listened to the remarks upon them, took notes, and in that way learnt idiomatic ejaculatory expressions. They found that the stereoscopic views gave the people right ideas of the power and influence of civilisation. Previously they had thought that the Lushai hills were the greater part of the world, as they are a simple, primitive tribe who have not mixed much with the people of the plains.

Our linguists made the acquaintance of an intelligent young Lushai named Staka, who lived near them, and whom they trained to aid them in their linguistic work. He helped them faithfully during the whole of their stay, which was very praiseworthy, as the hill people are so fond of freedom that the Europeans found that servants usually ran away after a month or so. They found their knowledge of Bengali was useful, as the order of words in the two languages is similar, although otherwise the two tongues are totally different. It must be noted that the Lushais are not Aryans, but Mongolians, and that their language comes under the head of the Thibeto-Burman family of languages. In this purely monosyllabic language, the pitch of the voice makes all the difference in the meaning of words. Whether the voice be raised or lowered, or carried straight forward, makes all the difference in meanings. By prolonging the sound of words, by gesticulating and performing the same grimaces they were at length able to convey the proper meaning. At first, when attempting to imitate the sounds of words, they neglected to intone the voice sufficiently, although the word was correctly pronounced, and this was sufficient to give the word quite another meaning. It is interesting to note as an analogy, that there is a fairly long poem in Chinese which is composed of one word of the same spelling constantly repeated, and it is only the varied intonations that modify the meaning of the words.

The people exhibited the greatest delight when the missionaries were able to speak to them.

Strange Lushais visiting their mission often catechised them by asking them to give the Lushai for the simplest objects, in order to test their knowledge of the language. In attempting to derive words from their roots, they had difficulties, as the Lushais had no idea whatever of derivation. Messrs. Savidge and Lorrain endeavoured to learn something from everyone they met, and easily won the confidence and love of the natives. As they read to the people the folk-lore—which had been previously narrated to them—the natives were astonished at their ingenuity and wisdom.

They had previously, in learning and speaking Bengali, become accustomed to the “conscious and analytic sense” with regard to the position of the vocal organs, which is such a necessary aid to one learning unusual pronunciations. They had to pay particular attention to the palatal and dental sounds in this connection, and in these, as on all occasions at the first, when Suaka pronounced words, they watched his tongue, lips, etc. The aspiration of most of the consonants is a peculiarity of the Lushai, and especial care was exercised with regard to this.

Having reduced the language phonetically, according to Hunter's system, they first printed a primer for the children. During this time of preparation they used to talk to the children on the verandah of their bungalow in a simple progressive way, then gradually adults came to the little services.

They showed one picture every Sunday, and found it better to teach with the aid of pictures of Biblical incidents. Then crowds of people came, and in their anxiety to get near, trod upon the garden and spoilt it, and it was considered to be high time to build a little bamboo church. As the people are inveterate smokers, and some of them would not be parted from their pipes even in a service, the fumes they emitted in clouds made it impossible to sing or speak in a closed building, so, (as our photo indicates), they built the church with three open sides. Then they decreed that those who would smoke must stand outside, while those who would leave their pipes at home could sit inside. On Sundays the church was crowded, and outside were dense walls of people. Nearly all strangers who went to trade in the Bengali bazaars in the vicinity used to go to see the missionaries and their stereoscopes. Then they had meetings with them in the little church. Upon certain evenings of the week they used to evangelise three or four villages, situate at one hour's walk in different directions, armed with their English concertinas and various pictures. A picture of the crucifixion especially attracted the attention of the villagers. Eventually they compiled a catechism comprising the substance of the Bible. Every answer was a verse of Scripture. Thus the catechised learned truths and verses of Scripture at the same time. They composed some hymns, and translated others. The boys and girls were very fond of them, and some of these hymns may now be heard "resounding o'er the hills," and conveying their glad message. In their efforts to teach the young people to read and write, they met with difficulties owing to the modesty of some who said that they could never learn to do such wonderful things, but eventually they proved to be very apt scholars. These two teachers were gladdened by the fact that their pupils were very anxious to teach others in their spare time, so that the art of reading and writing spread very rapidly. As they had to commence their translation work, it was imperative that they should cease work in the school. Then the Government sent for a Bengali to come to the missionaries to learn the language in order that he might become schoolmaster. If any chief or any man from a new village would come to the fort to learn to read and write, the Government used to provide him with board and lodgings for three months. After that the Government officials decided that they would send no more verbal orders to the villages, but that everything was to be sent in writing. Since they have left the country a manuscript newspaper has been commenced, which is written by Lushais, and circulated amongst the villages. This contains Government orders as well as local gossip.

As these gentlemen had set themselves the task of translating Luke, John, and the Acts of the Apostles, they enlisted the services of a chief, named Thangphunga, to assist Suaka in aiding them in their work. They found it very difficult to get words to express religious ideas, as there were scarcely any abstract ideas in the language. They had to introduce a new meaning into some of the words to express a spiritual meaning, but by arduous, methodical toil the mountains of difficulties very gradually disappeared. It was interesting to them as they worked to notice the surprise manifested by the native assistants at some of the sayings and deeds of Christ. When they first heard of an incident of Christ's power to heal—such as the healing of the amputated ear of Malchus—they could not believe at first that it was true. They were much impressed by the unselfishness of Jesus' acts, and Suaka often exclaimed, "A va mak êm!" ("How very wonderful!") Having translated Luke, our friends worked at the Acts as the sequence of Luke's narration. Afterwards they translated John as being a useful book for the natives who became Christians. These translations were then revised by them three or four times, sometimes with different men, until they were idiomatically correct, and practically perfect. The language was rich enough to enable them to adhere with great fidelity to the original. They worked always with five versions of the Bible,—Greek Testament, Hindustani, Bengali, and two English versions—and by consulting these they were able to see how far they might deviate from the original when absolutely necessary. In the afternoons they worked at the translations by themselves, and on the following morning corrected it with the aid of the above mentioned assistants. In these three books are numerous Old Testament references which are incomprehensible to one who has never known of the Bible. These required to be fully explained to the native helpers in order to secure the true idiom, so that by the time the translation was completed, Thangphunga, and especially Suaka, had a complete knowledge of Old Testament history. Suaka has since been made a Government clerk, and it is interesting to note that he is the first Lushai who has received such a Government appointment.

In their translation they made a point of not introducing a foreign word, but if possible to render it by any word in Lushai, and where this was quite impossible they substituted the Greek or English word. In the three books only about six such instances occur, such as: "sponge," "myrrh," "hyssop," "cross."

Our friends left Lushailand at the end of four years, Dec. 1897, and having transferred their work to some Welsh Presbyterian missionaries they feel that God is calling them to do similar pioneer work among some other unevangelised tribes on the N.E. frontier of Assam. They hope to leave England in October in order to go to Sadiya, the most north-easterly outpost in India, situated on the Brahmapootra River, and there they will try to win the confidence of a savage tribe called the Abors, who inhabit the adjacent Himalayan mountains, with a view to settling in their country.

The existing missionary societies, having so much work on hand in their own particular fields, seem unable at present to extend their operations, and if these tribes are left without the Gospel—which they seem so ready to accept—it is most probable that as time goes on they will embrace the Hindoo religion, and this golden opportunity will be lost.

Messrs. Lorrain and Savidge are looking to the support of Christian friends who realise this great need, and will be glad to hear from any who will thus co-operate with them in the work of winning these people for Christ. Their previous pioneer work, their knowledge of the modes of thought of these wild peoples, and their gift of acquiring and reducing unwritten languages mark them out as specially adapted for this arduous work. Any further information with regard to this work may be obtained from Mr. Lorrain, 175, Croydon Road, Anerley, London. The results of their four years' labour in Assam are certainly most inspiring:—

The primer was printed by the Assam Government. Their Catechism was printed by the Allahabad Mission Press. Their Lushai Grammar and Dictionary, of 7,000 native words, were printed by the Government at Shillong, in Assam. It is interesting and inspiring also to notice that their translations of Luke, John and Acts make the thousandth language printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

We conclude these articles by giving the copy of a letter written by Major John Shakespear, C.I.E., D.S.O., Superintendent of the Lushai Hills, July, 1899, which bears striking testimony to the value of Missionary pioneer work in its relation to the government of the people.

‘ MY DEAR LORRAIN,

“Many thanks for your long letter and for the pamphlet. I enclose a promise of a subscription.

“I am writing to Mr. Cotton (Chief Commissioner of Assam), regarding you and your proposed work. I hope you will have no trouble. I have in my annual reports on the Lushai Hills recorded my opinion of the valuable work done by you both, which I consider has materially assisted in the pacification of the Lushais.

“The common sense which was so conspicuous in all your dealings with the Lushais, and which made your influence over them so great, will, I am sure, enable you to gain an influence over the Abors and other tribes on the N.E. frontier which will be of great assistance to Government. If a fuller expression of the value of your work in Lushailand will be of any use I shall be most happy to write a note on the subject for publication, or you can show this letter to anyone interested in your work.

“Yours very sincerely,

“ (Signed) JOHN SHAKESPEAR.”

The Rev. W. Wright, D.D., of the British and Foreign Bible Society, (whose recent death we all lament), says with regard to the translational work of these missionaries:—

“You and your colleague have done about as good work on limited means as any who have come before this Society.”

As they go forward to their new conquests for Christ, let us pray that they may be enabled in the future, as in the past, to win many trophies for Christ, while they smooth the way for the work of future missionaries, so that still more streaks of light may herald the dawn of the Gospel-day over those dark mountains of the great chain of the Himalayas.

Fellowship and its Root.

"That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ."—1 JOHN i. 3

THESE words form a part of John's introduction to his first Epistle. This introduction, beginning with the words, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, etc.," reminds us of what may be called the parallel passage, viz., John's introduction to his gospel: "In the beginning was the Word, etc.," and these again call up to memory the opening words of the Book of Genesis, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth, etc." It would seem as if we had here three beginnings. In Genesis we have the beginning of the Cosmos—of our Sidereal system—in which chaos gives place to order, and darkness to light. In the Gospel we have what may be called, so far as this is conceivable by us finite creatures, the absolute beginning. Behind the world and before it, there is the Word. While in the Epistle we see the Eternal Word manifesting Himself through the world, for the purpose of bringing about the union of man's life with God's. This dates a new beginning, "the personal relation between the Word and those to whom He had been revealed." This personal relation between the Word and Man is most fitly expressed by the word "fellowship;" and "fellowship" is the chief, the pivot-word of our text, and therefore forms the topic of our sermon.

We will speak first of Fellowship, "that ye also may have fellowship with us;" then we will speak of its Root, "That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you." The second part of the text must be taken first, and the first part taken second.

I.

Let us try to define and to distinguish our subject. Fellowship may be said to be the communion of spirits—two souls conversing, responding, corresponding, acting and re-acting one on the other, with sympathy as the basis.

Fellowship is deeper, more interior, than companionship. There may be companionship where there is no fellowship. Two persons may be companions, but not fellows. Their bodies may be in continual contact, but their souls and sympathies far apart. Their companionship may be the result of pure accident, as when I travel in a railway train with a person with whom I can have no fellowship. There is nothing in common between us. His interests are not mine; mine are not his. He talks about things which simply bore me—I care nothing for them; and my talk doubtless bores him. We live in different worlds. We are companions on that particular journey, but we simply cannot have fellowship. There is no point at which we can touch. We cannot get into each other. So is it on the journey of life. There may be life-companions, as, for example, husband and wife, travelling together to the grave, but whose souls are as far apart as the poles. I am, of course, limiting the idea of companionship to the outward and popular sense.

The distinction between friendship and fellowship is this, that fellowship lies behind friendship, and makes friendship possible. Not vice versa. I say Mr. So and So is my friend, because he is my fellow. In the dark hour of my need he befriends me, because he understands me. When all others misunderstand me, and, therefore, act unfriendly towards me, he alone acts friendly, because his soul knows my soul. In other words, his friendship is the result of his fellowship.

The fellowship of souls is God's compensation for the loneliness of souls. These are the opposite pictures of the soul's life. Loneliness is the dark side, while fellowship is the bright side. Each soul is separate—alone. There is a wide chasm between soul and soul. The more reflective a man is, the more is he conscious of his isolation, and the sensation is often full of sadness and pain. We live our own life. We go through life largely alone. "Each in his hidden sphere of bliss or woe, our hermit spirits dwell." As men approach intellectually to the height of genius, this consciousness of loneliness gets keener and more painful; the chasm gets wider, the gulf gets deeper. This is the price to be paid for being a genius. But each of us, in his own degree, realises this feeling, and it is often depressing, and sometimes even horrible. Through our own experience in this respect we get a faint insight into the meaning of the words, "He trod the wine-press alone." But what a blessed providence is this, that while each soul is isolated, while each hermit spirit dwells in his own hidden sphere, this isolation can be partially mitigated or modified! Thank God for the blessed possibility of one soul stretching its hands through the darkness of mystery and of sorrow, and grasping, lovingly, sympathetically, another soul. Through fellowship two souls can come near, can touch, can strengthen, can comfort, can inspire each other. These are sister-souls. One soul coming to another through the darkness cannot relieve that other of the burden, of the mystery, of the sorrow. Each soul must stagger under its own weight—stagger until it steadies itself. But St. Paul, who wrote, "Each man must bear his own burden," wrote also, "Bear ye one another's burdens." One soul can so cheer, so fortify another soul as to help it to bear and carry its heavy weight.

There are many forms of fellowship, and the gamut is infinite. We speak of the fellowship of books; but, really, it is fellowship not of, but through books. Our fellowship is with the author of the book, by means of the printed page. With minds low and bestial, or high and noble; with hearts gross and selfish, or pure and disinterested; with the powers of darkness, or with the Father and His Son Jesus Christ—such is the gamut.

II.

The common root of fellowship is identity. "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you" also. There must be a seeing-together, a hearing-together; there must be an identity of vision and of voice. John's desire is that they, to whom he is writing, should share in his fellowship; but he knows this is not possible until they see as he sees, and hear as he hears; and, therefore, to this end he declares to them that which he had seen and heard, that they might have fellowship also. If they are to be brought into the like fellowship with Christ they must see the same vision, they must hear the same voice. Identity of mental vision is the absolute root of all possible fellowship between soul and soul, or soul and God.

Note the rising climax of the first verse. We italicise the words: "That which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life." "Which we have heard." All those blessed and beautiful sayings which came out of His mouth. No evangelist has given us so many of these sayings as John himself, and yet, in the closing words of his gospel, he says that, if all had been recorded, the world could not contain the books that should be written. "Which we have seen." The eternal Word of God, who was with God from the beginning, and was God, seen in the human Person of Jesus of Nazareth. This is the mystery of mysteries. If we can accept this miracle, we shall have no difficulty with any other. John saw Him with his own bodily eyes. Privileged eyes!

"Which we have looked upon." We have here "a more deliberate and closer contemplation; for which John had special opportunities, as one of the inner three, and as he who lay on Jesus' bosom. There is a change of tense implying emphasis on the historic fact, 'which in those days we gazed upon.'"

"And our hands have handled." John is thinking of the early heresy of Cerinthus and the Doketists. Christ, however, was no phantom, as this heresy held. He was flesh of our flesh, though proceeding out of the bosom of the Eternal God.

In each of these clauses there is a rising to a climax, from "which we have heard," to "and our hands have handled of the Word of Life."

This Jesus, whom John had heard, seen, looked upon, handled, he declares, that they to whom the declaration is made might see and hear also, to the end, that having a common vision, etc., they might have a common fellowship.

We repeat that the root-condition of all possible fellowship between souls is that they see and hear in common. The same vision must fill the eye, the same voice must fill the ear. The same vision must be imprinted on the retina of the soul-eye; the same voice must strike on the drum of the soul-ear. If two souls cannot see alike, hear alike, feel alike, think alike, all fellowship is closed between them; and it is just in the measure in which they see, hear, feel, think together that they have fellowship. Hence if we are to bring others into the enjoyment of our Christian fellowship, we must first declare to them that which we have seen and heard of Christ Jesus, as our Redeemer and Mediator.

Fellowship there may be along with the differences of sex, of age, of rank. The grand, the sole condition is, that they see, hear, think together; it may be between a male and a female, it may be between an old man and a young man, it may be between one high-titled and one untitled.

The poet looks upon a piece of landscape. He has a vision. He puts the vision into poetic form. The poem is printed in a book. The book is taken up, and the poem is read by one who cannot see the vision while he reads the words. All possible fellowship is cut off between the reader and the poet.

The philosopher puts his ear to the shell of the universe, and out of the shell there come to him sounds: these he prints in book form. Through the printed page I must hear these sounds also, if I am to have fellowship with the philosopher. If I can see the pictures drawn by the hand of Ruskin in his books, then have I fellowship with him. So of the Prophets of Israel, who said, "Thus saith the Lord;" so of the Master Himself, who said, "He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father."

Fellowship between souls implies a community of nature. I cannot have fellowship with a dog, though a dog may be my companion. Fellowship between man and God implies that man partakes of the Divine nature. Though my life is measured out according to the clock, and God's is not—for He is eternal, I may have communion with Him, because I may partake of His Eternal Life even now through the knowledge of His Son. Though I am sinful and He is holy, we may have fellowship, because, as John says in this chapter from which the text is taken, "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." Though I am finite and God is infinite, there may be fellowship, for Christ has bridged the gulf, and our access is through Him.

This—to bring men into fellowship with the Father and the Son—is the real end of all our preaching. It is not merely to expound the Scriptures, or to explain ethical principles, and to apply them to our individual and collective life—to point out the reciprocal duties of men and women in all possible relationships of our earthly life. All these are of vast importance; but the primary aim of the pulpit, the grand ultimate of all preaching, is to bring individual men and women into vital communion with the Living God, the Holy Father, the Obedient Son. And there is no higher work than this; nor can there be, for it is work in which God Himself is supremely interested, and He co-operates with man in order to its realisation.

God is Love, is Life, is Light, and therefore fellowship with Him implies that we love, have His life, are in His light. John says in the fifth verse of this chapter, "If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth. But if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship," etc. There cannot be fellowship between darkness and light, between death and life, between hatred and love.

This, too, is the real end of the existence of the churches. Churches are not commercial concerns, nor are they social, political, or literary clubs. A church is a spiritual society for bringing men out of the kingdom of darkness and death and selfishness, into the kingdom of light and life and love; and therefore into fellowship with God, who is Light, Life, Love; that in the end He may be glorified, and we may enjoy Him for ever.

Now if we are to realise this, our preaching must be based on Experience. John bases his declaration on his historical experience, "That which we have seen," etc. Christ to him had been audible, visible, tangible; historically real. We, as declarers of the Good News of Salvation, whether before a congregation or a class or a single person, must base our statements on our spiritual experience.

"What we have seen and felt with confidence we tell;
And publish to the sons of men the signs infallible."

Our evidence for the truthfulness of our statements must be rooted in our experience; and no deeper or more satisfactory evidence can there be than the experimental. We who recommend to others, must be able to say, "I have tasted." Christ must be as real to us as He was to John. Behind our utterances there must lie, "I have seen, felt, heard." Preaching must spring out of the personal experience of the preacher if he is to succeed in realising the true end of all preaching—bringing souls into vital fellowship with God; for, as we are trying to show, there can be no fellowship where there is no identity. We must get others to see what we see, and hear what we hear. In relation to things unrevealed, or only partially revealed, to things veiled, or only partly unveiled, to those things which transcend our present experience and God's Revelation, speculation has a place, but is more for the study than the pulpit. In the pulpit speculation must be held severely in subordination to experience. The man in the pulpit must stand and say, "Thus saith the Lord;" "Verily, verily, I say unto you." There must be no "if" or "perhaps" about his utterances. He must see visions and hear voices, and these must form the background of his preaching. He must be positive. As the scientist stands in the scientific realm, and speaks with scientific authority, saying, "This is so and so, and is composed of this and of that;" so the preacher, the Christian, must stand within the veil, behind the seen world, and speak with spiritual authority of spiritual things, because he speaks out of his heart's deepest consciousness and knowledge. Can you say, "I know whom I have believed"? Have you certitude in relation to Christ as your personal Saviour? John saw Jesus in the bodily form; Christ appeared to Saul of Tarsus in His glorified form, and said, "I am Jesus." I have not seen Him as John saw Him; He has not appeared to me as He did to Saul; and yet I have seen Him. I have had a spiritual vision of Him. I have seen Him as my own Redeemer, and I have heard His voice. He has spoken again and again the blessed words, "Go in peace and sin no more." And I am anxious for you to have an identical experience—to see the same blessed vision, and to hear the same blessed voice—that you and I may have a common fellowship with the Highest and the Divinest: "the Father and His Son Jesus Christ." Men Worth Remembering.

VI.—ISAAC SEPTIMUS NULLIS.

BY THE REV. DANZY SHEEN.

PERSONS who did not know Isaac S. Nullis are apt to suspect that they who had this privilege, speak of his character and achievements in terms of exaggerated praise. In 1860, on coming to reside in London, I had the happiness to become intimately acquainted with one of his early friends, Mr. T. Phillips, now of Plymouth, but at that time an officer in the Metropolitan police force. He was also a local preacher in, what in those days was called, "the Second Circuit," which had on its plan: Holborn, Fulham, Hampstead, Hendon, Kentish Town, Highgate, Holloway, Islington, Caledonian Road, King's Cross, Somers Town, Camden Town, Primrose Hill, Harrow Road, and Marylebone. As the good man went to his appointments at these places, one of his chief inspirations was "Isaac Nullis," whose name was constantly on his lips, and of whose doings and sayings he never tired to tell. Among the marvels that he used to narrate of his hero was the following: While he lived at his father's home, Ashampstead, he was one day passing by a new house whose doors, if hung, were not shut. Nullis entered and looked round. He thought it would be a convenient place for prayer. Kneeling down, he was soon in rapt communion with God. The singular petition took shape in his mind, "that God would be pleased to save the next man that, after his departure, should cross that threshold." He presented that prayer until he became satisfied that God had heard him. Not long after he left, the foreman or some representative of the firm that had built the house arrived on the scene to make notes of all that needed to be done to put the house in tenantable condition. While engaged in these duties he was unaccountably led to think of his relationship to God. The result of his reflections was intense anxiety for his soul's peace. In this state of mind he left the house. On meeting a friend in the street he told him his trouble, and asked if he knew anybody who would come and pray with him. "Oh," said his friend, "there's no one in Ashampstead like Isaac Nullis to pray with those seeking salvation." Accordingly, Nullis was sent for. So, here he learnt directly how God had very speedily answered his prayer. He had himself been led to God by means of prayer meetings he'd at the cottage of Mrs. Ann Street (or, as more frequently called, "Nanny Street") of Quick's Green, near Ashampstead. Mr. George Smith, afterwards an esteemed minister in our Church, was at that time pressing the young men of the place to attend the meetings. Isaac Nullis had at that time just returned to his native village, having finished his term of apprenticeship in London. His attendance at those meetings awakened him to a sense of his need of Christ, whom a few weeks later he found, his Sun and Shield. Soon after his conversion to God he gave evidence of unusual power in prayer, and sometimes made appointments to meet his friends at four or five o'clock in the morning for an hour of prayer together, remembering that it is written, "Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven," (Matt. xviii. 19).

His useful life lasted only about nineteen years. He passed into the home of his Saviour in 1868. It fell to my lot to labour in two circuits in which he had preceded me. His name always seemed to awaken feelings of reverence and love among those who had known him. A few years ago I wrote to one of his earliest friends, (indeed the friend who had led him to "Nanny" Street's cottage-prayer-meeting), and to whom I am indebted for the two portraits that illustrate this article. In his reply, dated Jan. 21, 1895, occurs the following passage:

"Their names (Nanny Street and Isaac Nullis) will ever be sacred to me. The many hours with Isaac in sweet retirement in woods, lanes, stables and barns are full of inspiration to me now, and never will be forgotten. One Sunday I accompanied him to dinner. After dinner, before rising from the table, he said, 'I believe Jesus died for me; don't you, George?' 'Yes,' I replied. Then he said to the servant, 'Don't you, Maria?' She replied, 'Yes.' Then he said, 'I believe Jesus saves my soul,' and then, 'Don't you, George?' 'Yes,' I replied. Then to the servant, 'Don't you, Maria?' No reply, but hangs down her head. Nullis then proposed prayer. We all knelt down, and a keen conflict ensued. First he, and then I, prayed. After about two hours, Maria rejoiced in the forgiveness of her sins. While we were praying, a young man standing outside the house heard the praying within, entered, knelt down in prayer, surrendered himself to God, and was saved. It was a meeting never to be forgotten. I think we may say the half was never told of his work and success." Mr. Nullis records in his Journal, that one day a person called on him who had on four distinct occasions attempted suicide—thrice by poisoning, and once by drowning. Finding herself watched by the policeman prevented the latter, and sickness prevented the poison from taking effect. "Oh sir!" she exclaimed, "I am miserable; I cannot believe there is anything in religion, and yet something tells me there is. I shall go mad!" She gnashed her teeth in great distress. He proposed prayer. She knelt, but soon rose up, saying: "I can't believe He will save me." He prevailed on her to kneel again, and while he prayed she was saved. Her joy was so great that she exclaimed, "It is more than I can bear." She afterwards wrote, saying that she continued to enjoy great peace, and had been successful in establishing family prayer at her home. Again, his diary proceeds:—"Preached at Leigh; seven saved, one eighty-three years of age. . . . At Cricklade about forty have been brought to Christ. Some of us had formed a praying league, engaging to pray five times a day for God to pour out His Spirit. . . . He has answered prayer."

In August, 1859, when preaching at Boughton, near Faversham, Kent, a little girl went home from the service weeping. She was about eight years old. When he reached the home, the child came to him exclaiming: "Mr. Nullis, what must I do to be saved? Oh, I am such a sinner!" He and the whole family knelt in prayer, and the child realised salvation. The next morning he said, "Have you been praying, my dear?" "Yes," she said, "and I am so happy." Her mother, who is a Wesleyan class-leader, says, that she never saw a clearer case of conversion in her life. He reflects: "Why should not all Christian parents and teachers seek the same blessed results in their children at this important age?" The following year he preached Sunday School anniversary sermons at Sutton Street, London. Seven obtained pardon, and three sanctification. One poor sinful woman, who had walked the streets four years, bitterly wept, saying: "My sins are as numerous as the sands on the seashore. I've been everything but a thief and a murderer." The glory came and set her free. He writes: "Mrs. S. has taken her to her house. May the Lord reward her!"

Again, "Feb. 5, 1860. Witnessed at Knock (in Ireland), one of the most interesting conversions. A young woman, a Roman Catholic, servant to one of our friends, was deeply affected during the service, and cried out: 'Lord, have mercy upon me!' After explaining the privilege of a present salvation by faith in the Christ, the great High Priest before the throne, she embraced the Saviour, exclaiming: 'I do believe! O praise the Lord this night!' When she began to praise the Lord, it seemed to go through all present, yet, such was her illiteracy, that she could not read the Bible, nor tell her own age. Oh, priestcraft, what a blight thou art! How long shall this continue? I had but just finished writing the foregoing in my journal, when a man came to me in great distress of soul. We knelt down and prayed, but still he was no better. We prayed again, and then the man poured out his soul to God in a very becoming manner. While he was thus praying, deliverance came, and he was made very happy. He had been educated for a Presbyterian minister."

All the good Isaac Nullis did was not immediately visible. He left a blessing behind him. During his stay on Canterbury Circuit, he visited a lonely neighbourhood called Stelling Minis, about half-way between Canterbury and Dover. After he had left the neighbourhood, the seed he had sown sprang up. So he writes in his Journal: "Received a letter from my last station, Canterbury, which states that fruit has begun to appear. At Stelling Minis ten have joined the Church. All the servants on one farm have got converted, principally through the instrumentality of Mr. F.,* a good man and true, who works on the said farm, and has allowed his light to shine before men. This is how Christians should spread the heavenly glory."

The year 1863 finds him, the second time, in Ireland, where among other marvels, he records visiting an elderly lady between seventy and eighty years of age, and leading her to Christ. When saved, she threw her arms around the neck of her husband and wept for joy. Among about thirty seekers of salvation at the close of one evening service was a woman ninety years of age, who had come two and a half Irish miles to the meeting. When asked if she knew herself saved, she exclaimed: "Oh yes, I am sure of it, praise Him! He can save to the uttermost."

In 1864 he was still in Ireland. We have only space for one more instance of his usefulness. "After we closed the services at Clabby, a few meetings were held at Clones with good results. A Miss A——, who has recently opened a boarding-school, came forward to be prayed for, and found peace. Immediately some of her pupils followed her example. I called the next day to see how they were. Miss A—— told me they had seriously thought of calling me up in the night, as the young people were in such distress. 'I prayed with the girls,' she said, 'and they were all either praying for others or crying for mercy on their own behalf. After a time I left them, but had not long retired, when one of them came to my room, saying: "We are all saved but Emily," and when I looked in, they were all hanging upon Emily's neck, saying, "Only believe, only believe; Mr. Nullis said it was, only believe." Thus they continued till two o'clock this morning. They also led one of the pupils to Christ who was not present at the meeting.'"

My acquaintance with Mr. Nullis was made at Sutton Street on a Saturday night in March, 1863. He was holding services in what was then called, "The Third Circuit." I had gone to the neighbourhood for services on the following Sunday, I think at Stratford, and attended the Saturday night Band Meeting at Sutton Street. Among those who testified of the grace of God, in their own hearts and lives, was a man who appeared to be not much above thirty. He was by no means fluent, yet his utterances were peculiarly impressive. His first words were:—"It seems to me, friends, as if God cannot trust us." There was something about the manner in which these words were spoken, (with pauses between them, as if his heart was pained because of what he had to say), that arrested the attention of all. Irresistibly I wished to know who this man was, and in a whisper, interrogated the friend sitting next me, and in a whisper came the answer, "Mr. Nullis." I had no idea he would attend that service. I did not inquire the name of any one else at that meeting. Why did I violate the rule of decorum by making such an inquiry concerning this man? There was a something about his manner that took hold of me. The next day we dined together at a friend's house, and felt our souls peculiarly knit to each other. Before parting, he wished me to accept from him, as a memento, Bushnell's "New Life," in which he wrote on the fly-leaf my name, etc., and on half a sheet of water-marked linear note-paper, the following lines, which are not in inverted commas:—

"THE WORLD FOR CHRIST."

Arouse thee to the combat, O my soul,
A sterner strife awaits thee than e'er past.
Come, buckle to the shield, and take the sword
And in the might of God go meet the foe;
That foe, if conquered, who returns again,
Or if unconquered, binds his enemies,
Pursuing victory to the uttermost.
Oh enter not the field unless prepared
And covered with a coat of mail. The Prince
Of Hell has summoned all his legions up;
The struggle will be fierce, and awful, grand.
The victory is sure. Our Captain comes,

* I have many times made my home at Mr. Ford's house.—D. S.

Up, Sons of God! Up, soldiers of the cross!
 The blood-red banner floats, and streams mid-air.
 Thy watchword:—"Vict'ry, vict'ry through the blood."
 The battle's not for honour or renown,
 But conquest of a rebel world for Christ.
 Then on to battle, soldiers of our God!
 On! on!! to vict'ry go, conquer or die.
 "There's no such word as fail." The foe comes on,
 The battle rages, and the two-edged swords
 Glance through, and double wounds inflict. They fall,
 The men of God rush on, and take the spoil,
 While demons yell and howl:—"The world is lost."
 The fiends rush headlong down like lightnings fierce,
 And leave a train, like fiery comet's tail.
 But all its sparks expire, and sin is gone!
 Hell groans through all its caverns of despair:—
 "The battle's lost—all's lost, and lost for ever."
 But "Glory to God!" resounds through earth and sky;

Angels and men shout loud:—"THY KINGDOM'S COME."
 There lies a world in Loye's triumphant arms.

Your brother in the Lord Jesus,
 March 21, 1863. ISAAC S. NULLIS.

The late Mr. Jesse Herbert, of Reading, had in his possession hundreds of letters from persons in nearly all ranks in life who had derived benefit from his words, or who were expecting help from his counsels. The three-and-sixpenny volume by Mr. Herbert, which has long been out of print, was abridged by Rev. J. Ashworth, and brought out at one shilling by our Book Room, and is, I believe, still on sale. I heartily recommend my friends to invest a shilling and read that brief record of a really wonderful life.

A Visit to Notre Dame.

"HAT! been in Paris three days and not seen Notre Dame?" said the American man at the head of the table, whom we always called "The Professor at the breakfast-table," partly because he struck us as having many traits in common with his countryman, the genial autocrat, and then as the pretty Norwegian, who sat at my left, said in an awed whisper, "I never met such a man, he knows everything."

The girl whom I had gone to visit, a student, who studied and talked art all the day, and dreamed it all the night, explained, "We have had so many studios to visit, and all the great pictures to see." The Professor shook his head. "No excuse. Suppose we go this morning." We rose with alacrity, and in a few minutes were out in the sunshine. No need to bring Murray and Baedeker with two such guides, the one to narrate the history of the district through which we passed, the other to point out beauty and symbolisms which our eyes, not so keenly trained, might have missed.

We took our way across the pretty Luxembourg Gardens, originally laid out for a Queen, but now one of the most popular resorts of the students of the Latin Quartier, across the straight and well-built Boulevard St. Michel which lovers of the intricate by-ways of the old Latin Quartier find so exasperating. We passed the schools of the Beaux Arts and the Sorbonne, went down the Rue St. Jacques, which, though it does not bear any strong marks of antiquity, is one of the oldest streets north of the Alps. Twenty centuries ago the Rue St. Jacques was a main street leading to the great waterway which the founders of Paris, the Parisii, used for their extensive carrying trade. The Rue St. Jacques ends in a bridge connecting the larger of the two islands in the Seine, the Ile de la Cité, with the left bank. On this island, which, centuries ago, formed the nucleus of Paris, stands

NOTRE DAME.

Notre Dame, surrounded by the Hotel de Ville and other public buildings.

A beautiful view is obtained from the bridge of the fine old cathedral, one of the most beautiful in the world. Its massive square towers stand out clear and majestic against the deep blue sky, and the bright sunlight showing up its exquisite and harmonious sculptured details.

The origin of Notre Dame is lost in the mists of antiquity. If legend errs not, a place for worship has stood on the same spot from time immemorial. A Pagan temple, then a Christian Basilica, have successively occupied the site. The Roman conquerors raised a temple to Jupiter here 55 B.C. It is only in the ninth century, in a charter of 867, that the Cathedral of Paris is found under the name of Notre Dame, though a Christian Church dedicated to St. Stephen had occupied the site some centuries before. In the twelfth century the saintly Maurice de Sully, Archbishop of Paris, resolved to build his cathedral on a grander scale. The whole of his life was devoted to this enterprise, and the name of Maurice de Sully cannot be forgotten whilst such a monument testifies to his consecrated intellect. He commenced at the choir, the parts of the old church standing until they had to come down to make room for the new. Thus it was about a hundred years after the work was commenced that the old West front was pulled down to make way for the marvellous new one which has been the wonder and admiration of all the ages since.

In the year that the work was commenced, 1163, Pope Alexander III. was a refugee in France. It is believed, though it is not proved, that he laid the foundation stone; at any rate, he witnessed the commencement of the enterprise and gave his encouragement.

The work proceeded rapidly, and the nave was well advanced when Maurice de Sully died in 1196, leaving a large sum of money for building a lead roof to the choir. The work was carried on by his successor, Eudes de Sully, who, before his death in enterprise which has left to us one of the most remarkable monuments of the middle ages. The rapidity with which the scheme was carried through explains the unity which is so remarkable in the building.

Notre Dame is not a pure Gothic building; it belongs to the transition period, and has many features in common with our own Lincoln Cathedral, which was built about thirty years before the French cathedral.

Listen to what Victor Hugo says about the style: "The Saxon architect was just finishing off the first pillars of the nave, when the pointed arch, arriving from the Crusade, came and seated itself as a conqueror upon the broad Roman capitals which had been designed to support only circular arches. The pointed arch, thenceforward master of the field, constructed the remainder of the building. However, inexperienced and timid at its commencement, we find it widening its compass, and, as it were, restraining itself, as not yet daring to spring up into arrows and lancets, as it afterwards did in so many wonderful cathedrals. It might be said to have been sensible of the neighbourhood of the heavy Roman pillars."

A whole volume would be needed to recount the vicissitudes which befell the cathedral during the centuries which followed its completion. Time left its mark upon it, but time dealt much more leniently with the noble pile than did man. It was despoiled of its wealth and left terribly mutilated by the Revolution.

At last, in 1831, Victor Hugo, by his powerful novel, aroused fresh interest in the minds of the people for their cathedral, and a large sum was voted by the National Assembly for its restoration. The work was entrusted to Viollet le Duc, one of the most prominent architects of his time. His whole soul and talents were put into the work, and after twenty years of devoted study and hard work, in 1864 the cathedral was restored and re-opened with a most solemn consecration service.

It is said that could the walls of Notre Dame speak they would be able to recount the whole of French history.

For seven centuries her arches have rung with the sound of all the joy, all the sorrow, all the victories, and all the afflictions which have stirred Paris.

The large open square facing the cathedral, called the Parvis de Notre Dame, has witnessed many a grand pageant and many a stirring scene, mediæval ceremonies, festivals, coronations, funeral obsequies, royal baptisms and weddings, thanksgiving services and mob outrages. Flags of war taken from the enemy were suspended from her battlements, and during the great church festivals, flowers were showered down upon the passers-by from the galleries, and burning tow, emblematical of the Pentecostal Tongues of Flame,

SOME "GROTESQUES" OF NOTRE DAME.

1208, saw the beautiful doors of the West front in process of construction. Continued by the Archbishop Pierre de Nemours, in 1223, at the end of the reign of Philippe Auguste, the West front rose to the gallery which unites the two towers. Under the king, Saint Louis, the two doors of the transept were built, the Porte-Rouge and the towers furnished. At last, in about 1304, the work commenced by Maurice de Sully was completed; less than 150 years had sufficed to carry out the vast Nothing could be simpler, and, at the same time, more majestic than the West front. Victor Hugo says of it: "There are, assuredly, few finer architectural pages than that front of that cathedral in which, successively and at once, the three receding pointed gateways; the decorated and indented band of the twenty-eight royal niches; the vast central, circular window, flanked by the two lateral ones, like the priest by the deacon and sub-deacon; the lofty and splendid gallery of trifoliated arcades, supporting a heavy platform upon its light and delicate columns; and the two dark and massive towers, with their eaves of slate—harmonious parts of one magnificent whole—rising one above another in five gigantic stories—unfold themselves to the eye, in combination unconfused—with their innumerable details of statuary, sculpture and carving, in powerful alliance with the tranquil grandeur of the whole—a vast symphony in stone, if we may so express it; the colossal work of a man and of a nation, combining unity with complexity, like the Iliads and the Romanceros, to which it is a sister production—the prodigious result of a draught upon the whole resources of an era, in which, upon every stone, is seen displayed in a hundred varieties, the fancy of the workman disciplined by the genius of the artist; a sort of human Creation, in short, mighty and prolific as the Divine Creation, of which it seems to have caught the double character—variety and eternity."

Crossing the wide Parvis de Notre Dame, we had a splendid view of this West front, and on approaching nearer we spent a considerable time in examining the sculptured details of the three western doors. Early French doorways are generally finer and more enriched with sculpture than the early English. These three doors form almost a museum in themselves, every available space and niche seems to be occupied with sculpture; full-sized statues of saints and apostles guard the entrance, while prophets, priests, kings, martyrs and virgins occupy the space between the three doors.

The architects of mediæval times believed in "sermons in stones." The images which they put upon their cathedral walls—beautiful images of saints and grotesque images of devils, recalled to all who passed by the articles of their faith. They engraved upon the stones images representing the highest aspirations, as well as the lowest sentiment of which the human soul is capable. As Longfellow says:—

"The architect

Built his great heart into those sculptured stones,
And with him toiled his children, and their lives
Were builded, with his own, into the walls,
As offerings unto God."

St. Anne, the door on the right, is the most ancient of the three. Above it are carved scenes from the life of the Virgin. Above the door on the left, the Virgin is also represented, but crowned, and an adoring host around her. The middle door, the door of judgment, is the largest and finest of the three. In its deeply recessed doorway those master-builders of the thirteenth century put some of their finest work. In the centre of the arch sits Christ, judging the living and the dead, while above Him, in an attitude of devout contemplation, are two rows of little angels. On the left side of the arch are depicted the dead leaving their tombs, and the living their work—priests, kings, children, rich and poor, young and old, all wait their turn at the judgment seat. At the right of the arch are angels guiding the blessed to their reward, while demons of the most grotesque kind, with fiendish delight depicted on their faces, are dragging the reluctant condemned to perdition. Amongst these latter the sculptor seems to have included a somewhat undue proportion of priests and kings.

One marvels at the wealth of imagination displayed in the sculptured ornamentation of these doors. It is little wonder that in earlier times it was believed that a demon came to the aid of the discouraged artist and offered to finish the doors for the price of his soul. The two lateral ones this demon finished, but the middle one he was unable to finish, because under its arches the sacrament had passed.

Above these three doors the statues of the twenty-eight kings of Judah and Israel stretch like a belt across the front. These statues are of modern workmanship; for the National Convention, at the instigation of the Commune, thinking these twenty-eight statues represented the kings of France, ordered them to be hurled down, and their niches were vacant until the cathedral was restored in 1831. Above these statues runs the gallery of the Virgin, ornamented by statues of stupendous dimensions. Before the great rose-window, through whose richly-coloured glass the light has streamed upon the nave for six hundred years, stands the Virgin between two adoring angels, to the left Adam, and to the right Eve—the Fall and the Redemption.

At last we come to the two towers which detach themselves from the light mass of masonry beneath them, and rise to the height of 218 feet. Their severe lines are relieved by numerous crotchets, which give these massive towers a look of lightness which they would not otherwise have. Between, in marked contrast, the spire of the great flèche, added by Viollet le Duc, seems to pierce the sky.

We lingered so long here that the beggars at the doors at last gave up their whining tones of supplication and cast suspicious glances at us instead, and the Professor seemed pleased that he had proved that not every American crowds the maximum amount of sight-seeing into the minimum amount of time.

As the day was so clear we decided next to mount the towers; so, passing in at the North, we left our umbrellas with a woman sitting at the entrance, and began to mount. The ascent of the towers is full of surprises. We passed many little doors, one of which was partly open, and revealed a glimpse of the roof of one of the smaller chapels, above which the enormous flying buttresses threw their shadow. On we went, every now and again stretching up to get a glimpse of Paris through one of the small port-holes which give all the light there is on the spiral staircase. At last we came to the gallery which runs at the base of the towers. Here one seemed in a new world; as some one said when there, we seemed to be walking in a suspended forest of sculpture.

There are roofs upon roofs. The roof of the great nave and of the thirty-seven chapels are ornamented with every kind of stone ornament, windows of every shape and form, gables ornamented with crotchets and delicately sculptured pillars; while upon the balustrades of the gallery, at every corner and angle, sit or crouch numberless bizarre and grotesque figures of demons and birds, each symbolical of some vice over which the Church, and the Church only, gives the victory. Some, half ghou, half human, are crushing the life out of a smaller creature; some are depicted as taking flight, others are crouched ready to spring upon their victims, while others, like the horned demon with protruding tongue, are gazing cynically over Paris, as though waiting their opportunity to work fresh havoc. An angel with finger upon lips, stands upon the topmost summit of the middle roof, and seems to impose silence upon this motley assembly. One cannot help admiring the practical genius of those early architects. They permitted no useless and meaningless ornament. The gargoyles, or water-spouts, which carry the drainage from the roof, project considerably over the sides so as to throw the water clear of the walls. Instead of leaving bare the unsightly lead spout, they encased it in stone, and the water was then projected through the mouth of some demon or monster.

After leaving this gallery, we mounted the tower to the right, up and up in the dark until I was afraid my heart would be permanently affected. But the prize was worth the striving for. At the summit we obtained a glorious view of Paris. The gay city lay all around us, a perfect forest of houses, around which the Seine coiled like a long silver serpent, spanned with the dark line of her numerous bridges. To the right the heights of Montmartre, with the new cathedral of the Sacred Heart, gleamed white in the sunlight. In the distance showed the heights of Mont Valerien, the only fortress which did not surrender to the Germans; while nearer, the green roof of the Madeline gave a touch of colour, and the gilded dome of the last resting-place of Napoleon flashed in the sun and commanded attention. At our feet were the New Hotel de Ville and Government buildings, while just behind lay the Morgue, the receptacle of the victims of all the ghastly and undiscovered crimes of Paris.

Reluctantly leaving the towers, we walked round the cathedral in order to get an idea of its exterior from the north and south. Passing the Porte Rouge, a perfect specimen of a Gothic doorway, (shown on p. 670), and the Porte Marcel, over which is carved the legend of St. Theophilus, once so popular, we entered the pretty little garden at the south end of the Cathedral, and rested awhile underneath the refreshing shade of its trees. This garden was the site of the Archbishop's Palace, built in 1161 by Sully, and sacked by the mob in 1831, when everything in the palace was burnt or destroyed, or thrown into the river, and the building itself left in such a state of dilapidation that it was necessary to remove all traces of it.

But it was time to end our too rapid visit to the exterior of the old cathedral, so passing over the Bridge Tournelle, we turned to get a last glimpse. From this point the edifice is seen to its greatest advantage. It is not so majestic, perhaps, as the West front, but lighter and more graceful. The first thing that arrests the eye is the enormous flying buttresses which form a perfect scaffolding of stone.

In the early French style they went in for great height, and these buttresses were necessary to carry the vault. The old grey pile looked so pretty nestling amongst the fresh green of the trees in the Palace Garden that our artist was fired with a desire to return the next day and transfer it to canvas, and with this resolve we turned our steps homeward.

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

VI.—CIRCUIT LIBRARIES.

URING the last decade the need for a more highly cultured ministry in our pulpits has been more and more recognised every year. It is not so very long since anything like a college training for our ministers was regarded with suspicion. The Education Act changed all that, and although prejudice still lingers in some quarters, it is fast dying out, and the value of a thorough mental equipment for the work of the ministry is realised to-day as never before. The transition period between the old order and the new was no doubt a somewhat painful one; it was a time of unrest and doubt and fear to many. The Connexion had achieved such marvellous success in its earlier years that fears were entertained lest any departure from the methods of training ministers for their work might have disastrous consequences. A four years' probation, and such intellectual training as the itinerancy afforded had produced such remarkable results that it seemed folly to exchange it for something that might interfere with the spiritual fervour of the ministry. Under these circumstances it was wise to make haste slowly, and wait till the mind of the Connexion had had time to realise the necessities of the changed times. The result has been most satisfactory, and our rising ministry are now receiving a training such as the fathers longed for in vain.

But this movement has not been confined to the travelling preachers. Our ministry is local as well as itinerant. The success of the past has indeed been largely due to the devoted and self-denying labours of our local preachers. In the early days they shared the difficulties of the ministers in the matter of education. They were often placed upon the plan before they had had any opportunity of self-culture, and if some of them proved inefficient, vast numbers became able and powerful preachers of the Word. They learned to preach by preaching. To prepare themselves for their work they had to read, and the libraries gradually gathered together were often remarkably good. In these later days books are much cheaper and more plentiful than they were twenty or thirty years ago, and candidates for the plan, and young local preachers may now obtain, at a comparatively small cost, a library which to their fathers would have seemed a veritable mental gold mine. Still there are many circuits where even yet young men find a difficulty in getting just what they want. Occasionally they discover that their money has not been well spent, and that much valuable time has been lost. Admitting that when a young man is bent on self-improvement, he will manage to procure good books and make all the better use of them for the price paid in self-denial in order to get them, the fact still remains that many suffer serious loss for lack of help in some more systematic way than has hitherto been adopted. Something has been done by local preachers' Associations, and in many quarters young men have been stimulated in their mental culture and guided in their choice of books by this means. But in many of these Associations the need of a local preachers' library has been keenly felt. It has been dimly realised that much might be done to supply this need by co-operation, and here and there a beginning has been made.

In these cases, and in many others where nothing has been hitherto done, the announcement that Mrs. W. P. Hartley had offered £1,000 towards the formation of Circuit libraries would be received with great pleasure. Complete information as to the details of the scheme will be forwarded to the September Quarterly Meetings, and it is to be hoped there will be a good attendance of local preachers in all the stations, and that they will not be slow to avail themselves of Mrs. Hartley's generous offer.

The advantages of such a library are obvious. It will place within reach of local preachers and candidates for the plan, books which will help to equip them for the more efficient preaching of the Gospel. It should serve not only to afford information on subjects directly bearing on the specific work of the local preacher, but to widen generally the mental horizon, and tend to that freshness of conception and treatment of the great themes of the pulpit so necessary in these days. Of course, much will depend on the wisdom of the selection made by those responsible for the books that are to form the library. And this constitutes one of the difficulties. What principle should guide stations in this regard? First and foremost there should be respect paid to the needs of the young man who feels stirring in him the Divine impulse which may be said to be the earliest intimations of a call to this particular form of Christian service. What should he begin with? The question is an anxious one, and often perplexing. It were easy to say in reply, "Try your mental teeth on any good morsel you can get hold of;" but the recommendation is more heroic than helpful. A distinguished man amongst us was wont to test the young men he came across with Butler's "Analogy." He who wrestled through it with some measure of apprehension of its meaning was thought to have the intellectual root of the matter in him; but he who found the food too solid or too concentrated for his mental digestion, was given up as a bad bargain. Such Spartan discipline might serve in many cases, but now and then it would weed out other than the unfit, and discourage some who, with a little judicious leading, might have been enabled afterwards to find in Butler great spoil and lasting gain.

The library then should have a section specially for the tyro and the aspirant, where he would meet what would afford him wise hints for beginning his studies. A course of reading might follow this in theology such as would give the preacher a fair grounding in that most important of the sciences. Books of a more general kind bearing on the work of the local preacher would be included, and the standard works which should be read by us all would not be forgotten. This raises the question whether it would not be well for the Book Room to attempt an ideal list of books in some classified form of this kind. A general catalogue of books deemed suitable for Circuit libraries will be issued, but in addition to that an ideal list of the best books for a given sum might be provided, something in the nature of the "best hundred books" of which we have heard so much. Not that there should be a hundred, but such a list as would form a basis of the kind here indicated. Circuits with sufficient cash at their disposal might add what books they chose from the general catalogue or elsewhere, and increase their stock according to the individual preferences of the members from time to time.

The value of Mrs. Hartley's offer lies largely in this, that it will enable many to make a beginning who otherwise would be deterred by lack of funds. Once a library is founded it may be expected to grow of itself almost. The appetite will grow by what it feeds on, and the value of the institution will become so manifest that means will be devised from time to time for the purpose of adding to its usefulness. There are to be found all over the Connexion well-to-do persons who would gladly add a book to an existing library now and then, but who in its absence do nothing at all. The library will become a centre of the intellectual life of the Station, and would help to direct the reading of our young men into wise channels, who otherwise will fall into those desultory habits which bring so little real mental advantage.

Of course there are many local preachers who have no taste for reading, and to whom a library will be of no use whatever. You may lead a horse to the pond, but you cannot make him drink. But in every Circuit there are to be found those who are anxious to get hold of good books, and only need the opportunity to make a good use of them. To them the proposed library will be invaluable. It is not merely, however, that the library will place books within the reach of some who otherwise could not obtain them; it will serve to stimulate and guide a much larger number who though able to buy books are in danger of spending their money to comparatively little advantage. The Circuit library should be a model for every young man's own library. He will not only read its books, but wish to possess them for himself, that they may be available for reference at any time in his own home.

This article may close with an extract from the Conference Minutes—"The Conference warmly thanked Mrs. W. P. Hartley for her extremely thoughtful and liberal offer of £1,000 for the establishment of Circuit Libraries. The proposal is broadly to give one half of the cost of such libraries up to £10 each, net price, but special cases will have special consideration, and even larger grants will be made where urgently needed. The fund will be administered through a Committee of which Rev. John Atkinson is Secretary; the books will be supplied by the General Book Steward, and a Circular explaining the proposal will be sent, with catalogue, to the September Quarterly Meetings."

JOSEPH RITSON.

[It should be stated that, owing to the lamented death of the Rev. J. Atkinson, the Rev. J. D. Thompson, 13, Orrell Lane, Aintree, Liverpool, has been appointed Secretary of the Circuit Libraries' Fund. We shall be glad if those who feel themselves competent to the task will send us an "ideal list" of books, not exceeding one hundred in number, suitable for a Circuit Library with Publishers' names and prices attached. The list adjudged the best shall be inserted in the Local Preachers' Department of the Christian Messenger. EDITOR.]

An Interview with the Rev. W. Hunt.

BY S. HORTON.

THE Conference at Grimsby was favoured with the presence of two visitors from Australia, the Rev. Dr. Fitchett and the Rev. W. Hunt—the former for a short visit; the latter during the greater part of the Sessions. Mr. Fitchett is best known to us as the author of that brilliant book, “Deeds that Won the Empire,” and as the Editor of the Australian “Review of Reviews.” His brief address to the Conference showed him to be a man of large outlook, varied interests and considerable oratorical power—all alive to his very finger-tips. He received a hearty welcome, and must have been pleased with his reception.

Mr. Hunt came not in the pleasant and irresponsible capacity of a visitor, but as the representative of our brethren in Australia, to arrange terms and conditions in view of Methodist Union, so soon to be consummated in the Australian churches. He is a wiry, somewhat spare man, smooth-shaven, with an open countenance which impresses one at first sight with its honesty rather than strength, and he looks remarkably hale and hearty after a ministry of over thirty years. Before the Conference ended he had abundantly proved that he possesses reserves of mental power, of tact, and of acumen which, perhaps, he did not at first get credit for. He never obtruded himself, did not commit the common blunder of talking too much, put his thoughts into as few words as possible, and made an ideal plenipotentiary. When he made concessions he made them with a good grace, and yet with sufficient apparent reluctance as to impress the Conference that he was yielding as much as he ought, and knew when, and where, to draw the line. Altogether, the Australian brethren may be complimented on their choice of a representative.

It was my privilege to have a few hours with Mr. Hunt as he passed through Hull to London. The size and beauty of our Hull chapels seemed to delight and surprise him, for I found that though he—like many others—is soon to lose his identity as a Primitive Methodist minister in the larger Methodist Church, he is intensely devoted to the Connexion whose interests he has served so long and so well. It says much for Mr. Hunt and his fellow ministers that they have been able to make sacrifices of strong personal attachment and sentiment, in the interests of the kingdom of Jesus Christ; and while loving their own denomination much, have loved the greater Church of their Master more.

My first question was as to the general impression left on his mind by the Conference.

“I am,” he said, “very much delighted with all I have seen and heard. From the President downward, I have received nothing but the greatest kindness and consideration. What strikes me most, perhaps, about the personnel of the Conference, is the great advancement in the social condition of our people. Great strides have been taken since I left the country. The laymen impressed me as men of culture and business aptitudes, and their contributions to the debates were very helpful. The increased culture of the ministers goes without saying, and I think the future of the Connexion in the hands of such men must be very successful. We are no longer a poor people, that is evident; proving that ‘Godliness is profitable for the life that now is, as well as that which is to come.’ Though the truly Christian man will not serve Christ for the sake of gain, yet gain seems none the less sure to come.”

“Did the religious services in connection with the Conference come up to your expectations?”

“Certainly. The specially pleasing feature to me was the heartiness and fervour displayed. Then the way some of the hymns were sung will remain a life-long impression with me. It was very inspiring. The sermons I heard were characterised by a good deal of force, clearness of thought, and had evidently been carefully prepared. There is no decline in pulpit efficiency. One thing, however, I noticed with regret, and that was the growing tendency to read in the pulpit, especially amongst the younger men. Some even read their speeches, nearly word for word; I think this is a great mistake, for it means loss of power. I hope that you will take note of that, and urge the young men to talk straight to the people without fettering themselves with their manuscripts. I believe in preparing carefully, but not in reading. Better make a few mistakes than lack 'abandon.' Our fathers knew the power there is in looking right into the eyes of their congregations."

I then questioned Mr. Hunt as to his general impressions of English life after his long absence.

"I notice," he said, "a vast improvement all along the line. The lot of the agricultural labourer, for example, is a great advance on what it was when I left the old country. Then the social conditions of the towns are altogether different from what they were. I remember walking down Whitechapel and Mile End Road years ago, and I have a very vivid recollection of the scenes I witnessed then, very much worse than anything that can be seen now. The religious and philanthropic agencies at work seem to be innumerable. I am glad also to find that Primitive Methodism is taking some part in social work in London."

In this tone of cheery optimism Mr. Hunt chatted on, evidencing not only that he was a shrewd and careful observer, but also that he possesses the happy knack of seeing the bright side of things, and that his long residence at the Antipodes has not abated his interest in the welfare of the people at home. I found also that Mr. Hunt had a robust faith in the future of Australia, and is a strong advocate of Federation. In some respects, indeed, as, for example, the treatment of criminals, the administering of the Poor Laws, and freedom of religion from the fetters of the State, Australia is forging ahead of the mother country. The financial crisis, the mad frenzy for gold, the wild speculations, and the inevitable disaster that followed, have all taught her useful, if dearly bought, lessons, and now, with the exuberance of youthful vitality, she is rising again cleansed and purified by the bitter experiences of the past few years.

I then requested Mr. Hunt to give me a brief history of the proposed Union of the Methodist Churches, and its probable effect upon the future religious life of Australia. I discovered that his own attitude had been for a long time one of watchful reticence—that he had kept an open mind until the stern logic of facts had turned him into a convert to the movement.

"It is over twenty years ago," he said, "since a paper advocating union was read by a Wesleyan layman at a meeting at Ballarat. So that it has been of slow growth, and the various churches affected have had time to look all round the question. I am convinced that we have everything to gain by union. Of course, the conditions are very different from what exist in England. Our people remove from one colony to another; they leave the towns and go and settle in the country hundreds of miles away from the nearest Primitive Methodist Church, and with our limited resources it is impossible for us to provide for their religious wants. But when all the sections of the Methodist Church are united it will be much easier for us to deal with such cases. There are other practical difficulties which only those who have worked in the colonies can understand, which union will help to solve."

"Did you not find many difficulties in the way of union; such as the proportion of lay representation in District Meetings and Conferences?" I inquired.

"Yes, at first the difficulties seemed very great, but once they were fairly faced they began to disappear. When the desire to find as many points of resemblance as possible began to be general, it was wonderful how little that was really vital, or even of importance, was left. It is easy to make a mountain out of a mole-hill when we wish to magnify difficulties. But when we were prepared to adopt a 'give-and-take policy,' and to sacrifice our sentiment for the sake of the common cause, it was found that there was very little to keep us apart, and very much to draw us together. There was no difference in doctrine, very little in Church government, none in our aims and objects. We believe that one Church working together for the common good will accomplish more than three or four sections working apart; and at the same time an object-lesson will be given to the world, that Christian men can forget their own interests for the sake of the kingdom of Jesus Christ. Our Saviour prayed 'that His followers might be all one, that the world might know that the Father had sent Him,' and we are trying to fulfil the desire of His prayer. When the world asked, 'What keeps you apart?' there was really no good and satisfactory answer to be given. Union will save expense in Church organisation; it will prevent overlapping, and it will place both men and money at the disposal of the Missionary Department for distinctly aggressive work. It may also help to hasten on the union of the Methodist Churches at home."

"There are, of course, some," he continued, "who believe that union is a mistake, and who would much rather have continued as we were. Sentiment, as you know, plays a large part in the making of all movements, and sneer at it as we may, has to be reckoned with. It was objected that because we shall all for the present take the name of the Wesleyan Church, that we ceased to be Primitive Methodists. As a matter of fact, we shall be as much Primitive Methodists as they will be Wesleyans, for they have made as many concessions as we. The name under which the united Church will finally work has yet to be decided. In the meantime some name was necessary, and what more suitable one could be adopted than that of the mother Church?"

I then asked Mr. Hunt whether he was satisfied with the conditions obtained from the Conference in relation to the various matters he had come specially to arrange?

"Yes, on the whole," he said. "I think the Conference has dealt fairly with us, and though I hoped it might be possible to get greater concessions in one or two instances, yet, on the whole, I have no reason to be dissatisfied with the results taken altogether. There was evidently a deep desire to deal justly with us, and no attempt was made on either side to get the advantage. There were many intricate and delicate points to be dealt with, and throughout it all there was manifested great business ability and good temper by the members of the Committee. I shall return to Australia with a very high opinion of the brethren in England."

A hurried visit was paid by Mr. Hunt to the tomb of William Clowes, and then to the graves of the Revs. Charles Kendall, William Garner, George Lamb and Parkinson Milson in the Hull Cemetery, and to some of the largest and most notable of the chapels in the city, and then I bade him "God speed" in the new experiences which lie before him as a minister of the United Methodist Church of Australia.

Mr. Hunt has rendered yeoman service in Australia, and now goes back to take up the duties of Book Steward, and I feel sure that many in England will follow his future career with not only interest, but some degree of pride. He gave evidence while in this country, not only of great business ability, but of pulpit power, and of considerable readiness and skill in debate. He will carry back with him the good wishes of all the English Conference.

A Holiday Tour in Norway.

BY REV. GEO. ARMITAGE.

AT 5.30 we had taken breakfast and were in the boats ready to be towed ashore to the quay at Bergen. We had arrived at this "New York of Norway" during the night. The party was soon comfortably settled in the little Pullman cars of the Voss Railway, and found itself speeding past lakes and mountains, in and out of tunnels, and for the distance of fifty miles winding along the very edge of the beautiful Sogne Fjord. Fleischer's commodious hotel at Vossenvangen was reached at ten o'clock, and ample justice was done to a splendid Norse lunch, consisting of fish fresh from the river, reindeer, cheese, etc. No time had to be lost in securing a stolkejarre, and the long procession of vehicles was soon en route for the thirty miles drive to the famous Naerodel. The route lay at first through sylvan plains, by the side of rushing rivers and tranquil lakes. Then the road became steep, and the scenery more and more rugged, until we were in full view of snowfields extending for many miles. At one point no less than seventeen large waterfalls could be seen at once! The English of our pleasant driver was restricted to the one word, "Yes," consequently no conversation was possible. At last, for all were thirsty and dusty, the picturesque Stalheim Hotel was discovered perched on the heights ahead. After a late dinner we were in readiness to enjoy the magnificent prospect which lay before us. The hotel is built upon a large platform some fifteen hundred feet above the sea level, and six hundred feet immediately above the valley. It commanded a view of the far-famed Naerodel valley, said to be the finest in Europe, and along which the party was about to travel. On the left stood the thimble-shaped Jordalsnut, gleaming in its felspar-purity in the afternoon sun. The narrow valley, or gorge, lay between precipitous mountains three and four thousand feet high, and seemed to have been rent asunder by some mighty convulsion of nature. The head of the valley is reached from the hotel by a steep zig-zag road with sixteen loops, a veritable engineering triumph. Then came the excitement of a break-neck trot down the switchback road for seven miles, toward the fjord at Gudvangen, where the Ceylon awaited us. All along one side of this wonderful valley the waters leaped and tumbled down from the melting snow on the mountains, and in the evening sun, the immense cliffs were ribboned with gorgeous rainbows. The day had been brilliant and hot, and the falls and mountain peaks had consequently been seen at their best. At Gudvangen lay a village at the edge of the fjord, closely shut in between gloomy mountains of four thousand feet high. For twenty-two weeks in the year there is no sunshine in that end of the valley. In the spring the rapidly melting snow, and the avalanches cause great destruction in the village, and oftentimes refuge has to be temporarily sought by the inhabitants in a huge cave which exists in the side of the mountain.

We glanced anxiously at our Norse Pilot when the head of the vessel was turned full on the mountain side. It looked as if disaster was inevitable, but cautiously and skilfully the head of the good ship was brought round, and we glided through narrow channels, so close at times to the cliffs that a biscuit might be thrown ashore, and finally we sailed into wider waters, heading for the open sea.

The next morning brought changed atmospheric conditions, the air was raw, and a heavy mist hung over the sea, effectually blotting out the scenery. From going at quarter speed, the vessel came to anchor for several hours until the fog lifted. Our course lay still north for Aalesund and Molde, and at eight o'clock the party was landed at the former place for a stroll through the busy fishing town. It left a distinct memory with us, for the whole place was redolent with the smell of cod-liver oil! On Saturday morning the vessel lay opposite to the prettily sheltered town of Molde. Here there are good shops, well laid out streets, and large hotels. Molde is one of the fashionable Norse holiday resorts, and rejoices in the titles of "Molde the fair," and "the garden of Norway." Vegetation is most luxuriant here, and the air soft and balmy. From the Observatory in the Park a panoramic view of the surrounding mountains and fjords can be obtained. Adjoining is a large wooden church, rich in the possession of a famous picture as an altar piece. It is by the Norwegian artist Exel Ender, and represents the first Easter Morn.

Molde was the most northerly point reached by this cruise. At Ness another relay of stolkejarres was waiting to convey our party along the valley of the Romsdal to Horgheim. Again there was the now familiar "mountain and flood," and as the mist gradually melted before the afternoon sun, the majestic Romsdalshorn, at a height of five thousand feet, wreathed about the peak with a scarf of mist, stood out beautiful and clear against the blue.

The second Sabbath brought its blessings of public worship. A Bible Christian minister officiated at the morning service, and in the evening a bright and helpful sacred song service was held, the vessel meanwhile cruising in the Joring and Norang fjords. On Monday we were sailing down the queen of fjords, the Geiranger, to Merok. The opportunity was there afforded of a mountain walk along a winding and well-built road. At the elevation of a thousand feet, the snow lay close at hand, clean and cooling, and a charming view was obtained of the landlocked fjord, with the mountain torrent pouring into it, and our yacht lying like a toy steamer close to the shore. The refreshments for our party of three at the little hostel on the mountain amounted to the modest sum of twenty-five ore, or about threepence halfpenny in English money. Dr. Horton tells how that a certain German tourist boarded at one of these little hotels for some time. When the very moderate bill of charges was presented, he declared to the honest landlord that he had had the tooth-ache and could only eat on one side of his mouth! "And what did you do?" said the doctor to the inn-keeper. "Ah, well, poor man, he was in such pain I took off one half!" This was, of course, away from the beaten track of the tourist. Nearer the towns "mine host" could not be quite so easily imposed upon.

One of the most delightful sails of the whole cruise was in the Geiranger Fjord, one afternoon. The heat on the deck was tropical, whilst right and left the mountain peaks were gleaming with snow. The Pulpit rock and the Seven Sisters falls, where seven distinct waterfalls pour over the sheer cliffs, side by side, were passed. The little farms, two thousand feet high in some cases, could be seen. The solitary dwellers waved blankets to us as the steamer passed. The children when at play are tied to stakes to prevent them falling over the cliffs. If a death occurs in the winter, it is sometimes six months before the corpse can be brought down into the valley for burial.

"We have had God's own weather on this cruise," said the sailors, "and it is wonderful considering that we have so many 'sky pilots' on board." "Sky pilots! Who are they?" asked a lady. "Why, parsons, of course," was the reply. That was certainly a great compliment to the representatives of the Cloth on board.

On Tuesday, i.e., ten days after leaving Harwich, we again arrived at Bergen, and received our first batch of letters. The young lady who claimed fourteen, did not escape certain pointed comments! In this "weeping city," as it is called because they have so much rain, we found brilliant sunshine and clouds of dust. We drove through the city and past the park, and past prosperous merchants' houses into the pleasant open country. The object was to see the old Fantoft Church: a building dating from the twelfth century. It had been rescued from destruction by the American Consul, and brought from one of the fjords and set up again in his own grounds at Bergen. It is in the form of a Pagoda, covered with fantastic carvings. By the very dim light inside, rude paintings can be discerned on the wooden walls. The grating near the altar, through which the lepers were permitted to hear the service and to receive the Sacrament is still intact. As we drove back to the city we passed the large Leper Hospital, where the sufferers from this dreadful disease could be seen lying about the grounds with bound-up limbs.

Bergen, with its large shops, its tourists offices, its wide streets, its fish market and its splendid harbour, has all the evidences of a prosperous and miniature Liverpool.

It was an animated scene at eleven o'clock when the vessel's anchor was lifted and we steamed out of the bay to the strains of music and the illumination of fireworks. Wednesday and Thursday found us with a fresh breeze and a flowing sea, steering for the Isle of the Sea. Deck billiards, quoits, "cock fighting," concerts and reading, did not allow these days to hang heavily on our hands. It was a pretty sight as we passed over the Dogger Bank amongst the North Sea fishing fleet. When we rose on Friday morning the Ceylon was lying alongside the quay at Harwich. Our first news was the loss of Messrs. Donald Currie and Co's mail boat off the French coast, and we were constrained to lift up our hearts to our Heavenly Father for His watchful care over us during this pleasant and invigorating journey of three thousand miles. There were the good-byes to be said, and the luggage to be passed under the lynx eye of the Custom House officer. Soon we were under our own roof, saying, "East, West, home's best."

AUGUST 6, 1899.

CHILL sense of loss through all our borders creeps,
 He whom we loved and trusted falls to-day;
 The clear, sane mind, will of imperious sway,
 The feelings strong, oft hid in unseen deeps,
 The generous, manly heart—death comes and reaps,
 This harvest rich untimely shears away,
 Nor all our poverty will say him nay,
 Though friends bemoan and drooping Zion weeps.
 We sorrow, yet repine not, how dare we,
 That had from God this noble gift so long,
 This helper strong, this counsellor wise, repine?
 God giveth and God taketh, bless'd be He;
 So 'mid our tears we sing a thankful song,
 "In life or death, O Lord, let praise be Thine."

From a Woman's Point of View.

HE was a silent member. Though the class meeting was one of the green spots in her life, Sister French had never been known to give an "experience." Her fellow-members bore with her patiently. Once a junior ventured a mild sarcasm to the effect that prating husbands made silent wives, but on the whole her reserve was respected. She had many a long argument with her conscience in the small hours of the morning, which so often were her only times of leisure and thought. But if at heart there was a vague longing to break the ice of reserve, there was also a vague fear lest in the aberration of nervousness she should say something that she would afterwards regret.

She had no secrets. Her life was perfectly open and above-board, and, of course, her husband was everything that could be desired. Ah yes, he was a good man—here Sister French would sigh softly to herself—he lived on a loftier plane than the one she occupied; indeed, sometimes she wondered whether the fact of having the eyes constantly fixed on celestial bodies had a tendency to diminish the importance of terrestrial ones. Not that Hezekiah French was a careless husband, far from it, but there were times when his soul was so uplifted on the wings of zeal and charity, that he forgot such mundane matters as Johnnie's boots and the last month's coal-bill.

In such a spirit as this, he brought the trustees home one Saturday evening, to discuss certain details relative to the ventilation of the chapel. Having a point to carry, he wisely considered that the comfortless surroundings of the vestry might have an undesirable effect on the spirits of his colleagues, whereas a cosy fireside and a cup of coffee would enlarge the understanding and cheer the heart. Consequently, smiling and benignant, he ushered them into the little sitting-room, where, with a tired face his wife was arranging the six sets of little garments to be worn on the following day.

Sunday was by no means a day of repose to the overworked mother; still it bore the appearance of rest, and with a sigh of relief she raised her head as the door opened, unprepared for the sober procession that crossed the threshold. Feeling guilty of a deception, she gave her guests a cordial welcome, and the next half-hour was spent in brewing coffee and cutting sandwiches.

As the Sunday's dinner of cold beef disappeared down official throats, the query whether it was meet to take the children's beef and give it to trustees rose unbidden in her mind. But with the numerous other questions that thronged her life, she left it unanswered, and retiring to the kitchen, nursed the baby, which for some unknown reason had suddenly become fractious.

The meeting was long and protracted. Hezekiah French was convinced that the chapel required not only new ventilation but a new heating apparatus also, whereas Oliver Barcham failed to reconcile the two extremes of "eat an' cowl," whilst Peter Bradgate was of opinion that "wi' six windows an' two doors there were no call for ventilators at all." That the windows were hermetically sealed, was an argument of no importance. And thus, there being a diversity of opinion, the meeting was prolonged to a late hour.

The next morning Sister French arose betimes, and after the usual scrimmage of preparation, marshalled her small troop to the Sunday School. Then, as there was a calm in the domestic atmosphere, she sat down to take a breath before attacking the preparations for the mid-day meal. And straightway a voice began to whisper into her ear, "You never steeped the clothes last evening, in readiness for the Monday's washing. Now is the time to do it, while your husband and the children are out of the way. You devoted your spare time to the trustees; surely there can be no harm in your taking a little of the Lord's time. Remember baby's pinafores and Dickie's blouses require a little preliminary soaping, and you are still without a servant, and there isn't a washerwoman to be had in the village for love or money. Ah yes; I agree with you, there is a great deal of discussion about Sabbath desecration at present, but that applies to Sunday newspapers, the liquor traffic, and social evils of that type. No, of course, you won't find any pleasure in working on the Sabbath. Heaven knows that you have more than your share during the week, but think what a help for the morrow an hour's work to-day will be."

And as though convinced by the logic of the tempting voice, Sister French crept guiltily to the clothes-closet and gazed in upon the formidable piles of childish garments that awaited the weekly "wash."

For a moment she hesitated.

The temptation to relieve the over-pressure of the six days by a little labour on the seventh can only be understood by the over-burdened mother.

At last she turned away muttering, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" The clothes should wait until Monday. All through the years that had gone God had given her strength for each week's duties. Surely she could trust Him with another washing-day! And with a sigh she went into the kitchen to make the best of the fragments that the trustees had left.

"I feel almost too jaded to begin the day's work," murmurs Sister French to herself, as she arranged the wash-tubs next morning. "I suppose I shall manage somehow, but really, I feel unequal to face it alone," and fastening the baby in a rocking-chair at arm's length, she proceeded to "sort" the garments.

"Good morning, Mrs. French," cried a girlish voice. "I've come to see if I can help you with the washing."

"You help me with the washing!" re-echoed Sister French, in her astonishment omitting to return the salutation. "My dear Miss Barton, I couldn't think of allowing you to do such a thing. Your dainty hands are more accustomed to a piano than a wringing machine."

"That is no reason why they never should become accustomed to one."

"But, my dear, people will say that Miss Barton of Holly House has ——" Sister French hesitated.

"EDITH BARTON PLUNGED HER HANDS INTO A TUB OF SOAPY WATER."

"Turned laundress. Oh, Mrs. French, if you knew how I long to be useful you wouldn't refuse my request," and the tears gathered in the clear, blue eyes. "For weeks I have been praying that God would save me from a useless life, and when I looked at your tired face in class yesterday, I felt that He was answering my prayer. Don't crush my hopes!" Then laughing gaily, "Do you think I care what people say? They may think I have turned chimney sweep if they like. There is honour, not disgrace, in honest labour. You must let me help you." And tucking up the sleeves above the pretty, dimpled elbows, Edith Barton plunged her hands into a tub of soapy water.

Then with tremulous lips, Sister French confessed the temptation of the previous day.

When she had finished, Edith Barton looked up, and with smiling lips and swimming eyes, said, "I believe we've been having a class meeting, Sister French. Now that we have given our experiences, shall we go on with the washing?"

And Sister French agreed.

Browsings in My Library.

VII.

THE day had been one of scorching heat, and I was enjoying the cool of the evening, with the window of the bookroom open, through which came a pleasant breeze from the garden. At the bottom of the garden were some six-foot-high hollyhocks, with their showy blooms, and three dignified sunflowers seemed to be pensively gazing at me. The children, bronzed by the sun and salt air, for they had only been back three days from the sea, were running about in a merry game, and often distracted my attention from the book whose pages I was turning over. There came a ring of the bell from the front door, and on its being opened I heard the jovial voice of my friend the Political Parson asking, "Is Librarian in?"

"Yes," said Delia, "you'll find him in the usual place."

"That's the library, of course," said the Political Parson, and I heard him mounting the stairs.

"I called a fortnight ago," said the Political Parson, "but found you all out. I am getting up a lecture on Alfred the Great, whose millenary is to be celebrated in 1901, and I want you to help me, as you did about Cromwell. Alfred, I believe, was a fine old fellow, in spite of the fact that our poet laureate has given him the silly nickname of 'England's Darling,' but perhaps that is because the laureate is also an Alfred—Alfred the Little."

"Now, don't be malicious, or I won't help you."

"What's that you are reading now?" asked the Political Parson.

"Why, it's the Fernley Lecture by Rev. Thomas F. Lockyer, B.A., on 'The Evangelical Succession,' and a very good lecture it is too."

"Have you read," he asked, "our own Hartley Lecture, on 'Inspiration and Revelation,' by Rev. Robert Bryant?"

"Of course I have."

"And what do you think about it?"

"Well, what do you think?"

"I'm a bit puzzled. You know I'm no critic. The denomination puts me into circuits where they don't give a fellow a chance to read much, and it is out of the question to keep oneself abreast of all these critical problems that are pressing on us. Some of Bryant's views are a bit startling to an old-fashioned chap like me, but he seems cautious enough, and evidently only wants to get at the truth, and puts his reasons and his conclusions in a straightforward fashion. I have read the book with keen interest, and it has set me thinking. I believe I shall get to more settled views on a question that, I confess, has worried me. You know, the young fellows have got hold of these difficulties, and it's precious awkward when they come to you and level the questions at you in a 'stand and deliver' sort of way, if you have no clear views of your own, and no helpful suggestions to give them."

"It seems to me, old fellow, that you have given a most excellent reason for the foundation of such Lectures in each denomination. It stands to reason that a parson with his hands full of work cannot make for himself the prolonged studies requisite to thresh out these questions for himself, and if the picked brains of his denomination can be induced to work the questions out on his behalf, and give him the results in an intelligible and digestible form, a great end is served. This, it appears to me, is what is done in these two 'Lectures.' They are both equally interesting to me, and I think they would be equally helpful to every minister and lay preacher of our denomination, for they both approach the questions of 'Inspiration' and 'Apostolical Succession' from the Methodist standpoint, and the questions are solved by the good old Methodist test of the appeal to experience. I have been reading lately lives of Lord Bacon and John Locke, the fathers of English philosophy. They reformed English philosophy by recalling it from the futile subtleties of Scholasticism to the study and the comparison of facts and realities. It seems to me that we Methodists have taken a foremost part in doing the same thing for theology. We disperse all the specious pretences of a sham Catholicism, Roman or Anglican, by pointing to the practical result of saved souls by agencies which we are told are heretical and schismatic, because they are not recognised at Rome or Canterbury; and we repel all attacks on the Bible as the inspired Word of God by the appeal to our own knowledge of the change it has wrought in us, and the change it effects in whole communities, and whole races, where it once gets freely read."

"Hear, hear! You are waxing quite eloquent. I can only say, 'Them's my sentiments,' though I don't know much about Bacon and Locke. But these 'Hartley Lectures' are a fine institution, and they will do us all a lot of good."

"I am glad to see that such 'Lectures' are becoming more and more popular. There are no volumes on these shelves that I prize more than the Gifford Lectures of such men as the late lamented Professor A. B. Bruce and Professor Orr, and the Bampton Lectures of such men as the late Dr. Hatch and Canon Gore. The greatest weakness of our time is that, with the cheapness of papers and magazines, and the books of mere entertainment with which we are flooded, the taste for serious reading is being ruined, and with it the willingness to subject the mind to the slightest tax in the consideration of any problem. I believe this is especially so in the sphere of religion. If people read and thought about such matters, the Ritualists would be laughed out of court when they put forward their silly apologies for argument in support of their preposterous claims to a monopoly of grace for the Episcopal Church, or in support of the use of incense, candles in broad daylight, and raiment such as might have dazzled Solomon in all his glory. The priests know that what the mass of the people read, and read alone, is the halfpenny morning paper and the threepenny monthly magazine, full of sensational stories and highly-spiced useless information. Such feeding makes weak brains, and that is the Ritualist's opportunity. But when men like Bryant or Lockyer stand up against the foes of the simple Gospel, or the inspired Book, their well-tempered lances pierce the shields of Ritualist and sceptic, who are cousins in reality, as if they were the paste-board shields of a Chinese army, while the swords of the Ritualist and sceptic turn out to be nothing but painted laths."

"Talking about Bryant, he is to be our General Book Steward, isn't he?"

"Yes; and he ought to do well. But while designated for a business department, his hobby is Philosophy and Theology, and this 'Lecture' gives promise of good work for the denomination in the same line."

"I like what he says about the Divine and the human elements in the Bible. He shows that God, in inspiring prophets, poets and historians, did what we might have expected Him to do—gave them just what inspiration was necessary for the purpose in hand, availed Himself of their human faculties and individualities, but did not, as it were, waste inspiration by pouring it out in an unnecessary superfluity. If you will lend me the book for a minute or two, I will read you one or two passages that struck me forcibly, and which I don't mean to forget. They seem to me to go direct to the root of the matter."

I indicated the book on the shelf, and taking it down, the Political Parson said, "Ah, here is a good bit at page 83," and he read:

"While Inspiration was not the constant possession, nor the ceaseless experience of the sacred writers, neither was it the same in kind and degree in all of them; nor did it place all on the same level as to knowledge and understanding of the truth; nor did it impart to their utterances and writings a uniform significance and authority. Inspiration was imparted to holy men of old according to their needs and requirements, and with a view of the work they had to do. The prophets as announcers of God's will and purpose, as statesmen, social reformers, preachers of righteousness, counsellors of kings and people, and foretellers of coming events, and as writers of history and prophecy, had an inspiration imparted to them sufficient for the task assigned them. So with the Apostles, there was a diversity of gift imparted to them, suited to the diverse and varied tasks they had to perform. It is this fact that led apologists and theologians to speak of 'degrees of inspiration,'—the 'inspiration of incitement,' 'enlightenment,' 'invigoration,' and 'elevation,' the inspiration of 'superintendence,' and 'guidance,' of 'direction' and 'assistance,' of 'suggestion' and 'communication,' as suited to the needs of the agents and the character of their writings. The inspiration was, therefore, adequate but not uniform; it was not the same in kind and degree in all and through all, but it answered the end for which it was given, and served the purpose for which it was needed."

"I think he does well," I replied, "in giving a wholesome warning against the rashness of higher critics, who, in their eagerness to be 'advanced,' and their hostility to the supernatural, are chiefly intent on picking holes, with a view to discredit the Scriptures, instead of a careful scholarly inquiry into the facts, with a view to showing how the Divine has acted through the human, with all its imperfections, but has unmistakably acted, all the same."

"Yes, and still acts, or why do we preachers ever get into our pulpits? We are human enough, God knows, and are stuffed full of imperfections, but blessed be God, He has often given us the joy of seeing souls turned to Him through our weak but zealous ministry in bringing the power of His Book and the life and death and rising again of His Son to bear on them. Bryant is right in insisting on the practical end of inspiration and revelation. God inspired holy men of old that they might inspire us, and we might inspire others. Listen to this," and he read from pages 127-8:

"Revelation is the act of Divine self-manifestation in a supernatural way for gracious ends and spiritual purposes. This revelation is called in Scripture, 'the mystery of redemption,' to distinguish it from the revelation of God in creation; it is further called 'the mystery of Christ,' or 'the mystery of God in Christ'—'the mystery which from the beginning hath been hid in God, but is now revealed unto us' to distinguish it from the revelation of God in Nature and in Providence. This revelation takes place in history, which again distinguishes it from the intuitional, or what is revealed in the moral consciousness. This revelation is special rather than general, spiritual rather than cosmolical, ethical and Divine, rather than material and human, enshrined in the purposes of Divine selection, and appointment of men to the prophetic and apostolic office, by whom God made known His will to the race; while the highest and fullest revelation of His purpose and love was in the appearing of Jesus Christ, who came to 'show us the Father,' and to accomplish the purposes of Divine redemption and reconciliation for the world."

"But," I said, "the High Churchmen tell us that you have no right to try to bring any souls to God. You haven't been ordained by a Bishop."

The Political Parson gave a snort, and uttered an emphatic "Bosh!"

"Bosh it is," I replied, "and that's where Lockyer's book comes in. It's a fine book, with a touching dedication 'To One Dear Love whose Light of Eventide made all things beautiful.' He traces the course of the spiritual history of mankind from the Fall to the Redemption, showing how the Redemption was always in the purposes of God, but in the childhood of the human race His purposes were veiled in symbol, and it was only as mankind grew to moral manhood that the symbolism of the Law began to give way before a fuller and fuller illumination of the Spirit, until at last there came the Light of the World, and in His resplendent glory the symbolism became obsolete, for why keep the shadows when the Reality was there? Humanity, however, has always kept much of its spiritual childishness, and has hankered again and again after the symbols, because the Reality was too sublime for its feeble comprehension, too dazzlingly beautiful for weak eyes that loved to rest in the shadows. And Ritualism, and 'Catholicism,' with their theatrical shows, and their material theories of 'Apostolical Succession,' and physically transmitted grace, is nothing more than a playing down to the infantile element in humanity, a turning back from a spiritual to a mechanical 'succession,' from the 'spirit that giveth life,' to the 'letter that killeth,' and the law of 'carnal ordinances.' Lockyer shows that even under the Law the prophets were sent as a necessary spiritual corrective to the hard and coarse letter-worship of the priests. And he asks:

"Has not the priesthood, so styling itself, and cherishing the principles and traditions of its craft, been ever relentlessly opposed to the spirit of prophecy? Has it not waged war against freedom of thought, looking jealously on every quest of the truth? Has it respected the rights of conscience? Has it cared so greatly for purity of heart and righteousness of life?—caring much more, in any case, that men should submit to its sway and obey its will. May any great and true revival of spiritual religion be traced to its influence? Or has not such revival been always the result of an earnest message to the conscience and hearts of men on the part of those who, even though nominally in the succession of the priesthood,—like Wycliffe, Savonarola, Luther, and Wesley—were essentially men of prophetic spirit, doing their true work as prophets the better, the more they broke away from the priestly habit and rule?"

The Political Parson clapped his hands at this, and at once bespoke the loan of the book when I had done with it.

"But what," he asked, "does Lockyer say about us—the ministers of the Nonconformist Churches?"

REV. THOMAS F. LOCKYER, B.A., IERNLEY
LECTURER, 1890.

"Will this satisfy you?" And I read from page 137:

"What, then, is the true, the spiritual lineage of the Christian ministry? Is it not that those who are immediately called of God to such a work and service, and in whose hearts there burns the heavenly fire, are for that very reason in line, spiritually, with all who aforetime have been called with the same calling, and in whose hearts the same fire has burned? A tactual succession can but ensure, at the utmost, a pedigree of routine: for a spiritual ministry the succession must be spiritual. Is it not so in the whole realm of mind? Who is the true successor of a great laureate? His son? or whatever successor may be appointed to wear the wreath? Is it not, rather, he who has the kindred poet's soul? Moreover, just as the succession, in this case, is sometimes doubly real, the kindred genius being awakened to its exercise, and becoming aware of itself, by the example and influence of the earliest singer; so is it often true of the prophet of the Gospel, that not only is he akin, because of the prophetic fire, to the prophets of elder days, but the fire that glowed in them has flashed its contagion to his own spirit."

"Splendid, splendid, couldn't be better. He's a genuine Methodist. That idea of the spiritual succession is one to inspire a man, yet it is one to humble him also. For what am I that my God should call me to be His ambassador to sinful men?"

Heaven help me to be a good and faithful servant."

"Amen! It is curious how the best of our 'Catholics' themselves, in their best moments, or their lucid intervals, just as you please, see the truth. Here, for instance, is Keble's 'Christian Year.' See what he says in the poem for St. Matthias' Day:

Who is God's chosen priest?

He, who on Christ stands waiting day and night,
Who traced His holy steps, nor ever ceased,
From Jordan banks to Bethphage height;

Who hath learned lowliness

From His Lord's cradle, patience from His cross;
Whom poor men's eyes and hearts consent to bless;
To whom, for Christ, the world is loss;

Who both in agony

Hath seen Him and in glory; and in both Owned Him divine, and yielded, nothing loth,
Body and soul, to live and die,

In witness of his Lord,

In humble following of his Saviour dear:
This is the man to wield th' unearthly sword,
Warring unharmed with sin and fear.

It would be too absurd to say that these 'notes' of Divine ordination are confined to the recipients of Episcopal 'laying on of hands.' We, and every denomination, have had our share of such apostolic men. We have them still, and while we have them we can afford to snap our fingers at all the Ritualists say about the invalidity of our 'orders.'"

A pattering of little feet on the landing, and a ripple of childish laughter, interrupted us. It was Delia taking the children to bed. She brought them in to kiss me and the Political Parson.

"For of such is the kingdom of heaven," said the Political Parson, who is a dear lover of children, though he has none of his own.

"But we've forgotten all about Alfred the Great," I said, as Delia took them out of the room.

"Oh, he can wait. We've been talking of something greater still."

Before the Political Parson left I remembered the beautiful lines of the Quaker poet, John Greenleaf Whittier, on the Bible, where he says it is a Gallery of sacred pictures manifold,

A minster rich in holy effigies,
And bearing on entablature and frieze
The hieroglyphic oracles of old.
Along its transept aureoled martyrs sit;
And the low chancel side-lights half acquaint
The eye with shrines of prophet, bard and saint,
Their age-dimmed tablets traced in doubtful writ
But only when on form and word obscure Falls from above the white supernal light,
We read the mystic characters aright,
And light informs the silent portraiture,
Until we pause at last awe-held before
The One ineffable Face, love, wonder and adore.

Christianity and Symbolism.

IN the present crisis of the Anglican Church we see the culminating action of a tendency which for many years has been in a direction opposite to that of honest and sturdy Protestantism. It has been assumed that evangelical Nonconformity is unfavourable to the religious imagination and to the consecration of art in worship. And there is an assumption of superiority and culture on the part of the High Churchman which is meant to convey the impression that it is only a bare, hard and meagre Christianity which Nonconformists can appreciate. An air and an attitude of this sort we can afford to ignore. Nor is it needful that we treat lightly the relation of worship to ritual as if art may not be consecrated to edification. We rejoice in our evangelicalism, but we would be loth to destroy the noble piles, grey with the centuries, and hoary with pious memories, in which the faith and piety of our ancestors, though, perhaps, not of the highest order, have enshrined themselves. We would, of course, deprecate such uses of art as would revert to the sensuous symbolism or Popish elaboration of these edifices, for we believe that essentially as a nation we have outgrown all this—thanks to the evangelicalism which is deep-rooted in the land. Yet an opposite extreme may well be avoided. Barn-like buildings; naked whitewash, paltry lath and plaster, bald services; the unæsthetic, which is often also the irreverent, in tone and temper, are, of course, no helps to Christian worship. To avoid the error of excess we need not commit the error of defect. But the historical drift of ritualism, and its inevitable association with sacerdotal and mechanical religion, may offer suggestive and timely warning, and should confirm the young in their Nonconformist faith.

The early Christian Church gives us Divine worship in its ideal form, spontaneous, devout, unliturgical, as if revelling in the gladness of that spiritual liberty, that emancipation from the bondage of Judaism which had been but the scaffolding folding of the spiritual building now the inheritance of the new era—the era of the Spirit. As it has been truly said, “Any one who can see in New Testament reminiscences of Christian worship the slightest survival of ritual sacrifice, or the consciousness of any other mystery than that of communion between the finite and the infinite, must see it through mediæval spectacles.” So that ritualism as we see it in High Anglican worship, as in the Romish Church, is a corruption of early spiritual simplicity, a degeneration rather than a healthy growth. Romish symbolism was a sort of aftermath; it carried over into the Christian Church a second and feeblier crop of the polytheistic idolatry which belonged to the heathen and pre-Christian world. What the Church in her worship might have been had she retained her spirituality, is beyond our pen to describe. We believe that in the advancing ages of progress art would have reached her noblest uses in religion, and held a legitimate though subordinate place in worship. Indeed, as it was, the Church of the Middle Ages did assuredly procure for itself the service of the human imagination, whether it worked in stone or in colour. And we may readily allow that the symbolism of the Roman Church did for a period serve a provisionally needful and salutary end. But grand as it was, it formed part of a system by which the spirit of man was held in bondage, and unless the progress of mankind was to be arrested, the breaking of the bonds was indispensable. When we study Christianity we find that its essential and distinctive character is its spirituality. It is this which differentiates it from all the religions ever professed amongst men. Lose that, and you lose the soul of the Christian religion. Symbolism will then become excessive, and it will overlay and become a travesty of the truth. The symbolism of the Cross, considered as a piece of wood, is expressive, even pathetic; but it is not so spiritual as that of the Name of Him who hung upon it. Accordingly, we find in the catacombs in Rome that the earliest token of the Christian tomb is not the cross on which Christ died, but the name of the Saviour, the Word of God.

Side by side with the decline in spirituality in the Church, at least two things become apparent, the growth of ecclesiastical domination, and the distortion and decay of Christian art. To take the last first, the gorgon-headed monsters, the terrorising demon-forms at the entrance of foreign churches are no adornment. The representations of the fall and of the solemn act of redemption are, to say the least, coarse and offensive. The truth is, these subjects do not reveal their deepest and best meaning in sculpture, and are better perhaps left alone. Painting in future we think be more widely consecrated to Religion, but it is only as the spirituality of religion is preserved that painting will be free from that essential unreality which has made it in so many cases a panderer to superstition and a handicraft of falsehood. This blunder has often occurred. The halo or nimbus around the head of Christ, or a special circle around those of the saints; the portrayal of the Trinity as three visible persons; Rubens' picture in which the dead Christ lies across the Father's knees, who is an old and wrinkled man, plunged in parental sorrow; the many representations of the Madonna and child, especially one apparently in honour of St. Francis and the Virgin, but untrue to Jesus, who is armed with a vengeful thunderbolt, his arm being held back by the pitying Virgin, while Francis throws his mantle of protection over the globe lying in the Wicked One. These are but specimens of the way in which art has fed idolatry, and divorced from the truth and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, has cheated the untaught to the believing of a lie. Happily our Protestant traditions and spirit, together with the modern tendency towards a healthy naturalism, have already enriched us with some of the choicest treasures of Art as a handmaid to religion and truth. The general pictorial symbolism in which the mind of Europe in the middle ages had faith, has now quite lost its hold upon educated minds. Even Roman Catholics cannot be so superstitious in the nineteenth century as in the fourteenth. And Roman Catholic painters have had their lucid moments which in late years have created for us some of the noblest works that can adorn an Academy, beautify a home, or stir pure and deep religious feeling.

If Christian symbolism for Art's sake needed the liberating touch of the Reformation, still more did it require the uprising of the human spirit against Rome in order to break the bonds of ecclesiastical and sacerdotal assumption and tyranny with which worship and ritual became associated. The decay of spirituality meant not only abused Art, but a sacerdotal and mechanical religion in which ritual and sign play a necessary part. The priest and the supposed sacred sign, the religion of proxy and the sacerdotal function, are naturally affiliated. We do not deny to the ritualist—whether Anglican or Roman Catholic—the possession of a true piety and a sincere devotion of soul in which Christ is loved and served, but in so far as ceremonialism and priestism are naturally allied, the result in spiritual terms cannot but be vitiated and poor. There must be limitation of light, liberty, and individual spiritual progress. This for the few choice ones, but what shall be said of the religious interests of the rank and file? Does not the tyrant walk in the footprints of the priest? Does not the serious symbol become the delusive fetish? Does not the whole system of mediæval legends and saintly miracles, of fasts and feasts, of days and months and seasons, of vestments and posturings cast over religion an influence of childishness and imbecility unworthy of the spiritual and robust teaching of the New Testament? Verily so. Still more if at the bidding of a mortal priest an alleged miracle is performed on the altar and God is brought down to be worshipped in the form of gross material elements.

That ritualism is the support and medium of priestly power, and that its certain drift in the Anglican Church is towards the acknowledgment of Romanism as its centre and authority, and the creation of the Church as a unit under the Pope of Rome, is evident from the recent utterances of Lord Halifax. He wishes the great machine to work smoothly. Investing ritual with sacramental spiritual efficacy, and exalting the minister into the priest, it is but natural that he should desiderate union with, and obeisance to the great centre whence the whole system is, and has been, elaborated. Such is his idea of the Church: One and uniform in its ceremonial and priesthood, because through these necessarily flow salvation and grace. This is a poor, shallow conception of the Church of Jesus Christ. It cripples religion to tie it up with sensuous symbolism. It limits my fellowship with God and the Unseen, it fetters my worship to confine these within the precincts of holy places and a round of holy observances. Our entire intellectual and spiritual nature revolts against the imposture, which for bread offers a stone, and for fish, a serpent. The worship which is spiritual has vaster amplitudes, clearer vision, directer contact with the Divine. For "Nearer is He than breathing,

And closer than hands or feet."

In the foregoing remarks we have been approaching the priest through the ritual. For ritualism is, to say the least, the popular and ready excuse for the priest. It invests him with an impressiveness and an authority which appeal strikingly to the popular sense; and as spiritual religion has declined, ritual and the priest have perforce obtained ascendancy.

What are the needs of the hour? We observe ritualism rampant, and even defiant, in the Anglican Church. We are naturally scandalised at the spectacle of so many of the clergy doing the work of Rome under a Protestant banner and with Protestant pay. With some of our Nonconformist brethren immediate demand is made that a vigorous church discipline Act shall be brought into play, and the law of an Established Protestant Church enforced. But we confess we are not re-assured as we look in that direction. Besides, we are not of those who think that religion may be treated as a creature of human law. Coercive measures will not convert the ritualist, or even greatly retard his influence. He may resent a sacrilegious hand being laid upon his conscience, and in the last resort, law can but operate negatively. There is but one proper method. It is as a leading journalist has said, "To repeal an impossible law and let the Anglican Church go free to be as ritualistic as it likes." Disestablishment will not, of course, abolish ritualism, but it will give equality and liberty in the matter of worship, and make Lord Halifax's vision "of blatant sacerdotalism and a dumb Parliament" impossible. It will restore the bishops to a state of equilibrium, and give clearness and direction to an inevitable line of cleavage.

But we have a deeper duty in presence of an invading ritualism. It is the vigilance that guards inviolate our sacred trust as Protestants and Non-conformists. We are the heirs of a great past. Dearly have been bought for us the spiritual liberties we possess, the purity of our worship, and the blessing of an evangelical ministry. Let us cherish these with increased ardour and loyalty, and jealously guard against everything that would lower the spirituality of Christian worship and life. It may be needless to warn Methodists against becoming ritualists. We may, however, be admonished against formalism, and between formalist and full-blown ritualist there is little to choose. Probably the spiritual advantage is with the latter. Certainly so, if he be sincere. There are two directions in which we may well endeavour after improvement. Greater reverence in worship is our need. Let us be still and listen to the "starry voices." Let us be captivated by spiritual ideals. Let us remember in whose presence we appear when we come together in His house. Order and decency, without being either obtrusive or stiff and statuesque may well be promoted among us, and spiritual feeling thus be exalted. And further, let us recover the lost art of spiritual meditation. We should ponder the spiritual meaning of that symbolism which Christ has left to His Church in the two great ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. A worthier use of each can yet be made. Further, just as the symbolism of nature and science is nobler than the symbolism of classical antiquity, and the deep inner meaning of the universe a more fertile study than mythology, so the spiritual symbolism of the New Testament, the symbolism of our Lord's discourses and of the letters of His Apostles, the symbolism of grace and of glory, will furnish truer aids to spirituality of worship, and lift the spirit to loftier levels of thought and devotion than a ritualism which can only be little more than sensuous, and is often but a degrading fetish and a fatuous snare to the soul. To the true seeker after God, his quest is rewarded by direct spiritual fellowship with the Unseen. Welcoming all legitimate aids which refinement and enlightened taste may bring to reverent worship, he enters through spiritual doors into the Divine presence. To him a cumbrous ceremonialism would be as meaningless as it is unspiritual, and all the more that, as the implement of the sacerdotalist, it denies to his Lord those priestly rights which are His by an inviolate and incommunicable claim.

HOW A "COMPOUND OF MISERY AND MISCHIEF" BECAME A CLERGYMAN.

BY REV. J. VAUGHAN,

AUTHOR OF "LIFE STORIES OF REMARKABLE PREACHERS," ETC.

THE next year of Newton's life was spent mostly in Kent with his wife, and in London with friends. Among those whose acquaintance he made in London was the Rev. George Whitefield, by whose preaching and conversation he was much benefited.

Through the kind offices of Mr. Joseph Manesty, of Liverpool, the owner of the ships Newton had commanded, he now obtained a situation as tide-surveyor; his business being to inspect vessels in the Mersey. A more suitable post could not have been found for him. He had already made himself master of English and Latin, though he never had a teacher or an assistant since he was ten years old. And now, within two years, by his own efforts, he became sufficiently acquainted with Greek, Hebrew and Syriac as to be able to read portions of Scripture in those languages. He also kept up a regular course of reading in divinity, in Latin, English and French. All this without a master!

He was now strongly drawn to the work of the Christian ministry. And with the aid of some of his friends, including the Rev. Mr. Cecil, he applied to the Archbishop of York for ordination, and being refused, no further application was made for a considerable time. But about the reality of his "call" to this great work he seems to have had no doubt; for, in a letter to his wife, he says, referring to his journey to York, "As sure as our names are John and Mary, you will find that the time and expense of this journey will not be thrown away."

In the meantime, not knowing what might happen, he thought he would think over a few texts, and arrange a few outlines in his mind, so as to be ready to preach if an opportunity presented itself.

INTERIOR OF CHURCH, SHOWING GALLERY WHERE COWPER SAT.

He had not long to wait. He had a few friends among the dissenters at Leeds, and in December, 1758, he visited them. They, on hearing that he was wishful to become a preacher, offered him the pulpit in one of the chapels on the following Sunday. All went well up to the time of preaching. With fear and trembling he then announced his text, having in his mind four principal divisions and about eight sub-divisions. He started off extempore, but in less than ten minutes his divisions had left his mind, and he came to a sudden stop. Unable to say another word, he stood staring at the people and they at him. Thus ended his first effort at preaching; and for about two years the very thoughts of his failure gave him the heart-ache.

In course of time he again gathered courage, but thinking he should never be able to preach without a manuscript, he began writing out his sermons at full length, always taking care to have one in his pocket in case of an opening. After a while he was again asked to preach, and feeling confident he could now do it creditably, he readily consented. Ascending the pulpit, he produced his written production and began reading. But being near-sighted, and the reading-board being low, he had to bend over his manuscript, and for fear of losing the line, he dare not lift his eyes from it. Thus he stood in a crooked position, conning over his lesson like a great school-boy learning to read, and never stopped till he reached the end. Of this performance he was more ashamed than of the first. On leaving the pulpit he dare not look anyone in the face; and now he began to despair of ever becoming a preacher.

But such was his love for souls that he could not be quiet. For three years he conducted a short service every Sunday evening in his own house at Liverpool. And to let the world see what he preached, he published his sermons.

Then came an agreeable, but unexpected, change in his career. In 1764, Lord Dartmouth gave him the curacy of Olney, in Buckinghamshire, and through his lordship's influence, the Bishop of Lincoln ordained him. He was admitted to deacon's orders on the 29th of April, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and commenced his labours at Olney on the 26th of May. In June he was ordained priest. And thus, as a clergyman in the Established Church, he entered upon a ministerial career of great success, and of forty years' duration. The stipend at Olney was only £60 per year, but that great and good man, John Thornton, Esq., a London merchant, supplemented it with a gift of £200 per annum, which put poor Newton, who was now the father of a small family, in comfortable circumstances. In preaching Newton never again stuck fast, though he usually preached extempore. Occasionally he had "hard times," however, and had to give over much sooner than he expected, and then he frankly told his hearers that he was giving over because the Lord had "suspended His assistance." And with this explanation the people were perfectly satisfied. He never dragged on when he had nothing more to say.

The poet Cowper lived at Olney, and between him and Newton sprang up a strong friendship, which resulted in the publication of the "Olney Hymns." Some of Newton's hymns are to be found in nearly every hymn-book in Christendom. There are nineteen of them in our own Hymnal, and none are more telling and beautiful than Nos.

THE PARSONAGE, OLNEY.

146, 501 and 638. In 1779, Mr. Thornton presented Mr. Newton with the living of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, and after fifteen years' successful labour at Olney, he removed to that important parish on the 19th of December in that year. His London residence was in Co'man Street Buildings, St. Stephen's; and so popular and large-hearted was he, that his house was always open to ministers and Christians of all evangelical denominations, consequently he was seldom without visitors. And among the many interesting cases of conversion that took place under his ministry was that of Mr. Buchanan, an ungodly young Scotsman, who afterwards became Mr. Newton's curate.

On the 15th of December, 1790, the heaviest trial of his life overtook him in the death of his beloved wife, after a happy union of forty years. His loss seems to have beclouded the remainder of his life. In nearly every letter he speaks of his bereavement. In one he says, "The Bank of England is too poor to compensate for such a loss as mine."

As an author he had now given the world three volumes of sermons, and some other works, all of which were well received. And by the literary world generally, his judgment as a man of learning was highly respected, consequently books and pamphlets were often sent to him for review.

Such was his fame that about this time the University of New Jersey conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.D. A work in two volumes was also dedicated to him with the D.D. annexed to his name. But as that great and good man, the late James Austin Bastow, the author of a "Bible Dictionary," is said to have done, he respectfully declined the honour. He declared he would not be known by such a title; no, not even if all the Universities of Europe conferred it upon him. "What!" said he, "shall such a compound of misery and mischief as I was, be called Doctor! Surely not." How ministers differ in their views of matters of this sort! But then all ministers have not been a "compound of misery and mischief," and, perhaps, that accounts partly for the difference. When Mr. Bastow was offered the degree, nearly forty years ago, it was said that he exclaimed; "What can a Primitive Methodist preacher do with D.D. on twenty-five shillings a week!" But twenty-five shillings a week was considered a good salary for a Primitive Methodist preacher in those days. Salaries and preachers, however, have advanced with the times, and we are glad of it; we highly esteem our brethren who have honourably taken University degrees, and hope many more will do so, and yet retain their spiritual power. Mr. Newton was a bright, sunny Christian. He loved all who loved the Saviour. And sometimes at the tea-table he was full of dry jokes and witty sayings. A young preacher once said to him, "Pray, Mr. Newton, what do you think of the entrance of sin into our world?" "Sir," said he,

JOHN NEWTON'S STUDY.

"I never think of it. I know there is such a thing as moral evil, and I know there is a remedy for it; and there my knowledge begins, and there it ends."

To a Baptist minister who had been exceeding zealous in trying to make converts to his own opinion, and who had been speaking on the choice of texts, Mr. Newton said, "Ah, brother So-and-so, there is one text I can preach from, and which you cannot." "Sir," said he, "what text can that be?" Newton replied, "Christ sent me not to baptise, but to preach the Gospel." The Baptist took the hint without the least offence, says William Jay, and no one laughed more heartily.

In his old age, when the servant was helping to pull on his shoes one day, he said to a friend who was standing by, "I had not this trouble in Africa, for I had no shoes. When I rose in the morning and shook myself like a dog, I was dressed. And, sir," he added, "in every waking hour for nearly half a century I have thought of my former misery."

He was over eighty when the Rev. Mr. Cecil suggested to him that in consideration of his failing sight and the feeble state of his health, he should stop and not go on preaching till he could speak no longer. "I cannot stop," said he. And being deeply affected, he exclaimed, "What! Shall the old African blasphemer stop while he can speak? Never!"

About this time some one asked him if he intended to take a change of air during the summer, for the benefit of his health. "No, sir," he replied, "I do not intend now to move beyond the stones of London. I am eighty years of age. I have but little time left. I would not leave my people now for a thousand worlds."

But shortly after this the good man had to leave his pulpit and his people, and that for ever, for God called him up higher. His last words were, "I am satisfied with the Lord's will;" and on the 21st of December, 1807, he passed away. He was interred in the family vault under the church, close to the remains of his late wife, and their niece, Miss Cunningham; and at his request a plain tablet bearing the following inscription was erected to his memory near the vestry door:—

JOHN NEWTON, CLERK,
Once an Infidel and Libertine,

A servant of slaves in Africa,
Was, by the rich mercy of our Lord and Saviour
JESUS CHRIST

Preserved, restored, pardoned,
And appointed to preach the Faith
He had long laboured to destroy,
Near sixteen years at Olney in Bucks,
And . . . years in this church.

On Feb. 1, 1750, he married MARY,
Daughter of the late George Catlett,
Of Chatham, Kent,
He resigned her to the Lord who gave her,

THE SUMMER HOUSE, OLNEY.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

IX.—THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

TODAY I have a topic, but no particular text. Wordsworth himself, and all the best and most characteristic that he wrote, are our key-note for the present preachment. Perhaps, if some specific place be asked for we might single out the sonnet (who does not know it?) beginning, "The world is too much with us," or the majestic "Lines near Tintern Abbey," or the "Lines Written in Early Spring," or "Expostulation and Reply,"—with "The Tables Turned," or the "Sonnet Composed on Calais Beach." But, best of all, it may be, as ensample of the whole, are the exquisite stanzas on "Lucy," really composed not in the loved Lake District, but in the Hartz Forest in Germany. I could "spot" the true Wordsworthian at a glance by his reception of these lines—the description of Nature's ideal child. Nature takes her and moulds the girl to her own will.

"Myself will to my darling be Both law and impulse: and with me
The girl, in rock and plain,
In earth and heaven, in glade and bower,
Shall feel an overseeing power
To kindle or restrain.

She shall be sportive as the fawn,
That wild with glee across the lawn
Or up the mountain springs;
And hers shall be the breathing balm,
And hers the silence and the calm
Of mute, insensate things.

The floating clouds their state shall lend
To her: for her the willow bend;
Nor shall she fail to see
E'en in the motions of the storm,
Grace that shall mould the maiden's form
By silent sympathy.

The stars of midnight shall be dear
To her; and she shall lean her ear
In many a secret place
Where rivulets dance their wayward round,
And beauty born of murmuring sound Shall pass into her face."

When we use the phrase "The Gospel of Nature," we are at once in danger of being dubbed Pagan by many. The Puritan strain is strong, (happily so for some reasons), in our English blood; and the Puritan tradition is impatient of what it scornfully styles "sentiment." We inherit from Paul too exclusively. So rare are references to Nature in the apostle's writings or speeches that we are bound to infer some strange defect or limitation. A Hebrew in his logic, his love of subtle dialectic, his passionate patriotism, his pre-occupation with conduct and righteousness, he was scarcely a Hebrew at all in relation to the world of beauty around him. Man filled his mind to the almost total exclusion of Nature. He had an eye for commerce, for architecture, for arms, for kings and kingdoms, for stirring cities and big populations, but none at all for the common sights of earth and sky, for ocean and forest, for mountain or flood. It could, by no possibility, be said of him that "the tall cataract haunted him like a passion." He might have written the 103rd Psalm, but not the 104th. Biographers of him well call attention to the fact that though in his travels he must have passed through some of the finest natural scenery in the world, and seen the sea in her most changeable moods, these experiences have left no trace in his literary remains. Paul, therefore, was no "Pagan," if love of Nature be Paganism. But let those with a different make-up from his take heart of grace. If they are thus Pagans, they can claim to be Pagans in good company. The Bible is full of Nature. Nowhere do you find more sympathetic descriptions of the outer world in both its beauty and its terror, than in this book. No man ever loved lake and mountain, field and flower, more sincerely or simply than Jesus. He talked familiarly of ravens and lilies; of grass and thorns and thistles; of grapes and figs; of storms and floods and reeds by the river-side; of sparrows and hens and chickens; of the sower and his seed; of tares and mustard-plants; of pearls and fish; of the morning and the evening sky; of sheep and goats, and foxes and eagles and vultures. No poets ever sang richer lays of Nature than the Hebrew psalmists and prophets. To them God "walked on the wings of the wind, made the clouds His chariot, and covered Himself with light as with a garment." Their raptures rise as much for the Divine in the outer world, as for the "Presence" in the temple. Puritans they were truly, but Pagans too, in the best sense.

We have been by far too jealous of the world about us. We have set the works of God against the "Word of God," forgetting that the work is a word. It has been thought necessary to decry and depreciate Nature in order to exalt grace; to minimise the teachings of the external world in order to enhance the merit of Revelation. We are now coming, though slowly, to see that all is Nature, that all proceeds from One Source; that in varying degrees of fulness, but, in its own place with equal certainty and clearness, each part of Nature teaches the gospel of the grace of God. As to that supposed antithesis between natural and revealed religion, we are happily coming, too, to recognise that, properly, both are revealed. Both are disclosures of God. Revealed religion (so-called) is a manifestation of God by articulate methods—by written history, by spoken discourse; Natural religion is a revelation by inarticulate signs, by hieroglyphs—a song without words, but none the less penetrating or impressive to those who have the "ear."

Natural Religion is the faith of childhood—whether of the race or of the individual. Then we felt as if the earth and the heavens were alive; as if a spirit dwelt and moved in the midst of Nature with which we held awed or glad communion. The Sun was God's eye; the thunder was God's voice; the winds were God's sighs; the lightning was God's sword of flame. The woods were informed with phantasy, and our "hearts leaped up when we beheld a rainbow in the sky."

"Happy those early days when I
Shined in my angel infancy!

When yet I had not walked above
A mile or two from my first Love,
And looking back at that short space,
Could see a glimpse of His bright face;
When on some gilded cloud or flower,
My gazing soul would dwell an hour,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity.

And feel through all this fleshly dress,
Bright shoots of everlastingness."

No one who knows will dispute that the new feeling for Nature by which our times are marked dates from Wordsworth. No one pierced to the heart of her as he did. Thomson made a mere inventory of her every-day dress, in which Scott largely followed him; Crabbe and Burns saw only moods of man reflected on her face; Cowper draped her with a "design-argument;" but it was reserved for Wordsworth to see her in her very self, to set forth her mystic message, and to interpret her essence to observing man. None has seen, or revealed, as he, the subtle harmony of the world without with the world within. To use his own words: he sings how

"The discerning intellect of man
Is wedded to this goodly universe
In love and holy passion."

His aim is to—

"Chant in lonely peace, the spousal verse
Of this great consummation."

His "voice proclaims"—

"How exquisitely the individual mind, (And the progressive powers, perhaps, no less
Of the whole species) to the external world
Is fitted: and how exquisitely, too—
Theme this but little heard of among men—
The external world is fitted to the mind."

Archbishop Trench's words are well worth quoting here: "On this rests the possibility of a real, and not a merely arbitrary teaching by Parables—that the world of Nature is throughout a witness for the world of spirit, proceeding from the same hand, growing out of the same root, and constituted for that very end. All lovers of truth readily acknowledge these mysterious harmonies. To them the things on earth are copies of the things in heaven. They know that the earthly tabernacle is made after the pattern of things seen in the Mount, and the question of the Angel in Milton often forces itself on their meditations—

"What if earth
Be but the shadow of heaven, and things therein
Each to the other like, more than on earth is thought?"

This affinity between Nature and Man makes possible an influence of the former upon the latter which we may describe, generally, in three ways.

It is Elevating; it is Restoring; it is Softening.

(a) Elevating. Its tendency is to raise the mind to grand and noble thoughts. Who that has gazed with any degree of appreciation upon the bold and quiet outline of the mountain, or the placid expanse of the deep lake, or the tumultuous force of the cataract, or the magnificent cloud-masses piled up around the sunset, or the broad and heaving bosom of the ocean, has not felt himself lifted up in soul towards the infinite and eternal? This feeling is the source of Nature-worship. As Max Müller has pointed out, in all the Aryan languages, the name for God is from the same root. That Sanscrit root is dyu—sky or day. These early worshippers were not mere vulgar idolaters. The sky was the type or symbol of the Invisible One. When men looked up to it they thought of the great Heaven-Father, and named Him with the name they had given to the bright blue expanse which embraced all they saw or knew. There are rebuking aspects of Nature's sublimity in the presence of which it is hard indeed, even for the average man to be mean or petty or self-absorbed.

(b) Refreshing and Restoring. In these days of whirl and worry: of fever, fret and haste, when we seem bent on realising by railway, telegraph (wireless or other) and telephones, and what not, Carlyle's dream of the possession of Fortunatus's wishing-hat for the annihilation of time and space, it is well to be reminded that Nature's processes are slow and leisurely, and her message one of quiet patience. Do you know Emerson's words: "Nature will not have us fret and fume. When we come out of the caucus, or the bank, or the Abolition Convention, or the Temperance meeting, or the Transcendental club into the fields and woods, she says to us, 'So hot, my little sir.'" Let me here repeat a story told to Mr. Laing, of Newburgh, and by him to Professor Shairp. The original narrator was a boatman on Ullswater: "About two years ago (1844) I rowed a solitary gentleman from Pooley Bridge to Gowbarrow Park. On reaching the landing-place, he desired me to wait until he returned. Noon passed, afternoon passed, and still he made no appearance. I began to think he had changed his mind and had gone on to Patterdale; but as it began to draw towards sunset he drew near. He stepped into the boat without a word, and said, 'Pull away.' He sat facing me, and I saw that his eyes were red with weeping, and he had evidently been in great distress. After we were fairly out on the bosom of the lake, he said: 'I came from the South of England to throw myself over the Force, to put an end to my misery; but before carrying out my fearful intention, I sat and thought. Gradually the exceeding beauty of the scene stole into my soul and I felt there is surely happiness to be found on earth still, and so I am away back to my home.'" Mr. Laing added when he told the story to his friend: "The almost prophetic inspiration of Wordsworth surely never shone clearer than when he wrote his poem of 'Airey Force Valley.' The concluding lines are:

"How sensitive
Is the light ash! that pendent from the brow
Of one dim cave, in seeming silence makes
A soft eye-music of slow-waving boughs,
Powerful, almost, as vocal harmony,
To stay the wanderer's steps, and soothe his thoughts."

Henry Ward Beecher has sometimes been called the greatest preacher since Paul, but he had a feeling for Nature, and made a use of her, of which Paul was innocent to a degree. He used to lie as a boy, his biographers tell us, and look up into the blue sky and the moving tree-tops for hours together. Listening thus to the voices of Springtime and eventide, he received the first distinct religious impressions that he remembered. "His nature, which seemed closed almost to the verge of stupidity to the rules of syntax, and the answers in the Westminster Catechism, was wide open and receptive to all the processes and influences of Nature around him." His mind thus became a vast storehouse of facts and images to which he resorted in after-life for illustrations. But more than that, Nature became a very part of himself. It prepared him to be her interpreter to others—and later on, with spiritual experience added, “to be the reconciler of a spiritual faith and a material science.” He himself says: “The first distinct religious feelings I had were in connection with Nature. I was born a Calvinist, yet the only religious feelings I had at that early period were those that came through the unconscious influence of God in Nature. It was not until later that I knew it as the Divine element.”

At Amherst the chaplain found him one day lost in admiration of opening buds and beautiful blossoms that were unfolding under his culture. Of course, the good man felt that he must improve the occasion. “Ah! Henry,” he said, “these things are pretty, very pretty, but, my boy, do you think that such things are worthy to occupy the attention of a man who has an immortal soul?” Abashed and shy then, the boy said nothing at the time, but afterwards he said he wanted to tell him that “since Almighty God had taken time to make these trifles, it did not seem amiss for him to take time to look at them.” Flowers always had a wonderfully tranquillising effect upon him. “Fagged with hard work, vexed with cares, with nerves strained and irritated, a few hours among his flowers rested his brain, soothed his nerves, and refitted him for days of hard work.” He always realised a subtle power in colours; and coloured gems, which he called unfading flowers, possessed this calming power above everything else. It is told how after many an exciting lecture in the old slavery days, he would sit perfectly quiet contemplating a stone of exquisite colour, and in a comparatively short time his head would cease to throb, and his blood to gallop, and he was ready for a dreamless sleep.

(c) Softening. A love of Nature begets a fine and generous sympathy with the lowest and humblest things. What better illustration could be had of this than such books as those of Richard Jefferies, the “Memoir” of whom by Sir Walter Besant brings out so beautifully the same point? The Wordsworthian, however, will turn to the stories of “Hart-Leap Well,” and “The Good Lord Clifford,”—the former with its sweet burden:

“The Being, that is in the clouds and air,
That is in the green leaves among the groves,
Maintains a deep and reverential care
For the unoffending creatures whom He loves.

One lesson, Shepherd, let us two divide,
Taught both by what she shows and what conceals;
Never to blend our pleasure or our pride
With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels.”

And the latter with its tale of love:

“How, by Heaven’s grace, this Clifford’s heart was framed;
How he, long forced in humble walks to go,
Was softened into feeling, soothed, and tamed.

Love had he found in huts where poor men lie,
His daily teachers had been woods and rills,
The silence that is in the starry sky,
The sleep that is among the lonely hills.”

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

VII.—DEVONSHIRE SQUARE BAPTIST CHURCH.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

URING the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Baptist Churches of England were strengthened by the accession of a large number of Continental religious refugees, many of whom were subjected to cruel imprisonments and other barbarous severities. To the Baptist Churches belongs the honour of contributing the first and the last of the Christian martyrs who perished in the flames during the two centuries of England’s religious intolerance. In church government the Baptists strongly resemble the sturdy Independents. With the Congregationalists they believe in the unscriptural nature of state-aided churches, and they also maintain that each particular church or assembly of Christians is sufficiently competent to manage its own internal matters.

As early as the year 1616, an Independent Church had been established in London, and was under the pastoral charge of Mr. Henry Jacob. In 1638, Mr. William Kiffin, the recognised founder of the famous Devonshire Square Baptist Church, seceded from Jacob’s congregation, and joined that of Mr. Spilsbury, of Wapping, which had been formed some five years previously. This society of godly men, which was the first Particular or Calvinistic Baptist Church in England, became the nucleus of the renowned Church of Devonshire Square. Before entering upon the important duties of the ministry, Kiffin was a city merchant. He was a man of considerable wealth, and of high social position. Nature had been liberal in her gifts, for he possessed a striking physique, a strong individuality, and large force of character. He had received a liberal education, was cultured, and had read somewhat extensively.

Dr. Duncan states that William Kiffin founded the Devonshire Square Church in the year 1653. The famous Bishopsgate mansion which conferred its distinctive name upon this old-established Nonconformist city Church, and in which Kiffin and his followers assembled for worship, was built by Joseph Fisher, who was a clerk in chancery. This city functionary had large notions, and most extravagantly he lived beyond his income. Unfortunately, for him, the house, which was derisively called, "Fisher's Folly," had to be sold for the payment of his debts. For a time the mansion became the property of Edward, Earl of Oxford, who, during his office as Lord High Chancellor, entertained England's maiden Queen therein during one of her visits to the city. Shortly afterwards it was acquired by the noble family of Cavendish, who were old residents in Bishopsgate. After the acquisition of the ducal palace of Chatsworth, in the romantic vale of the Derbyshire Derwent, Devonshire Square mansion became the favourite town residence of the Cavendish family, and the second Earl of Devonshire died within its precincts.

Walford, in describing the mansion and its wealthy owners, somewhat contemptuously says: "The Earls of Devonshire held the house from 1620 to 1670, but during the Civil Wars, when the sour-faced preachers were all-powerful, the Earl's city mansion became a Conventicle, and resounded with the unctuous groans of the crop-eared listeners."

Butler, in his well-known Hudibras, satirically refers to the church that worshipped within the mansion, by declaring that the Rump Parliament resembled—

"no part of the nation
But Fisher's Folly congregation."

For forty-six consecutive years Kiffin retained the pastorate of the Devonshire Square Church, and by his untiring efforts he laid the foundation of its future spiritual prosperity. By his able pen and sturdy speech he defended the Baptist Churches against the renewed attacks of those who tried to crush the rising Nonconformity of the seventeenth century. Some three months after the death of King Charles the First, Mr. Kiffin, along with his Nonconformist companions in ecclesiastical con-controversy, received the public acknowledgments of the new House of Commons for their repudiation of the peculiar teaching as set forth in a book entitled, "The Part of England's New Chain Discovered." The Parliament in endorsing its approval of Kiffin and his confederates thus expressed itself: "The House does assure you of liberty and protection so far as God shall enable them in all things consistent with godliness, honesty, and civil peace, and the House doth give you leave to print your petition."

Although Kiffin had been a city merchant, and was on friendly terms with Royalty, yet he had to suffer a term of cruel imprisonment, and also had to pay heavy fines in the shape of so-called "loans to the king" because he would not abandon his Nonconformist principles and Baptist beliefs. By the uncharitable followers of "Church and State" he was publicly denounced as being "the author and ringleader of that seduced sect." In the year 1664, and when the persecution of the Nonconformists was at its highest point, and the jails of England were filled to overflowing with Dissenters, twelve persons were condemned to death at Aylesbury, in Buckinghamshire, for the simple crime of their being Nonconformists and Baptists. In all probability the inhuman sentence would have been carried into effect, and they would have been hanged, but for the intervention of the pastor of Devonshire Square Church, who successfully interceded with the king, and secured their release.

When Kiffin was thirty-six years of age he had a public discussion with Dr. Daniel Featley, on, "The Nature of a Visible Church." It is generally believed that the combatants met in the parish church of Southwark. The audience was wealthy and socially influential. It included Sir John Lenthall, "with many knights, ladies and gentlemen." In the controversy Kiffin strongly maintained that the thirty-nine articles and the Book of Common Prayer were not in agreement with God's Word. Kiffin, having been taunted by Featley's personal remark that the office of a minister is a lawful office, and none ought to meddle with it but those who have a lawful calling thereto, and that "you artificers may be ashamed of your prophesying, and say, 'I am a tradesman, I am no prophet, men taught me to exercise a handicraft from my youth,'" strongly replied: "Master doctor, I am more lawfully called to preach the Word than you, and that I will prove by Scripture." The conference having lasted for several hours, was abruptly brought to a close by the withdrawal of Featley and his followers. After a long interval of more than two years, Featley was imprisoned by the Government at Peter House, London, on the suspicion of having acted the part of spy and traitor. During his confinement, and when the principal events in the discussion were practically forgotten, he published from his standpoint, the proceedings of the debate, under the curious title of, "The Dippers Dipt, or the Anabaptists duck'd and plunged over head and ears at a disputation in Southwark. Together with a large and full discourse of their original several sorts, peculiar errors, high attempts against the State, capital punishments, with an application to these times."

Mr. Kiffin during his eventful ministry at Devonshire Square was in the habit of anointing the sick. One interesting incident, at least, has been preserved from oblivion. Mr. Hanserd Knollys writes: "In May, 1670, I had a short and powerful distemper in the bowels; no tongue can express my pains. Two learned, well-practised, and judicious doctors of physic had daily visited me; God did not succeed their honest and faithful endeavours with His blessing. I resolved to take no more physick, but would apply to that ordinance of God appointed by Jesus Christ, the Great Physician of value (James v. 14-19). And I got Mr. Kiffin and Mr. Vavasour Powell, who prayed over me, and anointed me with oil in the name of the Lord. And the Lord did hear prayer, and did heal me. For there were very many godly ministers and gracious saints that prayed day and night for me (with submission to the will of God), that the Lord would spare my life and heal me, and make me more useful and serviceable to the Lord, to the Church, and to the saints, whose prayers God had heard, and as an answer to their prayer, I was perfectly healed, but remained weak long after."

In the year 1701, Kiffin died triumphantly, after worthily sustaining the Devonshire Square pastorate for nearly half a century. In the year 1665, the church elected "Brother Patient" as Kiffin's co-pastor. After a brief ministry, which lasted for scarcely a month, he became a victim of the terrible plague that as an angel of death was entering the households of the Metropolis, and destroying the families of London by countless thousands.

From 1667 until 1688, the Rev. Daniel Dykes, M.A., was Kiffin's assistant minister, and upon the resignation of his chief pastor, for a brief period he had full charge of the pastorate. He was a man of some note, and before his ejection from the ministry of the Established Church he had been Rector of Hadham Magna, in Hertfordshire. He was one of the chaplains-in-ordinary to England's uncrowned king, and in 1653 he was appointed one of the "Triers," or examiners, of ministerial candidates for holy orders. Although he lived in troublous times, and was never known to compromise his convictions, he was imprisoned for only one night for his Nonconformist principles. He lived to a good old age, and was buried in Bunhill Fields, where the mortal remains of many of God's saints of the times of persecution are awaiting the resurrection to eternal life. Dykes was succeeded by Mr. Richard Adams, another of the ejected worthies of 1662. Before his appointment to Devonshire Square, and immediately following the clerical exodus of Black Bartholomew, he had been fined at the rate of one shilling per day for the entire period during which he had allowed a Nonconformist meeting to be held in his own house at Mount Sorrell, in Leicestershire. He is said to have been a man of piety, learning and usefulness.

At the death of Pastor Mark Key, who has been described as "a famous orator," the sister church of Pinner Hall amalgamated with Devonshire Square, and the Rev. Sayer Rudd, D.D., was called to the pastorate of the united churches. He was a man of superior endowments, and exercised a considerable influence over the Metropolitan Nonconformist Churches. In his later years, however, he was charged with holding and teaching anti-trinitarian opinions, and also with having attempted to conform to the tenets and practices of the National Church. These allegations ultimately led to his resignation of Devonshire Square.

For fourteen years following the year 1766, the pastorate was held by the Rev. John Macgowan, a Scotsman of some repute, and who is best remembered by his being the author of a remarkable book, entitled, "Dialogues of Devils." The Rev. Timothy Thomas, a Welsh divine, who was lionised for his fervid oratory, followed Macgowan, and he ministered to the welfare of the church for forty-six long years. He was succeeded by the devoted Dr. Price, who had, unfortunately, to resign the pastorate through ill-health.

The best known minister of Devonshire Square during this century was the Rev. John Howard Hinton, M.A. One of his biographers says: "Surely no man of high intellectual attainments, of cultured mind and refined tastes, ever, at any rate, during this century in London, wrought the work of the Lord in the regular ministry of the Gospel amid such odd surroundings. The chapel in which Mr. Hinton preached was 'cheek by jowl' with Petticoat Lane; and until recent years, an incessant struggle was waged between 'Rag Fair' and the place of worship. The worshippers had to win their way as best they could through crowds of dirty, noisy Jewish pedlars and Gentile thieves. The unsavoury merchandise was not actually brought into the house of God, but it and its vendors rested against the chapel walls and doorways; and the rude cries of buyers and sellers mingled strangely with the sweet songs of praise, and broke in wantonly upon the Sabbath stillness of the time of prayer. But notwithstanding the difficulties which beset the entrance, and although the chapel was both small and plain, yet the congregation that gathered there Sunday by Sunday was one far above the average in mental and spiritual acquirements. In such a place the preacher was the only attraction, and whether his hearers wanted intellectual stimulus or spiritual nourishment they were sure not to suffer disappointment at the service in Devonshire Square."

John Howard Hinton was a son of the Manse, and was born during the period that his father was minister of the Baptist Chapel in Oxford. His mother, previous to her marriage, was intimately acquainted with many eminent Nonconformist families, and John Howard, the distinguished prison reformer, was one of the most welcome guests at her father's house. During one of his frequent visits the eminent philanthropist was bitterly lamenting the bereavement of his only child. Turning to the young lady, who subsequently became Mrs. Hinton, he said: "If ever you have a son name him after me." The promise thus singularly given was fulfilled by the mother, who named her first-born John Howard. From a youth he was deeply pious, and began early in life to equip himself for the sacred duties of a Christian minister. In the same year that Her Majesty ascended the throne, Mr. Howard began his successful ministry at Devonshire Square, where he remained until the year 1863. During these years his great life-work was accomplished, and he became the most prominent representative of the Baptist Churches. He was "tall, sickly with the work and study of a life, grey-haired, inelegant, as all book-worms and men of thought are, with a voice by no means melodious, but tremulous with emotion as it is played upon by the soul within." Mr. Hinton lived much in public life, and was an able platform speaker. He fearlessly advocated voluntary education, and took a foremost part in the advocacy of anti-slavery, the Anti-state Church Association, and other national questions that were stirring public opinion some fifty years ago. He was an author of no mean repute, and wrote a number of books on a variety of subjects, including theology, zoology, history, travel and biography.

During the ministry of his successor, the Rev. W. T. Henderson, the church removed from the city to the present Devonshire Square Chapel in Stoke Newington. At his retirement the Wellington Road Church was incorporated with Devonshire Square, and the church was favoured with great spiritual prosperity. The present minister, the Rev. G. P. McKay, accepted the pastorate in 1891, and worthily presides over the various institutions connected with this Metropolitan centre of Nonconformity which has such a long and interesting history.

The Conference Address.

THE ANNUAL ADDRESS OF THE CONFERENCE TO THE CHURCHES.

PREPARED BY THE REV. W. JOHNSON.

DEAR BRETHREN:—We again greet you in our yearly pastoral, and in the common fellowship and service of the Redeemer's kingdom. "Grace and peace be multiplied to you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

The Conference rejoices in all the churches under its care. Its tender solicitude goes out to all, and not least to those labouring steadily, and enduring in the patience of hope, in remote country districts, as well as on distant Colonial stations and Mission Fields. Though widely separated, we rejoice in a faith which lifts us above all external distinctions and makes us one in Christ. We have one faith, one heart, one hope of our calling—Christ, the Lord, is not only our common Head, but our eternal bond of unity through living fellowship with Himself.

This year the Conference realises a special opportunity of fraternal fellowship with its most distant members. The Rev. William Hunt, a devoted Colonial minister, was heartily welcomed as special delegate from our Australian churches. Our brethren at the Antipodes, as they believe, under Divine leading, are completing arrangements to form part of one great United Methodist Church in Australia. This important change has occupied the careful and prolonged deliberations of several Conferential committees. It had also a prominent place in the consideration of the Conference this year, and with the assistance of the judicial and well-informed counsels of the special representative from Australia already named, we trust a satisfactory solution of financial problems and an equitable adjustment of the various interests concerned have been arrived at, both to the brethren in the Colonies and to our churches at home. The desire of the Conference has certainly been to treat our Australian Colonies and churches in a uniform, equitable and brotherly manner. And as they go out from us, and their names drop from our list, we gladly recognise that they will remain with us in heart and service.

We also sincerely pray that God may prosper them richly in the manner He chooses, to the great end to which they are called—the salvation of mankind; and that the United Methodism of Australia may be specifically a power to evangelise and mould the character and destiny of the great Australian continent after the Christian type, as set forth in a living Methodism.

In the review of the churches, their condition and work during the past year, the death-roll—not perhaps proportionately larger than usual—was found to embrace distinguished names and heroic workers. Between two and three thousand from our ranks have changed toil for rest and mortality for life. Among those are fourteen ministers, including such men as Maurice Nicholas, George Warner, George Watts, of Colonial distinction, and Dr. Joseph Wood. The last-named died during the sittings of Conference, and in respect for the character and work of so distinguished a minister the assembly adjourned to attend his funeral. It was an impressive gathering in Flottergate Chapel, Grimsby, where the funeral service was conducted. Gratitude and sadness mingled in the feelings of the great assembly, that God had given the Church such a servant, that He had enabled him to do such a day's work, and that now, though he was no longer with us, there was assurance he was with the Lord at home and at rest. On the list of deceased ministers, some had attained an advanced age, and were in touch with our Church in the earlier stages of its labours and sufferings. They were among the pioneers in the work. One minister, through premature weakness and much suffering, was called hence in his prime. But all were devoted men; not alike gifted as workmen, but all consecrated to the work, all endowed with the Holy Ghost, saintly in spirit, abundant in labours—all deeply sharing the Saviour's compassion for men, and earnestly striving with Him in toil and sacrifice to bring them to the birthright of the heavenly kingdom. Death to those men was not death—no going out into darkness. It was victory. It was entrance into fuller life. It was the coming of the "Son of Man" to receive to Himself His own, that where He is there they may be also.

The reports to Conference from the several Districts, Institutions, Colleges and Funds of the Connexion were all of an encouraging character. Progress and successful work were the signs in all departments. There was no pessimism. Regrets that not more had been accomplished were imbued with hope and tempered with confidence and determination. The complaints which were forwarded to Conference were both limited and local, and could not be regarded as of a grave nature. They involved nothing vital—neither doctrine nor moral character. They were mostly of a business nature, concerned with boundaries, matters of judgment, and methods of working. The Conference, therefore, found abundant reason for recording its devout thankfulness to Almighty God for the measure of prosperity the Connexion has enjoyed during the past year. After filling up in its membership the vacancies occasioned by deaths, removals and resignations, it was able to report an increase of 1,748. It was wished this increase had been manifold in its number, and in a great Church like ours it might have been more. Is not this the great end for which we exist—to save men to Christ, for the spiritual regeneration of the world? We cannot, therefore, lose sight of this end, nor allow any lower aim to substitute it.

A movement of spiritual aggression, initiated by one of the districts, was approved by the Conference, that next year should be one of re-consecration to God. How better could we as a Church close the century of our birth and growth and prepare ourselves for the new century? It is suggested that the September Quarterly Meetings should arrange for a week of prayer, with suitable services, to bring home to our people the need and importance of personal consecration, the efficacy of prayer, the potentiality of faith, the offices and work of the Holy Spirit, and to awaken a great alertness to the need of a revival of God's work. The motto for Sunday School teachers should be, "My class for Christ." Leaders, preachers, and all should more definitely look for and expect the salvation of sinners. A movement of this order throughout our Zion surely may be realised. Why not? What a glorious crown to the century it would be for our Church! Are we willing in the day of God's power? Let the spirit of our fathers reassert itself. Do we not need something to counteract the secularising spirit in our churches, the worldly excitements amid which we live, and the powerful mammonism of the day? We have it here, in an intenser spirituality and a more aggressive attitude against the strongholds of sin.

Two new features characterised the Conference this year, and we trust marked an era in the widening life and power of the Connexion. The first lady delegate sat in the Conference, also the first native African minister, as representing our African missions. Let us hope the one is significant of the awakening and growing womanhood in our Church, and the other of the drawing nearer of Africa to Christ and to the brotherhood of Christian men. The Rev. John Msikinya, from Aliwal North, received a cordial welcome, the joy of which was increased by the fact that his presence was associated with a successful missionary year. The missionary day at the Conference was full of blessing, impetus, and hope. There is a feeling to do more for the heathen world than we are doing, while we maintain a vigorous policy in regard to the great centres of population at home. It was found that our Heavenly Father had mercifully spared us the pain of loss through death on the foreign field during the year. Fevers and other ailments incidental to the African climate, with many hardships, had been suffered; but the missionaries were at their posts, or completing changes made, and the work prospered. Africa shows increasing congregations to hear the Word, growth in membership, and continued development in education and industrial work among the natives. The Home Missions likewise showed, that while seven mission stations had been made into self-supporting circuits, the membership had increased on the year. The Clapton and Whitechapel Missions maintain their invaluable work in London slums, and we earnestly commend the Rev. T. Jackson's work, with that of the Rev. J. Flanagan, to the loyal and generous support of all our people. While the Conference was pleased to learn that there is a steadily growing revenue from ordinary sources to both the General and African Missionary Funds, still it is convinced that the growing wealth of our Church warrants the expectation of a much larger income both for Home evangelisation and Foreign Mission work, and calls upon our people to prayerfully and sympathetically consider the matter.

The present year completes the first quarter of a century of our Sunday School Union organisation, which organisation has been of immense value. It has brought our Sunday Schools into line, promoted their extension, unified them, given them system in working, tabulated results more completely, brought stimulus everywhere, by the impulse of its meetings and the distribution of facts and the knowledge of experience. And we are glad to note that this, its twenty-fifth year, reveals expansion and growing interest in all departments of Sunday School work. Thirty-six Sunday Schools have been opened in new places during the year in the Home Districts. There has also been an increase of 2,878 scholars, fifty-five teachers at home, and ten in Africa. Above these in importance is the fact that 9,601 scholars have become members of the Church. It is hoped all the Sunday Schools will celebrate the silver anniversary of the Sunday School Union, and mark the event by special evangelistic services for the children in connection with the special Sabbath for Sunday Schools in October next. Their aim should be for each school to add to its list of scholars and teachers from the world, to perfect its system of working, and to do all possible to bring the children into union with the Saviour and the Church. The schools should unite with the societies in the before-named movement of spiritual aggression, and together, enveloped as in a flame of life, their power would be irresistible.

As an evidence of the interest of the Conference in the Christian Endeavour Movement in the Connexion, the rules regulating those societies, through a long and late sitting, were thoroughly overhauled and revised. There was a marked desire to perfect the adaptation of this movement to the genius and constitution of our Church; and at the same time do away with any friction arising from its working with the National Union of the Christian Endeavour Organisation. We trust the revision of the Pledge and other matters will result in a response from all interested in our Christian Endeavour Societies which will widen the service and influence of these societies, as well as deepen their loyalty to their own Church. With present opportunities, frankness and a loyal adherence to the motto, these societies under the blessing of God may make for themselves a splendid record of service. It is interesting to note that we have now 1,042 Christian Endeavour Societies, with over 35,000 Active and Associate members.

While giving thought for the young and promising life of the Church, the Conference did not forget the invaluable and well-tried staff of local preachers, many of whom are advanced in years, and some find themselves in trying circumstances. It was a gratification to know that the "Necessitous Local Preachers' Fund" had been able to render assistance in some needy cases. We could wish we were in a position as a Church to place all our humbler brethren beyond the possibility of want in old age. With the view of making the local preachers' work easier and more efficient, a true friend of theirs was again in evidence at the Conference. In addition to books offered to local preachers last year, the Conference gratefully accepted an offer from Mrs. W. P. Hartley of £1,000 for the establishment of libraries in circuits for local preachers. An opportunity of this nature should stimulate our country circuits especially, where good books are the least accessible, to found local preachers' libraries. It should also promote reading, and help to make our pulpits both more attractive and useful.

The reports of our Colleges are favourable to sound culture and useful equipment for life's work. The Theological College, Manchester, being now complete, promises a career of valuable service to our future ministry. It emphasises the subjects which are of first importance to a minister of the Word, whilst it has regard to the theory and practice of preaching, and the needs of the specific ministry of Primitive Methodism. As young men of the right stamp are of vital importance to the ministry of the Church, we pray that grace may accompany training, and that a race of men may be given to our churches who will not need to be ashamed. Let our circuits look out, and carefully select, the men most fit. For a college can mould and sharpen, but it cannot create. In this connection a striking feature of our church-life is the supply for the ministry. Sixty candidates were recommended by the circuits this year. We rejoice in the abundance of young men moved by God's Spirit to offer themselves. It is a healthy sign. Seven of them attained a place on the Reserve List, while fifteen were found suitable to enter the College. The Elmfield and Bourne Colleges for boys both record a good year's work. Both have been increasing their educational facilities, and both take a prominent position on the list of the educational institutions of the country.

The Book Establishment continues to prosper and to extend its business each succeeding year. Its sales last year were £906 ahead of any previous year. By its profits, the Book Room contributes largely to the support of the Superannuated Ministers, Widows, and Orphans' Fund. But its chief benefit is neither as a business nor a benevolent institution. Its primary service is that of a light-bringer to the Church; and let us hope the continued extension of its business means more or less improved mental tastes, quickened thought, and growing intelligence among our people. The magazine circulation has for some time been a matter of anxiety to the Book Committee. This year manifests an encouraging increase in our leading serials. As the tide has turned, and our people are more widely realising the high character and value of our magazines, even when compared with others in the market, we trust they will more steadily support our own publications. The new Sunday School Hymnal will soon be ready, and we are told by competent authority that it will be the best and finest of the kind published. As such, it will make a fit companion to our splendid Congregational Hymnal.

The Book Establishment has begun to build up a literature of its own. Some of our ministers are not only developing talent, but finding opportunity for literary productions. Also, the Hartley Lecture annually, by the leading men in the Connexion, must result in thoughtful and useful additions to our book-list. We bespeak the attention and support of our leaders and officials, as an aid in their spiritual work, to bring the Book Room publications more extensively before the minds of the members of our congregations and Sunday School teachers.

The working of Connexional trusts and properties during the year has been equally successful with other departments of our work. Indeed, chapel debts, it has been said, are going down at an "alarming rate." We are favoured with certain financial organisations, which have now reached a condition of growth and stability in the confidence of the Church, that they are telling powerfully in reducing our trust debts. The Chapel Aid Association began in a modest way nine years ago; it has now a loan account with our chapels to the amount of £216, 323 1s. 11d. And by proportionate repayments during the year on these loans debts have been reduced £16,188 14s. 9d. The General Chapel Fund has been the means of reducing debts during the same period to the amount of £10,765. The Insurance Company has also aided similar reductions to the extent of £1,616 13s. 8d. A total of £58,955 2s. 9d. has been paid off chapel debts. Our total value in property is £3,966, 325 4s., with a present debt of £1,066,219 5s. 2d. If we can discharge our liabilities at the rate of about £60,000 a year, we have reason to be thankful and face the future with confidence on the score of trust debts.

The Orphanage appears to be doing well, both in work among its destitute charges and in winning for itself a warm place in the Connexion's sympathy. It was a source of joy to the Conference to be able to announce the completion of the Jubilee Fund. It is the first great financial effort our Church has attempted, and we shall gain more from it by far than the amount of money into our funds. The joy of being generous is a great joy, and belongs, not to the joy which goeth before, but to that which cometh after—the joy of something done, the joy of review and of quiet days.

Now, while we rejoice in the progress recorded, yet the work done does not mean that that which remains is the less. The world grows as it moves, so does our work. The gain of the past is simply a vantage ground for the future. As such let us use it. The battle with sin thickens as it develops, and that is our battle in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Our direct and unceasing mission as a Church is to save men to Christ. But do not let us narrow our outlook. Salvation comes to men in many ways. The Conference expressed its alarm at the growth of Romish doctrines and practices within the Established Church of England, and the ostentatious repudiation of Protestantism by many of the State-appointed clergy. The true Church of Jesus Christ, as we conceive it, is neither a Papacy nor an ecclesiastical State Agent. Our duty, therefore, is to resist both these, and throw all our influence in favour of disestablishment of the Church from the State, not only on principle, but as a remedy against the Romanising tendencies of the Established Church. Then there is the Elementary Education Question. The growing importance of this question, for various reasons, demands the careful attention of all Nonconformists, both as to its character and management. Voluntary schools in management are more and more coming into the hands of clergymen who seek to use them, not only for their own sectarian purposes, while they are supported out of public money; but as instruments against dissenters, and to promote the dogmas and ecclesiastical assumptions of a church utterly alien to our Protestant Faith. The day-school system of the country requires to be established on a more equitable basis, in which all schools shall have equal liberties, equal opportunities, be supported alike by public money, and managed on one principle, by duly elected public bodies. The School Board system is capable of meeting the needs in this matter, and ought to be extended, with enlarged areas, to meet the needs of all, and check party domination. The Conference on this question calls upon our people to interest themselves more in it, and assist by reporting to their several District authorities certified information of cases where disability has been imposed, or injustice done by school managers or teachers to any of our children, young people, or their parents, because they are Methodists or because they desire to enter the teaching profession. There is also the great Temperance Reform. We have a part on this question, let us maintain it, and be neither slack nor weak in support of legislative and other measures which aim to wrest the country from the monopoly of the brewing interest, or to check and restrict in any manner the growing evils of drunkenness. We cannot blind our eyes nor be indifferent to the other crying evils of the day, arising from morbid excitement and greed.

Our methods of work must be constructive. The radical principle of church-work is not to destroy but to transform, not simply to make a failure, but to fulfil. Because of the spirituality of her mission, the church's first duty is to remember that men can only be at their best in other things as they become spiritual and godly. To promote godliness throughout the land is therefore our chief aim. To this end then let us faithfully and with living freshness preach the Gospel, for nothing else can do its work. Let us cultivate a wider and more systematic visitation of the people, with the object of getting more into touch with them. Let us seek among ourselves greater coherency and church-loyalty. Let us be watchful to minister more widely to the aged and needy in our congregations. Also let us think more for our young people—how to help and attract them into the Church. Be more sympathetic, definite, and clear in our counsels to them, and in our guidance. Vagueness or evasion on amusements and other questions, which trouble young minds, injures rather than helps; it also weakens the authority of seniors and leaders, and loses for them the young people's respect. On things questionable and which defile let us speak out with no uncertain sound, but on matters of opinion let us exercise tolerance and charity.

The question of the Union of our Church with that of the Bible Christians is to be submitted to the circuits and districts during the coming year for their consideration. A matter so important, not only to the churches concerned, but to the spirit of unity between all churches, we trust will be dealt with calmly and without prejudice, and that God will guide your deliberations. As the Holy Ghost was the hidden Counsellor, the unseen might and power of our Fathers, so may He be ours, in all things.

Connexional Biography.

REV. MAURICE NICHOLAS.

THE REV. M. Nicholas was born April 20, 1835, in the small but beautifully situated town of Bishop's Castle, seated on the River Clun, in the county of Salop. In the ancient times when men had not their being, the waves of an ancient and passing sea made mournful music among the terraced hills which to-day make the background of a not-to-be-forgotten scene. Our fathers in entering into this town suffered much. The people generally were hostile, and the zealots for the established faith were "exceeding mad" against them; the persecution was painful and shameful, but our sainted brother was born into an environment, and breathed an atmosphere helpful to spiritual illumination and moral vigour. His father, who was a builder, lost his sight by an accident, but like Milton, he saw the invisible with a clearer vision. He was a man of God, and consciously knew His life. In the early days of his manhood he travelled miles in his circuit, which stretched into different counties, to preach the Gospel of the grace of God. When educationally able, Maurice used to accompany his father as guide and to give out the hymns and read the lessons—these long, quiet walks were religious college sessions to the lad, who subsequently became an ambassador for Christ. Very early in life Maurice felt the convicting power of the Holy Spirit. His young mind was stirred by many thoughts which went to God in spiritual longings. It was not, however, till he was eighteen that he yielded himself to Christ. His convictions were deep and his heart-grief practical. The clouds that came down on his soul were dark and portentous. The text preached from that brought him to turn his back on sin and the world was, "How wilt thou do in the swellings of Jordan?" He seemed to feel the waves, and yet the devil, so cruel, plied him with the temptation, "that he was too late, and his chance had gone." In his agony of soul he told his father, and asked his prayers, and his mental and moral struggles became specific and finally effective. "I took hold of the cleansing blood," "my faith grew stronger," "I rolled my guilty soul on Him," "I believed He saved me," "my chains fell off, my guilt was removed, sweet peace filled my soul." "And before I left that spot I made an entire consecration of my all to God, promising Him that my life, yea, my all, should be spent in his service." "He at once joined the Church, and began to publish the good tidings of great joy to others." In this divine life he perceptibly grew. The precious Word was his vade mecum, and his secret chamber, or out in the quiet nooks, so plentiful in that neighbourhood, served as a constant sanctuary. The class meeting was his Mount of Transfiguration—it was here he learned to listen to the voice of God. He occasionally led class, and thus revealed a power and an aptitude that brought him a wider commission and a greater sphere. As a local preacher he was zealous and conscientious, and many were the "sheaves he brought home with rejoicing." By an unerring Providence he was brought to dear old Darlaston Circuit, where in two years and a half he led many souls to Christ as their saving Lord. This wide and important circuit was his college. "Here," to use his own words, "he learnt much that was helpful in after days." It was in 1856 that the Ludlow Circuit called him into the public ministry of the Word, and the following year the Conference placed him on its list of ministers, and for some forty-two years his name has stood representative of an earnest and effective ministry. At his "ordination" he said with a noticeable emphasis, "I intend to live to God, to consecrate all my powers to the Most High." He loved the mother District—Tunstall—and forty years out of the forty-two he spent in the circuits of its limit. We can see his portly form, and still catch the lingering tones of his sonorous voice. We loved him. It was in 1866 the General Missionary Committee called him to go to Africa and open a mission in Natal. In his reply to the call, he expresses his earnest prayer for the salvation of that vast continent which in early Christian times saw the rising of "the Sun of Righteousness." He adds: "Having secured very important information from some Wesleyan ministers who had spent many years in that country, and feeling that the Connexion had a claim upon him at home or abroad, he was disposed to place himself in their hands to go to Africa or anywhere else." Mrs. Nicholas, the mother of the abiding children, not being too strong, held back, and so our friend remained to complete his ministry in his own country and among his own people. Our friend was Connexionally loyal. The Conference of the Church and its constitution were more than a name, or a passive mode of existence—they were a power of defence and an expression of grace and good-will to the obedient. He was an ecclesiastical democrat. He was not born to wealth and acres numerous and wide. In his own town, and in South Staffordshire, he laboured for daily bread. By early labour and sacrifice he learned to sympathise with men whose burdens he knew, and of whose daily trials and temptations he was not ignorant. His long life was not faultless—whose is? He had weaknesses as all finite beings have, but ever down deep in his heart the flame of God was burning for the glory of Him whose he was and whom he earnestly, indeed, enthusiastically, sought to serve. The Rev. J. Huff, who was his superintendent in the Ministerley Circuit, says: "I found him in all respects an excellent young man. He was always wishful to do the right, and I have no doubt my old friend and brother was faithful unto death, and has received the crown of life."

The Rev. C. Smallman says: "He was earnest, intelligent, energetic, an arousing preacher, and a plodding and successful worker in the Master's vineyard."

The District Committee of his district placed on record its "high appreciation of his Christian character, and earnest and successful ministerial life. His venerable appearance, his commanding voice, his strong faith in God, and his deep piety rendered him eminently successful . . . in the conversion of sinners to God."

His educational advantages were not equal to those within the reach of the young people of our Churches to-day, and yet he had advantages over some. He went to the best school in the town called Wright's Charity. This was the only school he attended till, when twelve years of age, he entered the abiding school of responsible life and daily discipline. His studies after his call to the public ministry were not specifically scientific, philosophic, or linguistic, but like a wise man, he sought to know the Gospel he was called by God to preach to men in darkness and without hope. He did not spare himself in serving his Master and those for whom that Master gave His life. He rendered his body a living sacrifice unto God, and his mind to be used according to His will. Who among us who have heard him can forget his prayers, his special camp-meeting sermons, or his addresses in the market-places at District meetings? These places were his special battle-ground; he liked the Lord's big "chapel," and his splendid voice, like travelling bells, was heard in the distant streets.

He was married Sept. 29, 1860, to Mary Steel, who lived as his life-companion and helpmeet for fifteen years, and gave him four children, who have been his honour and joy, and three of them live to remind us of him who has gone into the invisible. Maurice John has been the Second Master of Bourne College, Birmingham, for years, and is a worthy son; and Mary Elizabeth, who lingers to link her brothers with tender links, and William Henry, who is a minister of our Church. May their father's departure bring them to closer fellowship with our Father who is in heaven. Our friend was married to Mary Whitelegg in 1877, who left him, by death, on December 15, 1890, so that for eight years he was wifeless. He said in his first class meeting, "I mean going all the way." All the way he has gone, and the goal is won. His early companions have met him in more than laurels crowned. In 1898, some of his friends saw that the strong house of his soul-tabernacle was giving way. He looked for years of a well-earned rest and occasional toil, according to his strength, and then at last a quiet sail into the harbour. His Pilot, however, saw the immortal shore, and so with happy and assuring testimony he sailed to be with Christ, which is far better, on Sunday, February 19, 1899, at 4.30. a.m., in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

J. FERGUSON.

MR. MATTHEW SMITH.

MATTHEW SMITH, the subject of this memoir, was born at Craighurn Kingswater, Cumberland, July 12, 1826, and died April 13, 1897, at South Shields.

Matthew was the third son of John Smith, who for many years was a local preacher in connection with the Temple Town Society, South Shields. What he lacked educationally he gained in a deepened spirituality and a supreme passion for saving men. Possessed of keen observational powers, and a ready utterance, he could apply the fundamental truths of Christianity with great effectiveness.

By a boiler explosion in the alkali manufactory of Messrs. Cookson and Co., South Shields, on the morning of January 12, 1842, John Smith, and other two members of our Temple Town Society, lost their lives. A few minutes before the accident happened, a man, passing with a barrow, cried, "Smith, how are you getting on now?" Smith instantly replied, "I am getting on the good old way." And as one of our class-leaders was assisting to carry him home, he said, "Glory be to God, I am happy." He was a man of unquestionable piety, and held in great repute.

The widow was left with a large family, all young in years. She was a woman of kindly disposition and Christly spirit. The struggle to provide bread for her fatherless children was very keen, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the lean wolf of hunger was kept from the door.

Young Matthew Smith, with his resolute, hopeful nature, went to work to help his mother in the struggle for bread. From early morning till evening he cheerfully toiled, and was amply repaid by the smile of the mother he loved. At the age of fourteen years he was apprenticed to be a cooper at the Jarrow Chemical Works, and by constant and strict attention to business, this bright boy rose to the position of manager in that department of business. His opportunities for gaining an education were of a very meagre character, but by diligent study and a judicious utilisation of his evenings, he gained considerable knowledge. He could both speak and write with a fluency and accuracy that revealed no mean acquaintance with grammar, history, geography and theology.

His religious life began at the age of sixteen years. He was undoubtedly impressed with a father's earnestness, and a mother's saintly life. The circumstances associated with his conversion to the Christian faith are both unique and suggestive. He realised definite good at the public meeting on the New Year's Day, following the annual tea meeting. Does not this circumstance speak volumes as to the character of this meeting? Fifty years ago addresses delivered after tea meetings were marked by spirituality and earnest purpose. We should do well to go back to the old spirit and fervour of those tea meetings where souls were convicted and saved. On the Sunday evening following this event, the father, referring to the conversion of his son, declared that he believed God would save all his household. And then he sang (as only an old Temple Town veteran could sing), the hymn whose chorus is, "A better day is coming," etc., and when he came to the words,

"We will meet the saints in glory,
And we will have a shout in glory," loud hallelujahs went up from rejoicing hearts. Although he did not live to see the work of God, yet his three sons and daughter were all brought to the Saviour.

Matthew was married in the year 1848, to Elizabeth Dodds Brown. During their forty-nine years of wedded life, they had their experience of sorrow and bereavement, incident to human experience. But over all their experiences was the light of the great Father's love and care. May that Divine light continue to shine across the pathway of the sorrowing widow bereft of her companion and the four remaining daughters who mourn the loss of an affectionate and loving father.

In respect to his work as a Christian man, he was intensely active, without being unduly self-assertive. His earnestness was of a quiet and unobtrusive character, but at the same time it evinced manly independency of thought and action. He taught a class in the Sunday School for close upon half a century, and held, on occasions, the highest positions that fellow-workers could honour him with.

As a Temperance worker he was well known in the borough and district. In the Band of Hope and Temperance Societies he freely gave his time, his energies and his talents.

After his day's work he would often be found with his friend John Davidson addressing a temperance meeting either at the Central Hall, South Shields, or Saville Street, North Shields, or Percy Main, Cullercoats, Jarrow, or at the Trimmers' Cabin at Tyne Dock.

He was one of the first to form the Ebenezer division of the Sons of Temperance in South Shields. He was also a trustee of the local division, and Master of the Grand Division, of the Sons of Temperance, Newcastle. Eternity alone will reveal the results of such activity extending over more than forty years.

As a local preacher he was well known in Primitive Methodist circles. He came on the plan during the superintendency of the late Rev. Thos. Butterwick, an eloquent preacher and famous for his wit and humour. It would appear Brother Smith and his friend John Davidson took lessons in grammar and logic at the house of Mr. Yates, the second minister, under whose tuition they made considerable progress. As a preacher Brother Smith's discourses gave evidence of careful preparation. He never gave what cost nothing. He gave his best, and that best was appreciated in town and country chapels. His labours were not in vain. Under his sweet and spiritual ministry many a troubled heart was comforted, many a soul was brought up to the higher levels of Christian experience, and many a soul in moral darkness was brought into the light of God.

His record is on high. But his work is finished. In 1892 he was stricken down while at Gilsland with an illness that eventually proved fatal. During his long and severe illness he was never heard to complain. I can bear personal testimony to his cheerfulness of disposition, and his profound faith in God. He was quite conscious up to the last moments, and he spoke of death as going home. He lived the life of a true man of God, and in his last hours there were no regrets; a light shone, a light brighter than the stars, brighter than the moon, brighter than the sun, it was the light of the glory of God to guide and companion the pilgrim home.

Were I to briefly estimate the character of the late Matthew Smith, after a personal acquaintance extending over fifteen years of my ministerial life, in one word, I should say he was a Christian gentleman. Nature, experience gained by reading, observation, and contact with all sorts and conditions of men, and Divine grace, gave to him that very important quality which we know under the name of good breeding, the very essence of which lies in an unselfish spirit. His candour, his charity, his courtesy, his conciliatory spirit, his tender consideration for others, speak of a life that was regulated by Divine forces, and in whom dwelt the spirit of the Nazarene.

He was a man of courage. I do not refer to mere physical courage. Men who are nothing but a mass of animalism can boast of possessing that—I refer to the courage of principle, of conviction, of conscience,—the courage to say and do irrespective of popular opinion. He was a force in our midst. He belonged to a race of men that are fast dying out, and God alone knows whether we shall ever see the like of them again in this world.

I am sustained in this estimate of his character by the testimonies of men of high Christian character and good understanding.

John Brack writes: "I have known the late Matt. Smith for forty years. I have been intimately associated with him in Christian service for thirty-three years. He was a good man, a sincere friend, a loyal servant of Jesus Christ, whom to know was to love."

John Walker Owen writes: "I have known the late M. Smith from boyhood. I can speak from personal observation respecting his character and work. Many are enjoying religion to-day as the results of his labours. He was a man of deep convictions, and had the courage of his convictions. He loved Methodism and Laygate Society best of all. The Church in him has lost a sincere friend and devoted worker."

John Davidson writes: "We were like David and Jonathan, we worked hand in hand together. In Band of Hope, in Sunday School, in Temperance Societies and as local preachers. We were inseparable for close upon fifty years. He was industrious, conscientious, and deeply pious. A man of God, he has gone to swell the ranks of the redeemed."

MR. EDWARD CAIN.

EDWARD CAIN, the subject of this memoir, was born at Hunwick, in the county of Durham, on Jan. 6, 1846, and died after a short illness on March 22, 1897, at Eighton Banks, near Gateshead. He was the eldest son of Daniel and Isabella Cain, who were people of good moral and religious character, who set a good example before their children, and endeavoured to bring them up in the fear of God. When six years of age, young Edward attended the Primitive Methodist Sunday School at Trimdon Grange, and at this early age received impressions of a deep and lasting character. At this period of his boyhood days, it would appear that there were a great many fluctuations and changes affecting the industrial and working classes in the county of Durham. And the parents of Edward Cain, like many families in the mining districts, were compelled to move from one mining centre to another in search of more lucrative and permanent employment till 1859, when they settled at Wrekenton.

Brother Cain's conversion to the Christian faith dates from 1864. During a gracious revival in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Ousten, under the evangel proclaimed by the Rev. Wm. Gelley, he decided for Christ and realised a spiritual change.

Almost simultaneously with this experience, which constituted the great crisis in his history, he was possessed of an ardent desire for the acquisition of knowledge. He became a student of one book, and that book was the Bible. His education was very deficient, but possessing a mere rudimentary knowledge of reading and writing, he set himself to learn the things of God. In his endeavours he was animated by the laudable motive to qualify himself for the work of a Sunday School teacher. For hours together, with his friend G. Heslop, they read the New Testament, and sought to understand its meaning. His leisure hours were devoted to this pursuit. He was emphatically a man of one book.

His special gift was that of song. This was a feature in his Temperance work for which he was distinguished. He was in great request in the churches, and rendered most excellent and valuable service by his sweet and inspiring singing. Graciously he travelled great distances, both in Northumberland and Durham, regardless of weather, in order that he might help on the cause of righteousness, and thus bring blessing to his fellow-man.

According to the loving testimony of his most intimate friend, Ralph Maughan: As a young man his life was one of singular purity and freedom from any habits that tended to grossness and animalism. He had all the attractiveness of an amiable, generous-hearted young fellow, whose gracious presence was the charm of his friends. His speech was clear; his path honourable; his testimony sincere and abiding. He shunned the society of evil men, and sought the companionship of godly men. He was a man of bright, sunny disposition, always looking on the favourable side of things; he had learnt the secret of true contentment and happiness. His life was marked by beautiful simplicity and manly charity. In him there dwelt the spirit of the Christ, and his character was fashioned after the Divine image.

In 1871, he was united in marriage to Miss Ann Watson, the eldest daughter of Peter and Ann Watson, of the Mount, Eighton Banks, with whom he lived in harmony and domestic bliss for twenty-six years. An aged mother, a widowed wife, and two sons and a daughter mourn the loss of a kind son, a loving husband and an affectionate father.

His end was peace. His record is on high. He has entered into rest. For him the night has passed and the day has dawned.

J. Hutchinson writes: "I have known Edward Cain for many years, and always found him a consistent member of Christ's Church. He took great interest in the Sunday School and Band of Hope. He used to say that he was not much of a speaker, but he could sing. He had a good voice, and used it for the glory of God. His testimony for Jesus was most clear and explicit. The class meeting was his favourite means of grace. He was always blithe and cheerful."

G. Heslop writes: "I have known the late Edward Cain for over thirty-three years. I became acquainted with him at Perkinsville. We were both converted in an Evangelistic Mission at Ousten, conducted by Rev. W. Gelley. Prior to this, we both attended the Sunday School, and were very close companions. He was a genuine friend, a thorough Christian, an energetic worker in the cause of God, and a man whom to know was to love and revere."

Brother W. J. Nixon writes: "I am instructed by the teachers and friends of the Primitive Methodist Sabbath School, Eighton Banks, to convey to you and the family, our sincere Christian sympathy in this, the hour of your bereavement. We pray that the Great Father will sustain you by His Spirit and grace. Yours is the loss of a kind and indulgent husband, theirs of a loving father, ours of a sincere friend and brother. Be it ours to follow him as he followed Christ. May we all meet at last."

Literary Notices.

A Dictionary of the Bible, Dealing with the Language, Literature and Contents, including the Biblical Theology. Edited by JAMES HASTINGS, M.A., D.D. Vol. II. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 38, George Street.

THE second volume of this great work is of even more importance and value than the first, if for no other reason than that so many subjects of prime importance naturally fall into this volume, extending as it does, from "Feign" to "Kinswoman." The Editor has had the collaboration of many of the most eminent living scholars in Great Britain and America, and of some, alas, who are no longer living, such as Principal Reynolds, who has written on the Gospel of St. John, and Dr. A. B. Bruce, who has dealt with the Epistle to the Hebrews. It would be quite impossible, even did we possess the requisite qualifications for the task, to attempt a review of a work of this character in the limited space at our disposal. Suffice it to say there could easily be picked out half-a-dozen articles which alone are worth the price of the volume, and for the sake of which the earnest student might very properly be glad to deny himself some luxuries in order to obtain the coveted volume. We might instance Professor Sanday's articles on "God," and "Jesus Christ," (which occupies some fifty closely-printed double-column pages). Who would not like to have the opportunity of reading and re-reading what Professor Orr has to say on The Kingdom of God; or Professor A. B. Davidson on Job; or Dr. G. A. Smith on Isaiah; or Professor Swete on The Holy Spirit?

WE are glad that the son and literary executor of the late Dr. Dale has given us these Essays and Addresses in a collected form. They were worthy of republication, since in them we see at their best those intellectual and spiritual qualities which made Dr. Dale one of the chiefs of Nonconformity. We have the plain evidences of his masculine and penetrative intellect, his wonderful mastery of detail, his firm grasp of principle, deep spirituality of temper, tending even to mysticism, and his clearness and beauty of style. Why is Dr. Dale so much easier to read than Dr. Fairbairn? We do not stay to answer our own question, but are convinced by experience there is ground to raise the question. The first and second Addresses—"Christ and the Controversies of Christendom," and "The Holy Spirit in relation to the Ministry, the Worship and Work of the Church," were delivered by Dr. Dale as President of the Congregational Union. The third, fourth and fifth Essays relate especially to Congregationalism and its interpretation of the idea of the Church. The next Essay on "Matthew Arnold and the Nonconformists," appeared originally in the Contemporary Review, July, 1870. In this Essay, which to our thinking is the finest thing in the book, there is some delightful sword-play; and Matthew Arnold might well feel that because of it he owed Dale a grudge, for he certainly came off second best in the encounter. The last Essay is on "The Doctrine of the Real Presence and the Lord's Supper." This Essay is one of the longest and most important in the book, and deserves careful study. An able summary of it will be found in the September Springtime, by the Rev. J. D. Thompson, to which we would direct the attention of our readers who have not access to Dr. Dale's book.

Essays and Addresses. By R. W. DALE, LL.D. (6s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

More Methodist Idylls. By HARRY LINDSAY. (6s.) James Bowden, 10, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

WE began this book with the settled determination to read only a few Idylls at a time. After we had taken a spell at another, and different kind of book, we would return to our task. But we are free to confess that, hardened reader and reviewer of Idylls though we be, our determination gave way. The "Transformation of John F. Wilson" did not take strong hold of us. It seemed overcharged with sentiment; its motif—the conversion of aliens into naturalised citizens—seemed overdone. A couple from a distant Northern city stoutly resist being assimilated to their Welsh environment; but in vain. They began by feeling strangers in a strange land; they end by saying, "This people shall be my people, and their God my God." All this is legitimate enough: but when we read, "And now he was stricken dumb with the painful truth revealed to him, and overwhelmed as a man in deep waters," we naturally expected that something very terrible had happened to John F. Wilson. We found, however, that it was nothing worse than the discovery that an attachment had sprung up between Maggie, his daughter, and a respectable and godly native of Avonlwyd. This was disappointing; but when we read "Measure for Measure," and especially, "The Tragedy of an Infatuation," the book gripped us. Finally the reading of "Marred in the Making" made us wish that there were still "More Methodist Idylls" to read.

The Black Douglas. By S. R. CROCKETT. (6s.) Smith, Elder and Co., 13, Waterloo Place, London.

A STIRRING romance of olden times, full of colour and action. Incident follows incident in quick succession. Through the glamour of romance we see feudal lords, fair ladies, gay tournaments, superstitious rites, and the glint of arms, while pervading the whole is the smell of heather and the sound of the sea. The tender love-story of Sholto, the redoubtable esquire of the Black Douglas, and pretty wilful Maud Lindsay runs like a thread of gold through the narrative of bloodshed and treachery. Mr. Crockett is at home in Galloway, and the scenes he loves and knows so well he peoples with living figures from the middle ages, when James II. held the throne of Scotland, and the Douglasses, better born and more powerful than the king himself, held the South. Around these Douglasses, and especially around William, sixth Earl of Douglas, Lord of Galloway and Duke of Touraine, one of the most romantic figures in Scottish history, the story centres.

Decoyed into the stronghold of his enemies by the woman he loved, at the historic banquet given in his honour, which he attended with no followers but Sholto, his esquire, the fatal black bull, the symbol of death throughout all Scotland, was brought in on a huge silver platter. Thus the enemies of Douglas brought about by treachery what they were unable to bring about by force. Every one who reads of Sholto's memorable ride must feel his pulse stirred, and the blood course quicker through his veins. For three days and nights he rode without sleep, and unconscious of weariness, through villages, across desolate moors, from castle to fortified farm-house, raising to his chief's assistance, the greatest and compactest clan that ever, even in Scotland, did the bidding of one man.

"West and south he had raised the Douglas country as it had never been raised before, and now behind him, every armiger and squire, every spearman and light-foot archer was hasting Edinburghward, eager to be first to succour the young and headstrong chief of his great house." But too late, treachery had done its work, and before a man could reach Edinburgh, the noble young Douglas, for whom every man in Galloway would willingly have died, lay headless in Edinburgh castle-yard. The rest of this story deals with the vengeance of the Douglasses upon the betrayers and murderers of their lord, headed by the Lady Sybilla, whose complex character and history we leave the readers of "The Black Douglas" to study for themselves.

If great was her sin, greater still was her punishment. Malise and his two sturdy sons, Sholto and Laurence, give no little interest to the story. Malise, the master-armourer, and foster-father to the Earl, a strong, loyal, silent man, whose character is fitly summed up by his jealous brother-in-law—"a great ram-stam, unbiddable, unhallowed deevil he is. Guid forbid that I should say as muckle to his face."

While reading the book we feel that we are adding several new and delightful friends to our realm of fiction, and on reaching the end of this fascinating book we take leave of them with lingering regret.

The Life of John Wesley. By JOHN TELFORD, B.A. Revised and Enlarged Edition. (5s.) Wesleyan Methodist Book Room, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

MANY lives of John Wesley have been written—by Churchmen and Dissenters and Methodists; and some of these, like Moore's and Southey's, Tyerman's and Canon Overton's, have, in certain regards their own special value. But it is morally certain that for some considerable time to come, Mr. Telford's will be the recognised authoritative Life of Wesley. This it is entitled to be from its freedom from bias, the careful way in which the mass of available material has been sifted, and the simple charm with which the story of this unique life has been told. The volume has been enriched by three portraits of Wesley, and by the reproduction of facsimile ordination Certificates signed by him. There is also given in the Appendix, the copy of an important document recently unearthed at the Wesleyan Methodist Book Room, in which John Fletcher, Wesley's "designated successor," has given his draft of "A Plan for Methodism," which shows that in 1775 Fletcher was a more daring reformer than Wesley. As Mr. Telford very properly remarks: "High Churchmen who study the list of Wesley's ordinations, will do well to abandon any claim to Wesley."

Free Methodist Manual. Comprising a Statement of the Origin, Doctrines and Constitution of the United Methodist Free Churches; with Alphabetical Arrangements of Ministers and Circuits, Historical and Statistical Accounts of Connexional Institutions, Funds, etc., from 1836 to 1898. By EDWIN ASKEW, Editor. Introductory Chapter by Rev. R. Abercrombie, M.A. (3s. 6d.) Andrew Crombie, 119, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street.

THIS is a very long title, but long as it is, it does not cover the whole of the multifarious contents of the book. So far as our knowledge goes, the Methodist Free Churches are in the proud position of having the completest denominational Handbook in print. The preparation of such a vade mecum must have entailed very considerable labour, and the compilation reflects the greatest credit upon the Editor and his staff. The get-up of the Manual is excellent. It is well printed and contains some capital photo reproductions of portraits and buildings. A pocket in the cover holds a large map, showing the location of the churches of the denomination in London. We trust the time may soon come when the Primitive Methodist Church may have a Handbook as comprehensive and useful.

The City Temple Pulpit. Sermons by the Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D. (3s. 6d. nett.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row.

ONE receives a volume of real live sermons, such as we have here, with a feeling of thankfulness that the famous preacher of the City Temple is still spared to us. Each last gift of the kind becomes more precious when we think that in the natural course of things the volumes still to come from the same hand will not be many. For twenty-five years Dr. Parker has so occupied and used the pulpit of the City Temple as to ennoble the function of preaching; yet with a humility hardly inferior to that of Sir Isaac Newton, he can say: "Five-and-twenty years! and I have not yet begun my exposition; five-and-twenty years! and I am still at Genesis, first chapter, first verse. I have preached upon every text in the Bible, and I have not yet begun to preach at all. So great is the Book, so manifold the ministry, so all-sustaining the Eternal Spirit."

The Calls of God. Devotional Studies. By the REV. EBENEZER MORGAN. (2s.) C. H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road.

MR. MORGAN is to be congratulated on having hit upon the capital idea of considering the various ways in which the Divine call came to men of Old and New Testament times. He is to be congratulated too, on the successful way in which the idea has been worked out. The result is, we have a book of Bible studies that cannot fail to be helpful to the preacher and profitable for devotional purposes.

A South Australian Romance. How a Colony was founded, and a Methodist Church Formed. By REV. JOHN BLACKETT. (2s.) Charles H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road.

WE have here a vivid picture of early Colonial life in South Australia. It seems almost impossible when we look at the fertile and productive Colony of South Australia, with its fine cities, with their magnificent public buildings and their flourishing churches, that little over sixty years ago it was an almost unknown territory. But such is the fact. In 1836, Samuel Stephens was the first colonist to put his foot on South Australian soil, and John White preached the first Methodist sermon there in 1837. Since that time the growth of the Church and Colony has gone on together. Readers of this book will have their eyes opened to many new facts. Mr. Blackett is an Australian Wesleyan minister, and has spared neither time nor labour in making his account of the sixty years' work accurate and full. In order to carry this out, not only old records have been searched, but much ground has been travelled over in order to seek out and interrogate old colonists. Though really a history of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, much will be found in this book to interest Primitive Methodists. Honourable mention is made of the pioneer preachers, Revs. J. Long, J. Wilson and W. Storr, who, though they have gone to their reward, are still remembered by many living to-day.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY PROXY.

THE PRESIDENT'S ILLNESS.

—Regret has been felt throughout the Connexion on account of the illness of the President of the Conference. Not specially robust in physical constitution, it is to be feared that the extraordinary strain of the last three months, combined with his eagerness for work has brought on what, it may be hoped, is only a temporary collapse of strength. The District meetings always bring to the General Committee Secretary a large amount of business, and when to this the duties of the Presidency are added, the position of necessity becomes exceedingly trying. Besides, this year Mr. Goodman has retired from the General Committee Secretaryship, and he had therefore not only to remove to a new house, but to leave the affairs of his office in a condition that would render it easy for his successor to take hold of the business. All these circumstances are in part responsible for what has taken place. The newspapers have reported on the immediate cause of the collapse. Hurrying to the train on his way to the Quarterly Meeting of the General Missionary Committee, which was to be held at Leicester, he was seized with sharp pains at the heart, and at Kettering had to be taken from the train. For the time the attack was not only serious, but dangerous, but by careful nursing and the blessing of God, in about twenty-four hours he began to show signs of improvement, and though the recovery has been slow, with one slight relapse, it has continued, so that good hope now is entertained that he will shortly be restored completely. Meanwhile, it seems desirable to suggest that the churches that have arranged for visits from him must exercise patience and not press too eagerly for his services. It is a calamity, no doubt, that they should be deprived of his presence and help, but it would be a much greater calamity were he to have a serious relapse, and the attack is just of the character that requires care and absolute rest for a time. The greatest sympathy will be felt for the President and Mrs. Goodman, and from all the churches prayers will go up to God that his life may be preserved and his health restored.

REV. JOHN ATKINSON.

—As we write the sad intelligence reaches us that the Rev. John Atkinson has entered into his eternal rest. It is not usual, in this section of the magazine, to make reference to the death of a minister, but there are exceptions to all rules, and it is fitting that in the case of one so distinguished for his gifts and service, a brief word should be written at the present time. In due course the official memoir will appear. Few men have been possessed of the ability of Mr. Atkinson, fewer still have used their ability as freely in the service of the Church. His gifts were so exceedingly varied. His business ability would have enabled him to build up a great commercial establishment; his knowledge of, and interest in, politics, together with his readiness as a writer, would have made him a successful journalist; had he been a member of Parliament he would have won a foremost position as a debater in the House of Commons; a well-informed theologian with a firm grip on the fundamentals of the faith, he nevertheless kept an open mind to the results of modern investigation; and busy man of affairs though he was, he still remained a reader of books, and a diligent student. As a preacher he was logical, earnest, and withal, very convincing; as an administrator, perhaps, taking him all in all, the Connexion has not seen his equal. Altogether he was a man of large proportions, and the loss to the Church caused by his death will prove very serious. Most of all, this loss will be felt in the business courts he was accustomed to attend. It will hardly be denied that on the floor of the Conference, in debate and in counsel, he was easily first. The position was won by various circumstances. It was not simply that his logic was more convincing than that of others. In addition, he impressed his audience with the idea that a far-sighted and absolutely honest man was speaking, one who perceived better than most all the contingencies involved in a given situation, and the course likely to prove safest and most successful, and also that he never argued to gain a personal victory, but only to secure the adoption of what he believed to be a wise policy. We regret, for our own sake, the loss of a dear personal friend, but far more we sorrow over this event because we are convinced that, wanting him, the Church, in its various courts, may make mistakes from which his clear intellect and cogent reasoning might have saved her. And this tribute to a great and good man must not be concluded without a word regarding his capacity for work. Only those who know him best, and have sat beside him for days, have any adequate conception of the amount of work he was able to get off his hands. It was not an uncommon thing for him to work from six in the morning till two or three on the following morning, allowing only short intervals for meals, and this not for a day or two, but day after day, for weeks together. And, almost impossible as it may seem, however long the strain continued, his intellect never flagged, or lost for an hour its clearness of vision. We write from long and intimate knowledge of the man, and are certain there is no exaggeration in applying to him the words, "We shall not look upon his like again." He died from collapse of strength succeeding a virulent attack of influenza. Not easily did his iron frame succumb, but after the fever had left him he was not able to take much food. The end came on Sunday evening, August 6th.

THE SEPTEMBER QUARTERLY MEETINGS.

—The September Quarterly Meetings, which in a few days will be held in all the circuits of the Connexion, are scarcely less important than those held in March. No doubt a special interest is felt in the latter because of the bringing up of the yearly reports for the District Meetings and Conference. But if in March the churches take stock of the result of the year's work, in September it is usual to make arrangements for aggressive work during the approaching winter. May we bespeak, for the sake of the Church we all love, and also in behalf of the interests of the Kingdom of God, a bold and enterprising policy. Whatever may be said in favour of prudent measures, it is the churches that have faith in God, in the cause, and in themselves that are progressive, and whilst the over-prudent are stationary, or, as is even more frequently the case, on the decline in numbers and spiritual power, those who attempt daring things succeed even beyond their highest anticipations. By a careful observation of a large number of circuits in all parts of the country we have arrived at certain definite and strong convictions regarding what is needed to bring back the days of prosperity that were enjoyed in former times. There are circuits to-day, both on the foreign field, such as Aliwal North, and several at home that could be named that are advancing in all respects in a manner that might almost have awakened the envy of the most successful of the fathers, whilst, alas, others are standing still and blaming the conditions,—conditions which it is their business to alter—for their non-success. It is, perhaps, too late to urge an increase in the number of ministers employed, for this year at least, but this is a matter that should be borne in mind against next March. But let the preachers do their best both in pulpit preparation, and when they are in the pulpit. Let their preaching be ethical, as well as very earnest, for no aspect of Gospel truth disturbs men's consciences to the same extent as its ethical aspects. Besides, it is an ascertained historical fact that in every great revival of religion, whether it has been national in its range, or only confined to a section of the Church, or even purely local, the preaching has been largely ethical. Let the churches as a whole, too, realise their mission, and work with this before them as a definite aim, and success will be realised. It is specially pleasing to note that some of the churches have continued their soul-saving work through the summer months, and every week are able to report conversions. The revival at Middlesbrough, which began more than two years ago, is as lively and successful now as when it began. At other places conversions are reported. This kind of success is needed everywhere, and, we believe, might be realised if the churches were equal to their privileges, and had the tact of seizing the occasion. Many of the circuits are welcoming their new ministers. Let them do so in a spirit of loyalty, resolving that they will not be captious and critical, but by a spirit of appreciation, discern the good that is in them, and use it in the interests of the cause of Jesus Christ.

OUR MISSIONARY FIELD.

—At the Quarterly Meeting of the Missionary Committee, held in Leicester at the end of July, it was stated that of the Home Mission Stations, ten reported increases in their membership amounting in the aggregate to twenty-three; sixteen stations reported the same as last quarter; and seven reported a decrease of twenty-eight. This leaves a nett decrease of five as the outcome of the quarter's work, by no means a satisfactory result. No doubt, during the coming winter this decrease will be turned into a substantial increase, but it should be possible to avoid these discouraging reports every quarter. The more prosperous stations are handicapped in this general report by those whose decline is chronic, and in the case of some six or eight of them, it seems a matter of regret that they cannot be given up altogether. Year by year money and labour, which might yield good results elsewhere, are spent upon them without any hope of return.

—Much of the time of the Committee was spent in adjusting the grants so as to meet the requirements of the new rules relating to ministers' salaries. There is ground for fear that the Committee will not be able to make the payments from the Sustentation Fund according to rule unless something is done on the one hand to increase the missionary revenue, and on the other to inspire a spirit of greater independence in the stations. Some £1,600 was voted this year more than last. This is a large amount. It is not more than the Connexion can raise, but it is questionable whether the grants should be made in every case, quite up to the amount asked for. Some of the members of the Committee steadily opposed the line taken, but although from time to time they adduced strong reasons for their action, they were in a minority, and only in a few instances succeeded in getting the proposed grant reduced. Last year was a time of exceptional prosperity, and the missionary income was greater than in any previous year. But the balance in hand in July was only £1,200 more than a year ago, whereas £1,600 more was voted in grants. This leaves a serious deficiency, even should the income be maintained. Most of the stations, it is certain, need all the grant they are getting, but there are others, probably only a small proportion, which, with a little spirit and enthusiasm might do with less.

—The Church of the Saviour, at Birmingham, is proving a great difficulty to the Missionary Committee. Mr. Bage, the present superintendent, has accepted an invitation to another station for next July. We cast no blame on him personally for this, but it is useless denying the fact that these constant changes are not to the advantage of the mission. A committee has been appointed to secure another minister. Their task will not prove easy. What is needed is a man in the prime of life, of proved administrative and preaching ability to superintend the work, who will be on the ground constantly. And, with due deference to those who believe in other methods, such as the employment of Bible women, we venture to suggest it might prove an advantage to employ a second minister who will work as second in charge, and dispense with all other agencies. Not that the kind of agency to be employed is the question of first importance. A strong man at the head of affairs, and earnest plodding work will not fail to build up a strong Church there, whatever other agency may be employed.

—It is too early to speak with confidence regarding what will be the outcome of the action of the Conference in relation to the Edinburgh Station, but it may be named that the reports are encouraging. Rev. S. Horton has had a warm and kindly welcome extended to him, both by the Church and representative ministers of other denominations, and he is hopeful himself of success. Those who know Edinburgh best will share that hope. The station should never have sunk into its present condition. A little tact, and a large amount of devotion and hard work, with average pulpit ability are all that are needed to establish strong Methodist Churches north of the Tweed. There are churches there healthy and prosperous, that have been built up from the ground during the last twenty years, and similar work might be done in the Scottish capital.

—From Banni, on the island of Fernando Po, Mr. Barleycorn reports that the meeting-house is too small, and asks permission to build another. At last, after all these years of labour and anxiety, the missionaries in that heathen land are beginning to gather in the sheaves. Until recently they were regarded with suspicion by the natives at Banni; now, however, the farmers of the surrounding district are beginning to attend the religious services, and are manifesting a friendly spirit to the people at the mission. The signs, at least, are promising. At Aliwal North, even larger increases in the membership are now being reported. It is well known that circumstances have been very much against progress in missionary work in this part of South Africa during the past three years. The rinderpest made the work of the natives on the farms unnecessary, so that they were compelled to leave the district to find employment. This plague was followed by a great drought. Amidst all these disadvantages, however, additions to the membership were made, though on a smaller scale than those to which we had become accustomed. Now these difficulties have disappeared and the missionaries are forging ahead. The work is attracting to it godly men resident in South Africa. The Committee had under its consideration letters from Aliwal North, in which a Mr. Walter Hogg offered himself for an artisan-missionary at Zambesi. Mr. Hogg is a Scotsman, in the prime of life. His wife is dead, and he has sent his children to Scotland to be educated. He is one of those men, true colonists, who can turn themselves to any kind of work. He has been a brickmaker and a fruit grower, and at the present time is a trader or store-keeper. He has been a most useful official on the Aliwal North Station, and in two or three of the recently established churches has been invaluable in superintending the work. The Committee resolved to send certain inquiries to him, and if the answers are satisfactory, he will be sent to help the missionaries in Mashukulumbweland.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

—At a recent meeting of the Connexional Committee on education, it was resolved in the name of the Connexion to join the Liverpool Free Church Council in protesting against the action of the Liverpool School Board in altering the Free Church Catechism, and using it in their schools. To say the least, it is questionable conduct on the part of such a body of men to interfere with the work of another body of men, who, as catechism-makers, are probably as capable as themselves. But as Free Churchmen, we object to all catechisms, including that of the Free Church Council, being taught in the day schools of the nation. The only right teachers of religion to the children are their parents, Sunday School teachers, and other agents of the churches, and such other persons as the parents may choose. This is the simple Free Church position, and with it there must be no trifling. To depart from it in any way will prove highly dangerous. The District Committees are to be asked to do their best to supply accurate and detailed information of cases in which hardship has been suffered through the working of the Education Acts. That there have been such cases no doubt can be entertained, but the sufferers and their friends have hitherto been unwilling to give the necessary information lest they should be even more badly treated. It should be understood, however, that the details required by the Committee need not endanger anyone in this regard. No names, either of persons or places, need be given, all that is required is that other particulars should be forthcoming so that an intelligent narration of facts can be placed before the Government. The Wesleyans have succeeded in obtaining some striking proofs of the hardships endured by some of the members of their community, and a large number of similar instances have occurred among our own people. It is desirable that the evil should be remedied, and the Connexional Committee are certain that a report of particular cases could be presented to the Government without risk to anyone.

CHAPEL BUILDING IN LEICESTER AND ELSEWHERE.

—Some time ago the church worshipping in Nicholas Street sold their chapel and schools. The site was an excellent one for business purposes, but with the removal of the population towards the suburbs it was not well situated as a centre of religious work. New premises have been erected on a corner site in Hinckley. Taking the schools and chapel together they are probably the best suite of premises of which the Connexion can boast. Their outstanding features are usefulness, and a certain modest chasteness and quiet beauty. Nothing has been spent on "loud" decorations. The cost is about £10,000, and the architect, Mr. H. Harper, of Nottingham, as well as the trustees and congregation, is to be congratulated on the completion of the beautiful structure. The church stands in a new neighbourhood that was in need of more church accommodation, so that this may be regarded as a real forward movement. In addition, however, the Primitive Methodists at Leicester bought the whole of the material, stone-work and wood-work, of the old chapel in Nicholas Street, and with it have erected yet a second new chapel in another new part of the town. Thus the change has given them two chapels in place of one, both of them in localities much more suitable than Nicholas Street for the prosecution of religious work. The beautiful and costly church in Northumberland Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, is approaching completion. It will be opened in the month of October this year, and will have cost not much short of £14,000. The London churches, too, despite many difficulties, are courageously entering on new building enterprises. The latest is at Harringay, North London, where a satisfactory commencement has been made with new premises that will cost £4,000.

The Wider Outlook.

METHODIST CONFERENCES.

—Important business has been transacted at the Conferences of the other Methodist Churches. One of the most interesting, and at the same time one of the strangest proceedings in the Wesleyan Conference, was the alteration of the rule regarding the Order of the Pastoral and Representative Sessions of the Conference. Not that the change made is of a revolutionary or sweeping character. Indeed, notwithstanding the fears of some of the older men, those who are not Wesleyans will be inclined to christen the whole affair with the Shakspearian title, "Much Ado About Nothing." Previously, the representative session has been sandwiched between two pastoral sessions. Henceforth it is to stand at the beginning of the Conference, save that the President and Secretary must be elected before it enters on its business. The number of the representative Conference is to be increased from 450 to 600, the number of additional laymen being sixty. To outsiders who are not believers in the Divine Right of Priests the whole affair will seem paltry. For laymen must have nothing to do with the election of the President; nor can they speak or vote on any matter pertaining to the stationing of the ministers. This last disability is a serious matter, and surely, wholly unjust. For laymen may be supposed to be as much interested in the kind of ministers that are appointed to the stations as the ministers themselves, and in many cases will understand better the needs of the circuits. But the strange and interesting part of the business was that the mover of the proposal was the Rev. H. Price Hughes, and the seconder, the Rev. Dr. Rigg, two old antagonists, supposed respectively to be the leaders of the liberal and conservative sections of the Wesleyan body. No wonder the President, the Rev. F. W. Macdonald, was inspired to say some smart things on the occasion. For the President is perhaps the smartest humourist the Wesleyan ministry possesses, not even excepting that famous ex-President the Rev. W. L. Watkinson. In nothing, however, will Primitive Methodists be more disappointed than in the position taken by the Wesleyan Conference on the drink traffic. On this, the greatest evil of our times, they have always been laggards, but at this time of the day the conscience of the nation is awake regarding the evil, and Wesleyan Methodism must no longer tarry. A resolution was moved to the effect that no one engaged in the drink traffic should be an official in the church. The delegates of a Primitive Methodist Conference would probably have carried the resolution after substituting the word member for official. But even this mild proposal was not carried. This and some other matters that occurred will prove a cause of regret to the best friends of Wesleyan Methodism. But no one who understands that great Church, and the work it is doing, will withhold from it their admiration and praise. Its membership during the last forty years has increased by 140,000; the ramifications of its machinery are almost boundless; it commands probably greater wealth than any Nonconformist Church in the country; and to a remarkable degree it succeeds in gathering into its fold both the rich and the poor. Despite the Conservatism it reveals in many things, it shows a wonderful elasticity in others, and in nothing is its wisdom more apparent than in the use it makes of the different types of genius springing up from time to time in its ministry. Whether the man be a Dr. Dallinger or a Thomas Champness, it finds a place for him, and what is much more to the purpose, his right place.

—The Methodist Free Church Annual Assembly has resolved to raise a Twentieth Century Fund of one hundred thousand guineas. This is a bold undertaking on the part of a body numbering only 83,000 members. And yet our friends are confident they will succeed. The Conference also passed a resolution raising the minimum salary of ministers to £110, so that it may be said of our friends that they have been inclined to devise liberal things.

—One of the matters emphasised both at the Wesleyan Conference and at the Methodist Free Church Assembly was that sermons should not be read. It must have been a dramatic moment when, on the occasion of the ordination of the young Wesleyan ministers this year, the retiring President asked if any of them were in the habit of reading their sermons, and paused for a reply. Men who have not a ready flow of language should make up for the deficiency by a more careful study of the verbiage, as well as the thought, of the sermon. It is little excuse to say that their mental constitution makes reading necessary. They should in such circumstances either seek to alter their mental constitution, or give up a vocation to which neither nature nor Providence has called them. The work of grappling with the conscience and arousing in men a sense of sin is too important to be attempted by methods that are doomed beforehand to be ineffective, and young men, at least, whose habits are not yet fixed, will do well to avoid this serious evil.

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

—Reference has already been made to the manner in which the Wesleyan Conference has dealt with the Temperance question. The difficulties of the legislators in the Wesleyan Conference ought in fairness to be recognised, and the desire of the great majority of our sister-church for the spread of temperance principles has been made abundantly manifest. It is not more than justice to say this. The subject has received attention from almost all other religious communities. There can be no doubt that whole-heartedness in dealing with this question is an absolute necessity. If the cure be not found soon we are afraid the results to the life of the nation will be disastrous. Some striking facts and figures were placed before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland a few days ago. It was stated that 120,000 persons die every year from the effects of drink in the United Kingdom. The National Life Boat Institution saves 497 per year at a cost of £117,000, that is a little more than one life a day is saved at a cost of £321, whilst the drink destroys 327 lives a day at a cost of nearly £500,000, for the drink bill for the year is £154,000,000. We spend fabulous sums of money on the medical profession, hospitals are built and maintained, many thousands of doctors and nurses are kept, some of the greatest intellects are trying to discover new methods of fighting disease. The admiration of thoughtful men is awakened by the efforts made to lessen the sufferings of the race caused by sickness. Two of the most serious and fatal forms of disease are consumption and cancer, but the drink destroys more lives than both these diseases put together. And yet there are 178 clergymen who are shareholders in Guinness and Co., and yet the parliamentary Commission appointed to inquire into this recognised evil is hopelessly divided in its opinions. It is too late now, and with such a Government as Lord Salisbury's, it would have been useless at the time to protest against the constitution of the Commission. Still, a fair-minded man would hardly expect from such a body of men an impartial report. It was supposed to consist of eight temperance men, eight in "the trade," and eight neutrals. But seven of the eight neutrals are supporters of the Government, who for all practical purposes are in league with the trade, and only five of the temperance eight are total abstainers. Some of the so-called neutrals, too, are in the trade, at least one of them is a shareholder in one of the largest breweries in the country. Something valuable would be accomplished if action were taken on Lord Peel's plan. When he joined the Commission he was perfectly unbiassed, but the facts brought before him had made him an ardent temperance reformer. By his plan, in seven years, 1,400 public houses would be removed from London alone. Not much need be expected from the present Government, but the inquiry should prove of value to the next Liberal Government. A memorial signed by 10,815 clergymen of the Church of England has been presented to Lord Salisbury praying for Sunday closing. Sir Wilfrid Lawson has reminded these temperance reformers of the Established Church that they should have some influence with the present Government, seeing it was largely due to them that they were now in power. This is probably another instance of the worthy baronet's wit. No man knows better than he that it is useless to expect any good to come out of the unholy alliance between Beer and the Bible.

THE CONFERENCE AT THE HAGUE.

—Optimists, in the newspapers and magazines, and on platforms all over the country, are doing all they can to squeeze a little consolation out of the results of the Great Peace Conference. They must find it a thankless task. One fact stands out promi-nently, it has failed utterly in the object originally contemplated. The Czar, very likely with the best intentions, expressed a desire to arrest the growth of the armaments of the Great Powers of Europe. The strain had become intolerable. Through it Spain and Italy have become bankrupt; Austria and France are staggering under the burden of taxation they have to carry; Germany is a little better, but is, nevertheless, suffering terribly in this respect, and Russia, a large portion of whose population is every two or three years visited with famine, is constantly in extremity for the want of money to carry out its aggressive policy. A humane sovereign like the Czar naturally desired some relief for his own people at least, and full credit should be given to him for his noble intentions. But nothing whatever has been done to arrest the growth of armaments, either in the matter of land forces or ships of war. Let the optimists note this fact. Far otherwise, when some months ago, after the proposal for the Peace Conference had been sent from St. Petersburg, Mr. Goschen offered to reduce the British naval programme if Russia would reduce hers, he received a negative reply, and in Russia, Germany and France shipbuilding for war purposes has been carried on more rapidly during the past six months than at any previous period. These Powers seem resolved to deprive Great Britain of her naval supremacy, so that no alternative is open to the British Government,—they must continue to increase their fleet also. The achievements of the Conference are two. First, a Court of Arbitration has been established, and second, certain resolutions have been passed which are intended to lessen the horrors of war should war break out. Regarding the first, it is to be noted that arbitration is not compulsory, so that any nation is at liberty not to call in the services of the Court, and judging by the temper of the nations in times of crisis, it seems probable that the Court will not be kept very busy. Would the existence of a Court of Arbitration have prevented France, or Germany, two or three years ago from making war on Eng'and? Hardly. And before the Hague Conference arbitration was always available to those who desired it. As for the attempt to make war more humane, we have still less faith in this than in the utility of the Court of Arbitration. When nations are at war they will seek to do each other as much harm as possible. Our hope for the coming of a day of peace rests not on Conferences and sovereigns and statesmen, but on the people, who are the real sufferers, both in times of war, and in the preparations for war made in times of peace. When they shall have become sufficiently educated to understand how much they lose, and how little they gain from the ambitious warlike policy of their rulers, sufficiently Christianised to see that war is criminal, and sufficiently manly to be able to enforce their views on the minority who now hold the power in all the nations, not only will the growth of armaments be arrested, but the armies will all be disbanded, and the soldiers sent to more Christian, and at the same time, wealth-producing labour.

THE ARCHBISHOPS AND RITUALISM.

—During the past few months a new court has been established in the Church of England. Whether it is quite legal or not may be doubted. It has come into existence through the clamour of the ritualistic party in the Church, who were not satisfied to have what they call spiritual questions decided in an unspiritual court like the House of Lords. And now the new court, composed of the two Archbishops, has pronounced judgment on the first case submitted to its jurisdiction. The judgment is a very elaborate and lengthy document, dealing with many difficult points of law and usage, and going back for its authority to the times of Edward the Sixth and Elizabeth. The question that has called into exercise the judgment of the Archbishops is the important one of the legality or otherwise of Lights and Incense-burning in the churches. It seems a most childish affair to engage the thought of these learned men, but they have dealt with the matter in a serious spirit, and have done all that mortals could do to arrive at a sound conclusion. The result of their inquiry is that it is illegal to carry lights in procession in the churches. But it is not illegal to use lights for purposes of decoration, etc., so that it may be concluded it is quite legal to keep lights burning day and night at the altar. Similarly, it is illegal to burn incense ceremonially. But, seeing that it has been so from an ancient period, it is quite legal to burn it for fumigatory purposes. Having arrived at these decisions, the Archbishops proceed to urge the clergy to obey the judgment given, and to remember their ordination vows. One is led to ask what is the value of a decision like this? It will hardly create a flutter in the hearts of the ritualistic clergymen. If they obey it, and cease to use lights and incense in processions, they will continue to use them otherwise, and in a ceremonial sense, too. Further, by this time everybody knows something of the elasticity of the High Church conscience, and they may decide that the judgment of the Archbishops applies only to the two cases that were being tried. Nonconformists will be inclined to smile at the whole matter. If there are people benighted enough in England at the end of the nineteenth century to imagine that the lighting of candles and the burning of incense is worship, they are to be pitied. Behind all this, however, is the main point, the claim of the priest to be a man of a special order, a miracle worker, the retainer and the remitter of sins. And the only remedy for the evil is disestablishment.

REV. ROBERT HARRISON.

Rev. Robert Harrison.

THE Rev. Robert Harrison has won for himself a high position as one of the foremost preachers in the Connexion, as an ecclesiastical statesman and a careful and successful circuit minister. Nature has been generous to him, and has dowered him richly with many and varied gifts; not the least enviable, perhaps, being that persistency and power of plod which have enabled him to make the best use of all the others. It was said of Campbell the poet, "that he was born to sing; it was his nature to blossom into song as 'tis a tree's to leaf itself in April." So Mr. Harrison seems to have been born to preach; for he has all the qualities which go to make the successful preacher. A good appearance; a voice rich in cadence and of considerable compass; an easy and natural method of expression; a ready and receptive mind, and that magnetism of personality which ever differentiates the born speaker from the man who has merely learnt to talk—it is no wonder that he has steadily made his way until he has come to be regarded as one of the front-rank men in the Church he loves so well, and which he is serving with such marked ability.

Mr. Harrison is a conspicuous example of how hard work and natural endowment can be made to supply the lack of early educational advantages. His parents were poor, and his schooling "was pinched both in quality and quantity." He was born on December 6, 1841, in the city of Carlisle. His mother taught him to revere the pioneers of the Connexion, and frequently talked about Johnny Oxtoby, Flesher, William Garner and others, who thus early became the boy's heroes. He was but young when he passed into the "Valley of Decision," and came out a follower and lover of Jesus Christ. Consecrated service followed conversion, and we find the young recruit engaged, first, as a teacher and then as assistant superintendent, in the Cecil Street School, Carlisle.

Then when he had been tried and proved, the call came to him to enter the ministry. His first circuit was Selby, and his first superintendent, the Rev. Thomas Greenbury—then in the hey-day of his popularity—about whose kindness he speaks with grateful recollection. He soon won his spurs in the quaint old-world Yorkshire town, and some of the older people still remember his fresh, unconventional ministry, which was blest to not a few. From there he went to Market Rasen, and then to Gainsbro', where, under the superintendency of one of the mighty men whose name and deeds live in the history of the Connexion, the Rev. William Harland, he finished his probation. He next removed to Hornsea, and after serving that circuit with growing acceptance and usefulness, went to Hull, which was henceforth to claim a large share of his ministry. Hull Second, Hull Third (twice), (eight years), Hull Fourth, Hull Fifth, and now Hull Fourth again, have all been under his charge, and he must now be regarded as one of the makers of Primitive Methodism in the metropolis of the Connexion. In Grimsby, also, he did magnificent work—a lasting monument of which remains in the beautiful church in Flottergate. In Sunderland he not only served the Tatham Street Church well, but he impressed the town as few ministers have done. Indeed, the same story has been repeated in nearly all his circuits, and of none is it truer than of his last. He has built and opened, free of debt, a chapel at Willerby, built schools at St. George's Road, and has put new life and vigour into the whole activities of the circuit.

His success is largely due to the fact that he has adopted spiritual means to attain spiritual results. He has no faith in the methods of the music-hall for filling empty churches. He believes in the attractive power of the Cross. Jesus Christ is the world's need. To raise the tone of the Church has been his first aim. A spiritual Church will have drawing power. He has never forgotten the work of Methodism is "to spread Scriptural holiness through the land." The doctrine of the Sanctification of Believers has found in him an eloquent and continual advocate, and in this I fancy he would be inclined to place his success. To him has been given the joy of reaping as well as the labour of sowing. Nowhere more at home than in a revival, it has been his delight to point many to the suffering Saviour.

It says much for the process of study and education going on all through the years of a strenuous life, that he should be elected to the distinguished position of Governor of Elmfield College, and it is to be regretted that after a short time of office he was compelled to resign owing to the health of his wife breaking down. Twice he has been elected as the General Committee Delegate of his District, and his name has been mentioned more than once in connection with the highest office in the gift of the Connexion. He is also a Director of the Insurance Company and its Deputy Chairman. He has served his District in various offices, and has always taken a lively and practical interest in the Connexional Orphanage.

It is difficult in a short sketch to give in due proportion an adequate idea of a life so many-sided. It is easy to seize on outstanding points, good or bad, but the life can only be judged by the strength and flow of its ordinary level. Dr. Johnson, when he heard that Boswell intended to write a life of him, declared that if he thought Boswell really meant to write his life he would prevent it by taking Boswell's. It is difficult even for our most intimate friends to know us truly, and even if they know us, to faithfully record their impressions. This, however, I wish to do in this article. Mr. Harrison has both faults and failings—nobody would admit that sooner than himself—but they are of the kind which are most obvious to the mere observer. He has the failing of his qualities. But those who know him best, who have seen his inner life, and who have worked shoulder to shoulder with him, all testify to his true-heartedness, his kindness and sympathy. If he quickly resents an injury, he as quickly forgives. He has large individuality, and prefers to act on his own initiative than to work in the ruts made by others.

He never lowers the ministry in the eyes of his people; they respect him because he respects his own office. Generally speaking, he takes broad and statesmanlike views of things, and is sure always of a respectful hearing for his views, even when he cannot get others to adopt them.

As a speaker he is clear, forcible, sometimes eloquent, and always worth listening to. We have heard him deliver speeches which would compare very favourably, for depth of thought, clearness of conception, and beauty of diction, with the utterances of some who have gained world-wide fame as speakers. We shall never forget listening to his address on the Lord's Supper at the Sunderland Conference. It was all in all, the most beautiful and striking deliverance on the subject which we have ever heard.

He has written some very excellent articles for our Connexional magazines, and shared with the Rev. Henry Woodcock the authorship of "The Students' Handbook to Scripture Doctrine." The pity is that he has not found more time for literary work, for which both his personal gifts and his extensive reading eminently qualify him.

As a preacher, Mr. Harrison appears at his best. The pulpit is his throne. He has never undervalued his calling, but recognised that it demands his best. He does not insult the intelligence of his congregations by offering them that which has cost him nothing. He takes beaten oil to the sanctuary. Uniformly, his preaching reaches a high level. He keeps himself well abreast of modern criticism, and while his sympathies generally are with the conservative school of Biblical critics, he keeps an open mind, and is always anxious to get at the truth. His sermons are practical and instructive, vivified with gleams of imagination from a mind saturated with Bible poetry and story. His love of the beautiful finds expression in many a telling illustration picked up in the lanes, fields, or on the moorland or mountain. "Purple patches" abound in his sermons, revealing the fact that he has the seeing eye and the receptive soul.

He loves the quiet and beauty of country life, and though the greater part of his ministry has been spent in large towns, never enjoys himself more than when ministering to a village congregation. The quaintness and simplicity of country life appeal to him, and many a good story can he tell of the doings and sayings of Yorkshire yeoman and Lincolnshire labourer. He enjoys a bon-mot exceedingly, and has a vein of humour in his nature which enables him to see the lighter side of life.

He is a social reformer as well as a Christian minister, and has taken an active interest in all that means the social uplifting of the people. He has been most fearless in the advocacy of Nonconformist principles, and is ever ready to defend his Church, and to give a reason for the hope that is within him. More than once he has crossed swords with Ritualistic clergymen, who regard Nonconformity as schism, and has given proof that he can easily hold his own. He has fought sturdily the battle of unsectarian education, and was chairman of the Driffield School Board during his stay in that town.

In his wife he has found a true helpmeet, and it is a source of both sorrow and sympathy that during later years Mrs. Harrison's health has been so precarious as to compel her largely to withdraw from the active duties of Church life in which formerly she delighted.

Mr. Harrison has just taken over the Secretaryship of the Hull Sites Committee, and is showing a very great interest in this new and important development of our work in Hull. We wish him long life and joyful service until the day when the Master shall crown his life with a "Well done."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

HOW ALIZON RECEIVED RUTLAND'S CONFESSION.

WHAT do you wish to say to me?"

They were standing alone beneath the trees which line the road leading to the Pincio. The night had turned cold, and not a single soul was in sight. A great gloom seemed to rest upon everything. Churches, squares, streets, were deserted; it looked like a city of the dead.

"I go to Naples to-morrow."

"So soon?"

"Yes. I cannot stay in Rome longer. I—I—well, I simply cannot, that is all."

There was a tremor in Rutland's voice as he spoke, and Alizon noted it. Perhaps she understood its meaning.

"I wished to be able to spend a few minutes with you alone before going," he continued.

Alizon was silent.

"You see," stammered the young man, "I came here to—to—; but you know. You held out a little hope to me when we were in Lancashire, just before I was taken ill. Not much, but a little. You hinted that if we were one in faith, if I could accept your creed, you might, great as is the distance between us, perhaps, in time, return my love."

"I remember," replied Alizon quietly.

"When I was struggling back to health, I determined to come here, so that I might see your faith manifested at its head-quarters, and at its best. I made up my mind that I would look for the best, that I would endeavour to fasten on those things which might help me to believe."

"Well?" said the girl, and there was a tremor in her voice.

"I simply cannot, that is all, I simply cannot!"

"Cannot what?"

"Miss Neville, you know I love you. I have tried to kill my love, tried to forget you. But I cannot. I love you more and more. To win your love I would do anything, everything in my power. I have been tempted to be a liar, to—to stultify my conscience, that I might have a chance of winning you for my wife. But I cannot do it. I cannot confess what, to me, is a mockery. Perhaps it is my education, perhaps my temperament, but the Protestant faith is to me a great truth, while the distinguishing features of the Papacy, are to me so many fables. And so, remembering your words, I—I must give you up."

* Copyright in the United States of America:

"What words?"

"That you would rather die than be unfaithful to your Church, that you would destroy any love that stood between you and your religion. You remember, don't you?"

Alizon walked by his side with bowed head.

"Whatever illusions I might have had about the Papacy," continued Rutland, "have been dispelled here in Rome. To the man who loves truth there is no rest for the sole of his foot. Forgive me, Miss Alizon, I am afraid I shall wound you, but I cannot help speaking plainly. All these beautiful stories which abound here, and which have been sanctioned by what is claimed to be an infallible Church, have to me, no more foundation in fact than the story of Cinderella. In other words your infallible Church is day by day bolstering up pretty myths, which were born of ignorance and credulity. On every hand I find that the simple truths of the early Christians have been paganised by your Church; I find that the priests in order to retain the semblance of a power which was never theirs in reality, have all through the years, either consciously, or unconsciously, been deceiving the ignorant concerning their rights."

"Have you the right to say this?" cried the girl. There was passion as well as pain in her voice.

"The right!" cried Duncan almost passionately. "Think of all these sacerdotal claims! what foundation are there for those claims either in history, in reason, or in the Scriptures. Apply any test you please, and the result is the same. Then take the claim that yours is an infallible Church. Either it is that, or it is a colossal deception. Its claim for power rests on that assumption. Infallible! Why, read its history for yourself. For fifteen hundred years it has been proclaiming aloud that its vaunted infallibility is a mere will-o'-th'-wisp, the veriest phantasmagoria that was ever foisted upon an ignorant community. As for the infallibility of the Popes, hedge it however you may by sophistical interpretations, it is just as vain, just as foolish. Here again it is simply a struggle for priestly power unsupported by reason, by history, by tangible evidence or divine mandate. Infallibility of Popes! Alexander VI., Julius II. the mouth-pieces of God! Paul V, a representative of Him who said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me'!" The young man laughed bitterly.

"This Rome," he went on, "is the veriest Mecca of superstition. Think of it all, think of it, with its healing wells, its miracle-working images, its gaudy ceremonials. No wonder educated young Italy is leaving the Church wholesale. Why, you know that the restoration of her ladyship's health is attributed to the power of the Bambino! What evidence is there for the truth of it? The same evidence that there is for the thousand and one other things. The whole thing crumbled in the light of common sense, and at the very first touch of critical investigation.

"Besides, religion is transmuted into something poor and often childish. Salvation is obtained by little observances and childish credulity. Why, think of your Santa Scala. Fancy a thousand years' indulgence obtained by going up a few steps on one's knees. As though salvation was not something infinitely higher than all this.

"Forgive me, Miss Alizon, I am afraid I am speaking bitterly. I am like a man signing his own death-warrant. You have been reared in Papacy, and thus it is very dear to you, but I cannot help it, I must speak plainly. I go away into loneliness, and the sky of my life will be black; but I must be truthful. It is like pulling out one's heart-strings to give up all my hopes; but I felt I must speak plainly before bidding you good-bye for ever."

"Good-bye for ever?"

"Yes, for my own peace of mind, I must never speak to you again after to-night. I shall not see you if I can help it. Seeing you is only deepening the old wound. Oh, you don't know how I love you, you don't know how hard it is to say what I have been saying."

For a few seconds there was a silence between them.

"Are you sure," said the girl presently, "that you have tested everything fairly—that is from your standpoint?"

"All my life I have been more or less a student of Church history," answered Rutland, "but for a year I have been reading your side of the question, I have studied your writers, and have tried to understand their explanations. Since I have been here at Rome I have tried to see things from the Roman standpoint; but, oh, it is impossible, impossible! Take the New Testament on the one hand, and your faith on the other, and you can hardly find a similarity between them, the latter is only a caricature of the former, a travesty of the greatest truths God ever gave to men. I cannot help it, Miss Alizon, years ago I was a Protestant by education, now I am one by conviction, and God knows I would have given anything to have been convinced otherwise."

"Are you sure?" asked the girl, with a husky voice, "are you sure that you are drawn away from the Catholic faith, rather than towards it?"

"Oh yes, I am sure. If inclination were the most powerful factor in my mode of life, I would sink everything at once, and join you. But I cannot. It would be intellectual suicide. Reason forbids it, conscience forbids it, God forbids it. Whatever course others may take, for me it would be an unpardonable sin to stultify my best life at the altar of a played-out fallacy."

"Why, think," went on the young man, "I should by such an act make myself a slave. A few days ago I asked you to visit the American Episcopal Church in order to see those pictures by Burne-Jones. And you dared not go, because it was a Protestant Church. While in Protestant England you are not absolutely forbidden to enter a Church of the reformed faith, here in Papal Rome, such liberty is taken away. You are forbidden to read the best books in the world. Why, think of it, the other day I saw a list of writers whose works were placed on the Index. I saw the names of Descartes, whose writings are invaluable to a student of theistic philosophy, of Fénelon, of Malebranche, of Locke, of Mill, of Renan, of Edgar Quinet, of Edmund de Pressensé, as well as that of the pious Lamennais. Even Victor Hugo's Les Misérables is regarded as a stumbling block to believers, and Lamartine is a forbidden author. You know what the Bishop of Tolisco told us some time ago. If the Catholic Church were powerful again, he said, the Index would be enforced everywhere. Think of what it would mean! Why, the death-blow to knowledge would be struck, the advancement of learning would be a thing of the past, ignorance would be triumphant, and the nations would be composed of millions of slaves, who followed blindly at the heels of a power which forbade free investigation. No, no, Miss Alizon, I cannot help it, I cannot help it. When I came here, I was filled with Ritzoom's idea of a great united Church. That, too, has been dispelled. There is a kind of uniformity, but real unity is unknown. We of the Protestant Churches have far more real unity than you. The true Church is a spiritual kingdom, a great spiritual idea, a mighty spiritual life moulding the life of men. And in that spirit, in spite of the freest investigation, the Protestant Churches are united. We are bound by no arbitrary laws, we submit to no artificial rules and orders, but I have come to learn that the truest unity prevails among us, we are united to work and live for Christ's spiritual kingdom."

They had left the road which led to the Pincio, and had turned towards the Via Nazionale. Indeed, they had traversed the Via della Quattro Fontane, and had turned down the street past the Methodist Episcopal Church, which led to a square which was filled with evergreens, and which was beautified by great fountains of waters. They took no notice of the few pedestrians who passed them, indeed, as they entered the square they found themselves quite alone. The sky was cloudy and dark, but the electric lights revealed everything clearly. In the near distance in the Via Nazionale, they heard the rush of traffic, but in the square all was silent save for the splash of the fountains.

"And is that all?" said Alizon presently. She spoke as if with an effort, and Rutland saw that her face was pale, and that her eyes burned with an unnatural light.

"That is all I need say," replied Rutland, "I am grieved to have pained you, but I could not help speaking, could not help telling you why I am obliged to give up a hope which—which—but never mind. I have been living in a fool's paradise. Let us return."

"No," replied Alizon, "not for a few minutes. I am very tired. I will sit down on one of these seats."

"SHE SAT DOWN LIKE ONE WEARY, WHILE RUTLAND STOOD BY HER SIDE."

She sat down, like one weary, while Rutland stood by her side. Neither spoke a word for some time. Presently Alizon shivered.

"You are cold," cried Rutland anxiously. "Let us return."

Alizon arose in silence.

"What time do you leave to-morrow?" she said.

"I think there is a train somewhere between eight and nine," said Rutland. "I shall go by that."

"Then we must say good-bye to-night."

"Yes," replied the young man. "Perhaps I had better not speak to her ladyship, I will write her from Naples. I think you understand, don't you?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"It will be best, don't you think so?" The man's voice was hoarse. It was evident that his life was shaken to the centre. As he said, he was like one signing his own death-warrant, and yet he could not help speaking the words which he felt were destroying for ever the possibility of realising the desire of his heart.

She walked by his side around the square like one weary; but she did not speak.

"You are tired," said Rutland, "let me call a carriage."

"No," she replied, "let us walk around the square for a few minutes; it is quiet here, and it is not yet late."

There was apparently no feeling in her voice. At least Rutland thought so, and his heart became somewhat bitter.

"Haven't you a kind word to speak to me?" he said presently. "I suppose I am nothing to you, how can I be? But—but— O God! Miss Alizon, help me to bear it."

"To bear what?"

"What! You know. My leaving you for ever may be nothing to you; but it is like death to me."

"Then why—why leave?"

"Why leave? Oh, don't mock me! You know what you told me. And—and really I cannot bear to—to be near you any longer, knowing that every breath I draw in your presence is strengthening a love which is hopeless."

The girl was silent. Presently, however, a new light shone in her eyes.

"You—you are sure what you say is true?" she said.

"What?"

"That you—you —"

"That I love you!" cried Duncan. "Oh, don't mock me! I cannot bear it. Why, you know that without you everything will be—but there, why should I repeat it? You know that I have given you my life, and that I cannot take it back."

"Then don't go to Naples to-morrow."

"Don't go to Naples to-morrow! Why?"

"Because, because— Oh, Duncan, don't you know?"

CHAPTER XXIX.

AFTERWARDS.

ALIZON NEVILLE'S secret was out at last, she had told Rutland more than he had dared to hope for.

"Do you mean that?" he cried, "do you mean that you—you wish me to stay, that you—you——"

They were in the square alone beneath the olive trees, no prying eyes were near, no listening ears overheard the girl's confession.

Duncan caught her hands in his, and looked into her eyes. He had forgotten all about the differences in their faith, forgotten that she had been reared in a world different from his own. They were man and maid together, and they loved each other. At that moment neither realised what must inevitably lie before them, or even if they did, it did not blight their happiness. They feared nothing; anger, threats, persecution, were as nothing. In many respects the supreme moment of their lives had come, and everything save their love was forgotten. For let who will say otherwise, there is nothing, humanly speaking, so wondrous, or so great, as the joy of the man who knows that the love of his heart is returned. A few minutes before Duncan's sky was black, he saw nothing before him but a life of loneliness and disappointment. His life's work would have to be done under the shadow of unfulfilled desires, and the cravings of his heart would never be satisfied. Now all was changed. Alizon loved him, and in that knowledge the world became new.

"You are sure?" he said presently, "you are quite sure? Tell me quickly. Your answer is everything to me."

"Yes," she said, and in her voice was a laugh and a sob. "I—I could not help it," she added.

A second later their lips met in their first kiss, and Duncan Rutland and Alizon Neville were betrothed.

For a time they were oblivious to everything save their own happiness. Had they been some village lad and lass wandering in a country lane, their love-making could not have been more simple, they could not have cared less for the eyes of the world. She was only a girl of twenty, and he a few years older. They forgot to be conventional as they whispered to each other the words that transformed the cold dark night into a June morning.

Realities came back to them presently, however. The fact of their difference of faith came rushing back to the young man's memory. He remembered that she was a Catholic, and that she had regarded him as an enemy to the truth.

"You will forgive my being what you call a heretic?"

"You are not a heretic."

"Alizon!"

"Oh, I have been wanting to tell you for days past, only I dared not. It would seem as though—but you know."

"What do you mean, Alizon? Surely, surely—has God given you light?"

"It was no use. I held on as long as I could. Before I knew you I did not think, I simply accepted. I believed that to doubt was sin. I said in my heart that the greatest thinkers of the world had settled all these matters. That the Church was infallible, and that those who were outside its pale were outside salvation. I—I held to this while you were in Lynford, and I came here hoping and believing that you would be converted. But, Duncan, sin or no sin, I cannot believe longer."

"Not in your Church?"

"No, it is impossible to me. I—I, oh, I cannot tell you all I've gone through since I have been here. I dared not speak to anyone about it. I was afraid even to tell my mother. You see,—I am afraid even you cannot understand."

"Yes, I think I can. But tell me, tell me everything."

"I don't know why, but I've been so disappointed since I came to Rome. The Church is not what I expected. Its ideals are so poor compared with what I hoped. It seemed to resolve everything into a system, and to support this system at whatever cost. And this, while I could not argue about it, fell short of my longings. But that which really made me begin to doubt was that—that Bambino."

"Yes, I understand."

"Oh, I cannot explain it. The priests and the nurse believed so implicitly, without any tangible evidence, just as they seemed to believe everything else. And then that night, after mother had fallen asleep, and you had left us, I went into the drawing-room, and that priest, Brother Francis, was lying on a sofa asleep. In spite of my anxiety, I almost laughed. And then I saw a New Testament lying on a table. As you know, it is a forbidden book to Catholics. That is, no Catholic is allowed to read it except under the supervision of the priest. I looked at it, and saw that it belonged to you."

"Yes, I remember."

"Well, I read for hours. Perhaps you have wondered where the book was?"

"I thought I had lost it."

"I have had it ever since. I've read it through time after time, praying for help and light. Oh, it is a wonderful book, and no one can realise what a revelation it has been to me."

"And that is all?"

"It is all that can be put into words, but I think you can understand."

That was the happiest night of Duncan Rutland's life. All, and more than he had ever hoped for had come to pass, the impossible had been realised. The fair girl who walked by his side had promised to be his wife.

"I must go and tell your mother, Alizon," he said presently.

"Yes—and—and you will not go to Naples to-morrow?"

"Not unless you will go with me."

The girl laughed a happy laugh.

They walked back towards the hotel together, along the Via della Quattr Fontane, and down the steps past the tablet to the memory of Keats, into the Piazza di Spagna. The square was almost empty, and a great silence seemed to rest on the city.

"You remember the night we walked here together?" said Rutland.

"Yes, I remember."

"I can scarcely believe my own ears yet," said Rutland. "It seems impossible that the faith of many generations should have left you."

"I cannot understand it myself. I held to it as long as I could, I reminded myself of the penalties which would be imposed, I thought of what I had believed, but nothing mattered. I simply could not believe. Doubtless, there is much that is true, much that is beautiful in the system; but its claim to be the only Church, and an infallible Church, is simply absurd. And so—oh, Duncan, you don't know how I struggled, but it left me."

"And religion itself, Alizon, religion in the broader, grander sense of the word. What of that?"

"Christianity is become very much greater. I can see it everywhere now. It is not limited to the narrow channels in which some would confine it. I see its manifestations in all good thought, in all upward desire. I see it in its love for liberty, for justice; I see it even in the desire to be free from the restrictions of the creeds of men. It is now more than a sect, a community; it is a new spirit permeating the lives of men and women. I see its results in better books, better education, better governments, better everything."

"Yes, that's it."

"At first this was all vague. I could not conceive of a church outside a historical and visible community. I thought it must have a visible head, and its official priesthood. Now all that has become the mere trappings of men, the inventions of men. You remember those words of Christ, 'The Kingdom of God cometh not by observation, for lo, the Kingdom of God is within you.' Well, I compared His words with all the teaching of Romanism, and—and, well, I cannot put my thoughts into words; but you can understand."

"You have told your mother nothing?"

"No, nothing. I have not dared."

"She will be very angry, will she not?"

"Duncan, you must help me. The Nevilles have been Catholics for hundreds of years, and mother is an implicit believer. Oh, I am afraid to think of what she will say."

"We will know to-night. I cannot bear the suspense."

"You are not afraid, are you?" Alizon asked the question with a little laugh.

"Not now," said the young fellow, looking at her with eager eyes.

"Because—because, there will not only be mother, but Father Sheen, and Father Ritzoom, and—and all the rest."

"I was not afraid of either of them when you were against me, Alizon,—now I am afraid of nothing."

A few seconds later they reached the hotel.

"I am going straight to my room, Duncan," said Alizon. "I expect Lady Ingram will have left before now. Mother will be waiting for me."

"Will you not speak to her to-night?"

"I—I don't know. I am such a coward."

"You a coward, Alizon?"

"Yes. If I were not I should go with you to— to speak to mother. Would you rather I did?"

"Not if it would pain you."

They walked along the corridor together towards Lady Neville's rooms.

"Good night, Alizon."

Alizon was silent.

"Won't you say good night to me?"

"Not yet."

"Why?"

"I won't be a coward, Duncan, I will go with you."

"No, don't. Your mother's anger will have spent itself after a little while, and—and I will take all the blame."

"Please don't help me to be a coward, Duncan," said the girl. "No, no, I must go with you."

There was such a look of determination in her voice that he could not resist her; besides, the fact that she desired to stand by his side, and to share the brunt of her mother's anger, gave him joy untold. And yet he knew not what to do. He knew how loyal Lady Neville was to the faith of her fathers, knew how bitterly she would resent her daughter's desertion. He wished to save Alizon from words which he was sure would be spoken, longed to take to himself everything which might wound her. And yet he reflected that he might help her by being near her; and he longed more than words could tell to shield her from all pain. For himself he cared nothing. Since Alizon's declaration he felt that he could face anything. The thought of her love made impossibilities possible. Remembering the words she had spoken, he felt strong enough to brave the anger of not only Lady Neville, but of all the dignitaries of the Church as well.

"It is no use, Duncan," repeated Alizon, "I am going with you. I should never forgive myself if on the night of our—that is, if on this night of all others, I was afraid to stand by your side. You will let me come, won't you? I—I do so want to stay a little longer with you, you know!"

The wilfulness and the winsomeness expressed in the same breath, conquered the young man. Like all other lovers, he was but as clay in the hands of the potter. He knew that now, as always, the will of the girl by his side would be his also, and that she, because she loved him, would will for the best.

They entered side by side, the room in which Lady Neville sat awaiting her daughter.

CHAPTER XXX.

HOW LADY NEVILLE RECEIVED THE NEWS.

LADY NEVILLE looked up from the book she had been reading with a smile on her face as her daughter entered. Then, as she saw Duncan, the smile changed to a look of questioning.

"Lady Ingram has just gone," she said quietly, "and I was wondering how long you would be. How are you, Mr. Rutland? It was a very imposing ceremony at St. Peter's to-day, wasn't it?"

"Very," replied Duncan.

"Did you get near His Holiness?"

"Oh yes, thank you. He stopped for a minute close to where I stood."

"Ah, that is well! There was such a crowd that I was afraid you would be unable to obtain a sight of him. He is a wonderful man, isn't he? Fancy such strength at ninety. He must be under an especial Providence; doubtless he is. Don't you think so?"

"I trust we are all under an especial Providence," replied Rutland, "but he is a very wonderful old man, very wonderful. Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity of seeing him."

"Oh, that is all right! I hope it may continue to be a source of satisfaction to you. Alizon, you look pale and tired, I think you had better retire."

"Lady Neville," said Rutland, "you must wonder why I have taken the liberty of calling to-night. If you will allow me, I will tell you in a few words."

"By all means." She looked into his face as though she expected a pleasant communication.

"I have come to tell you that I love your daughter, and to ask your consent for her to become my wife."

Lady Neville looked at him with speechless astonishment.

"I do not quite understand you, I am afraid," she said presently.

"I love Alizon," he repeated simply. "I have loved her for nearly a year now."

"You love Alizon!"

"Yes, Lady Neville."

"And—and you have told her this?"

"Yes, I have told her."

"And she? You, Alizon?"

"She has made me a happy man, perhaps the happiest man in the world." His voice was husky, and he spoke quietly, almost reverently.

"When did she tell you this?"

"To-night."

Lady Neville rose to her feet, her eyes flashed with anger. Rutland would not have been surprised if she had bidden him leave the room.

"Alizon," she said presently, "will you leave us?"

"ALIZON FELL ON HER KNEES AT HER MOTHER'S FEET."

Mr. Rutland and I had better speak of this matter alone."

"I would rather not, mother."

"What do you mean?"

"Only this,"—Alizon's face was very pale, and her lips were tremulous, but she mastered herself and spoke quietly. "You will accuse Duncan of things which he will not deny, and which will not be true; you will say what you ought not to say to him—and—and I wish to stay."

Lady Neville was evidently very angry. She toyed impatiently with some trifles on the table by her side, and seemed in doubt as to what she should say next.

"Do you think you have acted honourably with me, Mr. Rutland?" she asked presently.

Rutland was silent; he was afraid at that moment that he ought to have told Lady Neville of his love months before.

"Is—is this your return for the—the kindness I—I have tried to show you?" she continued. Had she not been very angry she would never have spoken in this fashion; but under the circumstances she could barely govern her words.

"Perhaps I ought to have spoken to you before," replied Rutland. "Possibly I ought to have told you on the night I discovered my love. But in those days it seemed pure madness on my part to lift my eyes to Alizon."

"It is still," replied her ladyship. "That, of course, must be understood."

"I know it, and yet I cannot help it," was Rutland's response.

"Will you tell me the history of this foolishness?" said her ladyship presently. "Perhaps when I know that I can show you how—how utterly impossible it is for me to countenance the affair."

"I am afraid its history is my own history after I came to Lynford," replied Duncan. "You know how I was thrown into contact with Alizon, and—and I could not help loving her."

The young fellow said this so humbly, yet so manfully, that for a moment her ladyship felt less bitterly towards him. Perhaps she thought of the time when her own heart first warmed towards Sir Charles Neville, and the memory of that time made her young again.

"And how long is it since you first spoke to Alizon about this foolishness?" she asked.

"It is some months ago."

"And why did you not tell me?" asked Lady Neville, turning towards her daughter.

"Because," and Alizon spoke steadily, "because I hoped then that Duncan's love was only a passing fancy. It was altogether strange to me, and it seemed so impossible that I could not entertain it seriously. Besides, I did not tell you because I thought if you knew you would forbid his coming to the Priory."

"Certainly I should, and what then?"

Alizon was silent, she did not know how to express her thoughts. Lady Neville, however, interpreted her silence rightly, and for a moment the position staggered her. Here was surely a strange outcome to her plans for the young minister's conversion. How blind she had been never to have thought of this contingency! She remembered that she had invited Rutland to the Priory, had remonstrated with him when he failed to take advantage of her invitations.

"Tell me the whole truth," she said angrily. "Was it at your wish that my daughter did not tell me of your madness?"

"It was not," cried Alizon. "I—I thought he would forget it, and it was I who suggested that his words should be regarded as not spoken. Duncan never hinted at such a thing."

The girl seemed to take a pride in taking all possible blame on herself, it was for this reason that she had insisted on taking her place by his side during the interview.

"But did you give no encouragement when he first spoke?"

"No," said Duncan; "none at all. She told me that even if she could ever care for me, she would destroy all possibility of affection while I remained a Protestant."

A sneer curled her ladyship's lip. She thought she saw how matters stood, and she despised the young minister accordingly. Still, it might be for the best; the man who could change his faith in order to win a girl would not be difficult to deal with. Some sort of compromise could be effected somehow. Besides, if he professed conversion to the Catholic faith he would be under the discipline of the Church. The whole affair was terribly disappointing, but it might be all for the best. Immediately she became more cool and collected, she was able to talk with more deliberation.

"Well, and so I suppose you began to be drawn to our faith."

There was a touch of scorn in her voice, for she was a high-souled woman. Faith to her was a sacred thing, and she could not conceive how any one could associate base considerations with matters of religion.

"No, I do not know that I was drawn to it," replied Rutland; "but I loved Alizon so much that I said I would study the whole ground again, that I would read Catholic books, and understand Catholic arguments."

"Yes, well."

"As you know, I did not visit the Priory for months. I dared not, I—I was not strong enough. I tried to destroy my love for Alizon, but I could not."

"No, I suppose not." Lady Neville felt sure she knew what was coming, and began to form plans whereby she could deal with the whole business.

"I need not say what I endured. I tried to be faithful to my Church, I tried to do my duty by all. Then I was taken ill."

At that moment Lady Neville felt that perhaps his mental struggle was real. The doctor had declared that the young minister had nearly killed himself by overwork and anxiety. Besides, his voice had a ring of truth. Doubtless, then, he was telling what had actually taken place, and thus his conversion was real. It was as she had hoped, with the exception of his madness in loving Alizon. The case would be difficult to deal with, still, it could be dealt with. She wished that Rit-zoom were in Rome, he would be able to advise with her. Well, and why not? A telegram would reach him in a few hours, and in three days he could be in Rome, meanwhile the matter could be left in abeyance.

"Yes, you were taken ill," said her ladyship, "but you recovered. What then?"

"I reflected that I had never seen Romanism at its head-quarters," said Rutland; "that although books had failed to convince me, the sight of Rome, the home of the Vatican, and the centre of the system, would do so. For, for I am afraid I wanted to be converted. You see I loved—"

"Yes, yes. Well, you came to Rome. And I suppose the work of the Church, her services, her history, and a sight of the Holy Father, did convince you?"

"No," replied Rutland quietly, "no, they did not convince me."

"What! do you mean then—that—"

"I am still a Protestant, Lady Neville. I am more convinced in my opinion than ever."

Lady Neville was staggered. Her castle of cards had fallen to the ground; with one blow all her plans were destroyed.

"Then how dare you as a Protestant, as a heretic, dare to speak to my daughter again?" she asked angrily. "I trusted you as a gentleman. For that reason I consented to her accompanying you on some of your journeys. Is this your idea of acting as a man of honour?"

Alizon opened her lips to speak, but Rutland stopped her.

"I did not betray your trust," replied the young man. "As you know, Father Matthew accompanied us in all our journeys, and neither by word nor sign did I act other than as an acquaintance to whom you had been kind."

"Then to what circumstance do I owe the honour of this visit to-night?"

"It was my fault," said Alizon proudly. "I will speak,"—this to Duncan, who tried to answer Lady Neville's question. "This morning after our visit to the Sistine Chapel he asked me to grant him an interview; and knowing that you would be engaged with Lady Ingram, I told him that I would give it him to-night."

"I begin to see," said Lady Neville. "But may I ask the subject of discussion?"

"He told me that he was going to Naples to-morrow," cried Alizon excitedly, "he told me that—that he dare not, that is he could not be in my society any longer."

"It was my fault," cried Rutland. "I had tried to accept your faith; but I could not. I remembered that Alizon had told me that even if she felt any love for a Protestant, she should feel it her duty to destroy it, and so I gave up all hope of ever winning her. And—and I could not bear being in her company, because I was consumed with a hopeless love, so I made up my mind to go to Naples. I know I was wrong,—that is, perhaps I ought to have gone away without speaking to her; but I could not help it. So I—I told her that I must remain a Protestant because—because Romanism seemed a string of fables, and that I must never see her again."

Rutland got out this speech stammeringly, and with great difficulty. He scarce knew what he was saying, but in his heart was a great desire to take all blame upon himself. In his excitement, however, he uttered words which had better be left unsaid.

"I see," said Lady Neville, "you told Alizon that you must bid her good-bye for ever. Very proper, and very romantic. But why do you come here? Why this mad confession and this more than mad request? Why have you not gone to Naples?"

"Because I asked him not to go," cried Alizon.

Her face was very pale, but her eyes burned brightly. In them was an expression of determination which told her mother that she was not to be turned aside from her purpose. As she spoke, moreover, she looked up into Duncan's face, and the look made Duncan's heart warm with joy, and strong with resolution.

He was proud beyond words of her declaration, and yet he wanted to shield her, wanted to take the brunt of her mother's anger upon himself. And so he spoke wildly, unheedingly.

"It is all my fault," he cried, "I—I should have acted otherwise; but—"

"It was not his fault," cried Alizon proudly, "I asked him to stay, because I could not help it. He loved me, and has loved me for a long time; and I love him, and I could not bear for him to go away."

"Alizon!" cried Lady Neville.

"Oh, I am grieved to cause you pain," cried the girl, "and, oh, mother, I don't love you the less; but surely you can understand, surely you can feel for me. I cannot help it!"

For a moment Lady Neville's eyes grew soft, and she seemed like yielding to the pleading of her only child; but only for a moment. Anger and disappointment steeled her heart again, and she spoke almost harshly. Besides, she did not know the whole of the truth yet. What she had heard was but the preamble of what to her was almost as cruel as death itself.

"No, I cannot understand," she said bitterly. "How can I understand? Can you not see the madness of your request, the mockery of your position? How can you love a man who does not belong to your station in life, and who is—but why need I repeat it all? You feel this, Mr. Rutland, you can understand the impossibility of—of everything you ask?"

"No," cried Rutland. "I know I am your inferior in worldly position. I do not belong to a great historical family; but—but God has made us fit for each other. And—and I love her like my own life!"

"Love!" sneered Lady Neville.

"Yes, I love her," cried Duncan. "I do not profess any other worthiness than this. She is all the world to me. I know I am a poor man, but—I am not a clown."

There was a touch of pride in his tones. Alizon's love had made him bold, besides, he knew that intellectually he was Lady Neville's equal, and he prided himself upon being a gentleman.

Perhaps her ladyship felt this as she looked at him. True he did not belong to any of the families who might claim to be her equal, and he had not the bearing of a society man, but he looked what he was, a manly man. He had thrown aside his overcoat, and stood in evening dress by Alizon's side. There was nothing small nor weak about him. Both face and form were well moulded. His eyes shone clear and bright, and his words, though spoken under the influence of a great excitement, were those of a man of feeling—a man with the instincts of a gentleman. Even as he stood there, she thought of Arthur Stanley who had sued again and again for Alizon's hand, and to whom she had leant a comparatively willing ear. She mentally compared the two men, physically, intellectually, morally, and she had to admit to herself that in all the true essentials of manhood Stanley was by far inferior to Rutland. Place them side by side in the best of society, and Rutland would attract attention while the other would be ignored. Rutland would claim respect for his intellectual ability, and for his learning, while Stanley would be regarded as a heavy-headed country squire, and she had to admit, too, that the young minister's ideals concerning life were far higher than those of the other. Thus he was far more fitted for a husband for her daughter. She had respected Rutland even when he was Father Sheen's opponent in debate; after she had invited him to the Priory she regarded him still more highly. She had learnt to regard social position at its proper value, and because she was a high-souled woman she realised wherein true aristocracy lay. But this was while she thought of Rutland as simply a possible valuable convert to the faith she loved. Besides, her somewhat advanced social ideas were largely a matter of theory. She had never contemplated putting them into practice in a way that would closely touch her own family life. Admitting Rutland to her house as an interesting and gentlemanly young Protestant who might be converted to the Catholic faith was one thing, considering him as a possible husband for her daughter was another, and so it was impossible to seriously consider the proposal he had made, even although Alizon had yielded to a love that was madness.

"I do not say you are a clown, Mr. Rutland," she said quietly. "But what you ask is impossible, impossible!"

"Why?" asked Rutland.

"There are many reasons why, any one of which would be sufficiently strong to keep me from granting my consent. But I will give one, the one you have felt yourself. You are a Protestant."

"Yes, I am a Protestant," replied Rutland quietly, "but I am sincere in my faith."

"Yes, but Alizon is a Catholic, and while I respect you personally, that is, I have respected you in the past, I could never consent for Alizon to marry a—that is, a man of different faith."

"But, but——" stammered Rutland, and then he stopped. He knew that the revelation which hung upon his lips would be harder to bear, even than the confession of Alizon's love for him.

He tried to speak again, but before his words formulated themselves into a sentence, Alizon fell on her knees at her mother's feet.

"Mother, mother," she sobbed, "forgive me, but I have been obliged to give up my old faith."

"For Me."

To-night I bow before the Son of God
And kiss His feet—once piercéd feet, for me,
On that sad journey up to Calvary
When on Him pressed the cross so heavily.

To-night I clasp the loving hand of Christ,
That dear, strong hand,—once piercéd hand
for me,
That tender clasp speaks to my trembling spirit,
"Child, I will never loose My hold of thee."

To-night I gaze into the face of Christ,
And see therein a smile—a smile for me,
A smile of love, of peace, of pard'ning grace,
Oh! 'neath Thy smile, Lord, may I ever be.

To-night I meet and speak with Christ, my Lord.
I'm all His own, and He is all for me.
Seal now my consecration, King Divine,
Unto Thy service, wherein I am free.

LOUIE WOODCOCK.

A "Famous Scot"—Andrew Melville.

O series of famous Scots would be complete without the name of Andrew Melville—one of the greatest of them all. Nor is this little monograph by Mr. W. Morrison unworthy of the greatness of the subject. Too often Scots reformers have been presented from episcopal or anti-Presbyterian standpoint, with the result of misrepresentation, if not of caricature; here, however, the picture is fairly, even sympathetically, drawn. It is the more welcome, because more natural, for the sprinkling of the salt of the old Scots tongue.

The Scottish Reformation falls into three epochs, the Knox period, when Roman domination in Scotland was overthrown; second, the Melville period, when Presbyterianism was established and asserted itself as the prevailing form of Church order; third, the Covenanting period, culminating in the Revolution of 1688. In the opening act of the great drama the name of John Knox towers above all others; in the second, Andrew Melville may be described as John Knox secundus, a man of far profounder learning and of equal intellectual grasp, keener in debate, and equally fearless—the Hildebrand of Presbytery; not so powerful in the pulpit as Knox, nor had Melville's life the exciting events of his great predecessor's. One thing is clear—but for Melville John Knox's work would have been undone; or, at least, the yoke of episcopacy would have been fastened upon Scotland. Let us not forget that Melville had able and faithful helpers: such as his nephew, James Melville, David Black, Robert Bruce, and others, but his was the master spirit in defeating the plans of King James and his creatures, Lennox and Arran; indeed, it is not too much to say that but for him Scotland would have been lost to evangelical Christianity.

The year of John Knox's entrance upon a public career, 1545, was Andrew Melville's birth-year; his father being laird of Baldorey, hard by Montrose. This boy was the Benjamin of the house, the youngest of nine sons. The father died on the battlefield of Pinkie when the child was four years old; and the death of his mother when he was twelve left him an orphan. Happily he found as good a home as a boy could desire in the Manse of Maryton, where his eldest brother was minister. Angus, as this region was then called, was famous in the annals of the Reformation; here George Wishart was born and reared; here, too, was the estate of Dun, the home of the celebrated John Erskine of Dun; and here John Knox evangelised for months. Among the friendships Andrew formed was a David and Jonathan kind of one with his nephew, James, the eldest son of his eldest brother, who became to Andrew as his right hand—his companion, adviser, and able defender; most of our knowledge of the uncle is from the quaint pen of the nephew.

Andrew's scholarly bent showed itself early. "He was fashioned to much honour from his cradle," as our Shakespeare says. "He was a sicklie, tender boy, and tuk pleasure in nathing sa meikle as his buik." St. Andrew's was his alma mater, and when he finished his curriculum he was known as "the best philosopher, poet, and Grecian, of any young maister in the land." Then followed a long course of study in the most renowned schools of learning in Europe. This wanderjahre stretched out into a decade; all the while he was garnering precious stores of intellectual wealth. If he was sickly as a child, in these years of wandering he acquired a toughness of physical texture and a robustness of health which stood him in good stead throughout his stormy life. Mr. Morrison tells us that "He was short of stature and of great agility, high-spirited, brave, the cheeriest of companions, full of resource in emergencies, and with an artful humour; he could outwalk his friends, and was fresh at the end of a long travel, while they lay down 'lyk tired tykes.'"

On his return to Scotland in 1574, his fame had preceded him; he was offered a court chaplaincy, but he was never the courtier; then came the more congenial option of the Principalship of his own University of St. Andrew's, or that of Glasgow. His heart leant to his alma mater, but Glasgow needed him most, so thither he went. To say that he re-created the different "faculties" of the college, and infused life into them, is to state the barest of facts. Having crowded the class-rooms here, he migrated to the Principalship of St. Andrew's. But he was soon launched out on to the stormy sea of public service; a light like his could not be hid. Scotland was in a chaotic state, socially, politically and ecclesiastically. King James was a boy of eight years; his deposed mother was a prisoner in England; John Knox had been two years in his grave, and the reins of government were in the hands of the avaricious Regent Morton, who resolved to be supreme for his own ends; he further resolved to bring all ecclesiastics under his thumb, and ultimately establish Episcopacy. Although the Roman "Mass system" had been abolished by Parliament, the frame-work remained, the bishops drew their revenues, the parsons were in their manse, and in many places held the churches against the Reformed preachers. Then came Morton's crafty, infamous system of, what some have dubbed as, "Tulchan Bishops." These bishops held office, but the revenue went to Morton and the nobles. History has caught and held the stinging epithet, "Tulchan," which was a stuffed calf set up to make the cow give her milk. To destroy this infamous device Andrew Melville fought for five years. In 1580, not only were diocesan bishops abolished, but "superintendents" went likewise, as being an order above the ministers. It was a wonderful triumph for one man in so short a time, and against king, regents and nobles. James assumed all his kingly powers when he was twelve, though he gave himself and his kingdom into the hands of two favourites, men without a scintilla of conscience or honour, mere adventurers. Esme Stewart became at once Duke of Lennox and Lord High Chancellor, and another Stewart became Earl of Arran. After the "dinging down" of the bishops under Morton came "this bigging (building) of them up" by Lennox and Arran, whose ultimate purpose was the re-imposition of the Roman yoke; and so Melville's process of "dinging down" had to be gone through again. He was on his way to Perth to lay before the boy-king the Assembly's remonstrance against the setting up of the Bishop of Glasgow, when he was told that Lennox and Arran had boasted that if he came to the city they would "have his head." His answer was instant and Luther-like: "I'm nocht fleyed nor feible-spirited in the cause and message of Christ. Come what God please to send, our commission sal be dischargit." The feeling of the country was so strong that they dared not touch him; all through the populace was with him. It was a sight to see him standing in the King's Council resisting the Glasgow bishop's appointment, and laying on the table Articles of liberty. Arran scolded and blustered and threatened, defying him to sign these "treasonable articles" in the presence of the king. Melville turned upon his assailant—"We dar, and will subscrieve them," and as he spoke he took the pen from the clerk, and writing his name, handed the pen to his co-deputies, who signed theirs, and left the attested document on the king's table; no wonder that king, Lennox, Arran, and nobles were dumbfounded.

We pass over the Raid of Ruthven, and the downfall of the two favourites, though Arran recovered his position and power, and with it an intenser hatred against Melville. For a time it seemed as if the battle were going against the Reformers. Arran, under the tyrannical "Black Acts," strove to subdue the Assembly to a mere creature of the king; compelling all ministers to sign an act of submission, and, sad to say, many of them did, and strangest of all, among them was John Erskine, of Dun, and John Craig, Knox's colleague, and even John Durie signed. Disturbances broke out in many places; Glasgow College was closed, and its rector banished; the friends of liberty were in jeopardy; Melville himself was doomed to prison, but escaped to England. To add a still darker shade to the picture, the plague appeared in the larger cities. In this period of darkness chaos reigned; the country was in a ferment; the cause of Reform seemed to be at its lowest ebb, for the king and Arran were bent upon its destruction. This was the darkest part of the night, but it was just before the dawn. The banished nobles and the Border chiefs combined in a movement against Arran, and they marched to Stirling, where the king was, and Arran had to fly. James was ever fickle, and an arrant coward, so that he quickly came to terms. Melville, and the ministers with him, returned and resumed their labours, and had the great satisfaction, after a couple of years' struggle, of wiping out the stain of the Black Acts from the statute book. The king's marriage brought him into one of his angelic moods. The new queen was crowned in Edinburgh with Presbyterian ceremonies; she having been reconciled to Melville, asked him to compose and recite the Coronation Ode. In the Assembly of 1590, the king was almost ecstatic, "He fell furth prasing the Kirk, as the sincerest Kirk in the world. As for our neighbour Kirk in England, it is an ill-said mass, wanting nothing but the lifting." This was but an evanescent mood of one whose real opinion was, No Bishops, no Church. This Scots King Solomon, "the wisest fool in Europe," was doubtless gifted in some respects, but contemptible in most. No one ever despised his blustering on the one hand, or his cajoling on the other as Andrew Melville, and yet he acknowledged the dignity of his position. There is preserved the record of an interview that will live as long as Scottish history survives—the scene in Falkland Palace in 1596. Two months before the king had packed his Parliament with his creatures to condone the rebellion of Huntly and the Popish lords. The Assembly deputed its Moderator, Andrew Melville, and others to remonstrate. James attempted to browbeat the deputies, till "Mr. Andro brak uf upon the king and bure down and outtered the commission as from the mightie God, calling the king bot 'God's sillie vassall;' and taking him by the sleeve, says, throw manie interruptions: 'Sir, we will humblie reverence your Majestie alwayes, namlie in publick, but sen we have this occasion to be with your Majestie in privat, and the truethe is yiear brought in extream danger, bothe of your lyfe and crown, and with you the countrey and Kirk of Chryst is lyk to wrak, for nocht telling yow the truethe, and giffen of yow faithful counsall, we mon discharge our dewtie thairin, or els be traters bothe to Chryst and yow! And thairfor I mon tell yow, thair is twa kings and twa kingdoms in Scotland. Thair is Chryst Jesus the King and His Kingdom the Kirk, whose subject king James the Saxt is, of whose kingdome nocht a king nor a lord, not a heid, but a member. And, sir, when ye were in your swaddling-cloutes, Chryst Jesus rang (reigned) freely in this land in spyte of all His enimies.'"

The king bent before the storm and declared that the Popish lords should get no grace from him.

But nothing could be frailer than King James' word.

It would be interesting to trace the future career of this great, fearless man as he led his band of heroic spirits in their unceasing struggle with king, prelates and courtiers, who by force, by fraud, by bribes and treachery, set up again and again in Scotland what Scotland would not have—the king's diocesan bishops. Melville's was the manliest figure in the celebrated Hampton Court conferences; courteous, yet bold; firm as a rock, yet conceding where concession could be made; as learned as the best of them, yet not pedantic. His stinging wit in a metrical Latin lampoon cost him his liberty for two years, as a prisoner two years in the Tower, where he had Sir Walter Raleigh for fellow-prisoner. In 1611, the irate king so far relented as to grant the prayer of the French Ambassador that Melville might go to the then flourishing Protestant College of Sedan as one of its professors, but he was to see Scotland no more. Ten years of useful teaching followed, and in 1622, when he was seventy-eight, this valiant soldier of Presbyterianism and liberty, was called home to God. To the last his interest in the struggle going on in his native land never abated, nor did his faith in its ultimate success ever decline. In debate, as in learning, he had few equals and no superior; he was tender, beloved and self-forgetting; his weakness was an impetuous spirit and an explosive temper. In explanation he was wont to say, "If my anger is from below, trample upon it; but if from above, let it rise." This much remains—The Church of Scotland would not have been what it was, nor the life of the people either, but for Andrew Melville, and Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier have done well to add him to their "Famous Scots' Series."

The Poet's Dream.

THE poet's dream
Is God's reality,
 Spiritual, but true;
That souls prosaic,
In Divine duality,
 The dream may do.

God shapes His thought,
In other noble minds,
 To finer things attuned,
Minds which with sorrow,
Destiny, and problems deep,
 Have long communed.

All human jar
Will end in harmony
 Eternal, blest.
Life's long weariness
Will reach the high altitude
 Of ceaseless rest.

Beyond life's pain,
In wider spheres, is Universal rhythm:
Behind life's sad gloom
The scarlet cord is seen,
 Sure sign of heaven.

SPURGEON'S TABERNACLE. BEFORE THE FIRE.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

VIII.—THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE:

PASTOR SPURGEON AND HIS PREDECESSORS.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

THE church worshipping at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Newington, has an unbroken history of nearly three centuries. It was born in South London, and exercised a beneficial influence upon the successive generations of artisans who lived in congested Southwark. The pastors who presided over the welfare of the church were divines of considerable ability, and were distinguished for their literary gifts and contributions to the realm of literature, as well as for their preaching power. Mr. Spurgeon, who has been described as "the last of the Puritans," was a worthy successor of the able men who had preceded him, and was in "labours more abundant."

As far back as the stormy period of the Stuart kings, the densely-populated district of Southwark was a well-known Nonconformist neighbourhood, and was a stronghold of the Baptists. During the Commonwealth the Anabaptists publicly immersed their converts in the royal river at various secluded places which then existed in an easterly direction from London Bridge. The erection of buildings and the increase of the population on the southern bank of the Thames interfered with this religious custom. In the closing years of the seventeenth century, a plain-looking structure, known as the Baptistery, with dressing-rooms attached thereto, was erected in Horselydown, which became the favourite place for the practice of adult immersion for the residents of South London. The street leading from the main thoroughfare to the Baptistry, was locally known as "Dipping Alley." In the year 1717, the Baptistry was re-built, and occasionally was used as a meeting-house for the faithful preaching of the Gospel.

In the year 1668, the Rev. Benjamin Keach became the pastor of one of the oldest Nonconformist Churches in Southwark, and which was the predecessor of the congregation worshipping at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. Immediately following the Declaration of Indulgence to Dissenters which was proclaimed by King Charles II. in the year 1672, Keach erected an unpretentious meeting-house in Goat's Yard, Horselydown, of which he held the pastorate until 1704. The spacious chapel provided accommodation for a thousand worshippers, and was fronted with an open courtyard that was bounded by a brick wall. An avenue of sweet-scented limes stretched from the massive iron gates of the outer boundary to the principal entrance of the chapel.

During the later Stuart period singing was not allowed in Nonconformist meeting-houses. Some persons have supposed that the absence of song from religious worship was caused by a sense of fear on the part of the congregation that the sounds of praise might be overheard by the enemies of Nonconformity and might possibly lead to imprisonment or other punishments. The objection to congregational singing, however, was based upon principle, and not the mere dread of penal consequences. The objectors strongly maintained that only spiritually-minded persons should sing the songs of Zion. They regarded it as blasphemy for the unconverted to be permitted to join in the chorus of sacred song. This important question led to a great deal of controversy, and the publishing of a number of strongly-worded pamphlets. Benjamin Keach was drawn into the contention, and he maintained that all the persons comprising a congregation should be permitted to sing if they desired. The church over which he presided became split into factions, and ultimately compromised the matter in the following singular manner. During the psalmody, those worshippers who objected to congregational singing ostensibly left the chapel and meditated in solemn silence among the tombs in the adjoining grave-yard, and then re-entered the chapel after what they objected to was finished.

Benjamin Keach was a popular divine, a voluminous writer, and an able controversialist. He will be long remembered as the author of the well-known "Key to Open Scripture Metaphors," and "Travels of True Godliness," which, according to one authority, "have been read by myriads" of heaven-bound pilgrims. Keach was specially complimented by the Archbishop of Canterbury for his timely tractate on "The Jewish Sabbath Abrogated," which was an able reply to certain persons who were trying to unsettle the minds of God's people with their Jewish teaching that the Saturday and not Sunday was the true Sabbath. For publishing his "Child's Instructor," he was cruelly sentenced to stand in the shameful pillory, which was one of the brutal punishments of a bygone generation. Dunton graphically represented the fearless Keach as being mounted upon an Apocalyptic beast, with Babylon before him, Zion behind him, and a hundred thousand infuriated bulls and savage bears roaring and ramping around him.

At the expiration of the lease, the Goat's Yard Chapel became a cooperage, and afterwards was utilised as a blacksmith's forge. In the year 1757, the congregation migrated to a chapel which they had erected in Carter Lane, off Tooley Lane, and beneath the shadow of the Parish Church of St. Olave in crowded Southwark.

Keach was followed by his son-in-law, the Rev. Benjamin Stinton. At his death he was succeeded in 1720, by the Rev. John Gill, whose memorable pastorate was protracted until the year 1771. Dr. Gill was one of the most learned ministers of the Baptist Church, and one of the foremost divines of his day. He was born in the year 1697 at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, a town famous for having enjoyed the powerful ministry of the Tollers, and as the birthplace of the modern missionary societies. At an early age John Gill commenced his education at the Kettering Grammar School, where he made the acquaintance of the classical writers. His school career was curtailed by his refusal to attend the services at the Parish Church. Gill had a quenchless thirst for the acquisition of human knowledge in its varied branches. It was his custom to spend a few hours every week in the shop of a Kettering bookseller, whose establishment was only opened on market-days. It was there where he first read the learned writings of the Fathers and the Biblical scholars of past generations. So regular was his attendance at this particular establishment that the market people in proverbial phraseology, in making an affirmation respecting their wares, would say, "As surely as Gill is in the bookseller's shop." In his youthhood an application was made to the authorities of the Mile End Academy, London, for his admission to that training institution, with a view to his becoming a Nonconformist minister. The Principal, however, refused to admit him because he appeared to be a prodigy of learning, and was too precocious for his years. Nothing daunted by their refusal, Gill supported himself as a weaver, and found time and opportunities to study Hebrew and Greek literature. He established his fame as a preacher of the Gospel while resident at Higham Ferrers in his native county. From this sequestered town his reputation reached the Metropolis, and he was cordially invited to preside over the Goat Yard's congregation, and he subsequently removed with them to Carter Lane. Gill was fortunate enough to become acquainted with the Rev. John Skepp, who ministered to a dissenting congregation in Cripplegate, and who was a Hebrew scholar of considerable repute. At the death of his friend, Gill purchased a large portion of his patron's library, including volumes of Rabbinical literature and other noted books in the different branches of divinity. Gill mastered the Talmud and the Targums in the original, and carefully read the ancient commentaries thereon; and also made himself acquainted with the writings of the early Fathers of the Christian Church.

During the years 1746-60 he published in nine huge volumes his "Exposition of the Old and New Testament." This massive work is greatly prized by readers of Calvinistic tendencies. The work was spoken of by the celebrated John Ryland as "an ocean of divinity;" while on the other hand, the distinguished Robert Hall sarcastically denounced it as being "a continent of mud." As an acknowledgment of the satisfactory completion of this great undertaking, the heads of Marischal College, Aberdeen, conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. When Dr. Gill was congratulated by his admirers on this distinction, he characteristically replied: "I neither thought it, nor bought it, nor sought it." Dr. Gill wielded the pen of a ready writer. It is said of his untiring industry, that although his folio volumes would fill ten thousand printed quarto pages, he never employed an amanuensis in preparing his copy for the printers. Every detail of his numerous writings was prepared with his own hands. His literary and general activity surprised even his most intimate friends. In addition to his work as a littérateur he had the care of a large pastorate, he was frequently preaching on special occasions, and at times was in the throes of keen doctrinal controversy with Whitby, Wesley, and other distinguished defenders of Arminian theology.

Like his predecessor Gill sometimes came into conflict with his congregation respecting the tunes and the singing. An elderly dame complained to the doctor that the clerk, who received forty shillings per year for his services as precentor, had the audacity to introduce two new tunes in the course of three years. Dr. Gill listened to her objections and then quietly asked: "Sister, what tunes would you like us to sing?" to which she innocently replied: "I should very much like David's tunes." To which Dr. Gill replied, "Well, if you will get David's tunes for us we will try and sing them."

Dr. Gill, like many other religious leaders of his time, was fearless in maintaining his principles and stating his convictions. When he was warned that if he followed a certain line of conduct it would entail loss upon him; he nobly replied: "Do not tell me of losing. I value nothing in comparison with Gospel truth. I am not afraid to be poor, neither am I afraid of the reproaches of men, I have been injured to them from my youth upwards."

This sturdy Calvinistic divine died at Camberwell, London, in October, 1771, being in the seventy-fifth year of his age. The pulpit from which he faithfully preached is sacredly kept at the Pastor's College, and Dr. Gill's study chair was placed in the vestry at the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

Some two years after Dr. Gill's death, the musical-loving and accomplished Dr. Rippon accepted the pastorate of Carter Lane. For sixty-three years he ministered to the congregation until his death, which took place in the year 1836, at the advanced age of eighty-five. It is worthy of note that his congregation and their forebears—from the years 1720 until 1836, had only two pastors presiding over the interests of the church during the long period of one hundred and sixteen years.

During the ministry of Dr. Rippon at Carter's Lane, the singing, which had been a source of perplexity to his predecessors, was vastly improved. He compiled a selection of hymns which became supplementary to the well-known collection of Dr. Watts. He also issued a tune-book which became a general favourite in the chapel orchestras of his day. He edited "The Baptist Annual Register," and in 1803 he projected a "History of Bunhill Fields," which was to be published in six volumes. Although he had spent ten years in research and the elaboration of his materials, yet he did not meet with sufficient encouragement from the general public to guarantee the issuing of his valuable manuscripts.

An amusing incident which occurred in the presence of royalty indicates the fearless character of Dr. Rippon. On the recovery from sickness of George III., he was appointed to read a congratulatory address on behalf of the Nonconformists.

With his accustomed clear utterance, and in his usual forceful manner, the doctor read on, until he came to a sentence making a special reference to the goodness of God in the king's providential deliverance from death, and restoration to health, when he suddenly paused, and said, "Please your Majesty, we will read that again," and then in an intrepid manner he repeated the sentence with special emphasis. His biographer remarks that "no other man in the denomination would have thought of doing such a thing; but from Rippon it came so naturally that no one condemned him, or, if they did it would have had no effect upon him."

Shortly before Dr. Rippon's death Carter Street Baptist Meeting-house was demolished in making the approaches to New London Bridge. In 1833 Dr. Rippon and his congregation migrated to New Park Street Chapel, so called after Southwark Park, the ancient palace and gardens of the Bishops of Winchester.

Dr. Rippon was succeeded at New Park Street by the literary-gifted Dr. Joseph Angus, who in 1849 became president of Stepney College. He published a series of educational works, including "The Bible Handbook," "The Handbook of English Literature," and also edited and analysed a popular edition of Butler's "Analogy." He was a member of several learned societies, and for many years was examiner in English subjects at the London University and for the Civil Service candidates.

In the early fifties, through a variety of circumstances, the congregation at New Park Street had become reduced to fewer than two hundred persons. The church, which had an unbroken history of over two centuries, and which had been presided over by a succession of ministers of more than average ability, was nearly extinct. In the year 1853, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, then unknown to fame, was invited to preach in New Park Street Chapel with a view to the vacant pastorate. The youth from the country was entertained at a boarding-house, and put to sleep "in a cupboard over the front door." On the Sabbath morning he went with fear and trembling to the deserted chapel. On his arrival at the vestry he sat down in Dr. Gill's chair and exclaimed, "He must needs go through Samaria." On that memorable Sabbath he preached at New Park Street, which had a seatage capacity for twelve hundred persons, to ninety worshippers. The ministry of the "saucy young rascal" was so highly appreciated for its unconventionality that he was invited to occupy the pulpit of New Park Street for a period of six months. "With young Spurgeon in the pulpit the congregation soon increased from 200 to 1,200, and ere many months, the sight of a huge crowd in New Park Street unable to obtain admission to the chapel was seen every Sunday."

Within twelve months New Park Street Chapel had to be enlarged to hold eighteen hundred people. During the structural alterations, Mr. Spurgeon conducted services in Exeter Hall. In the autumn of 1856 the services were held in the Surrey Gardens Music Hall. At the first service conducted by Mr. Spurgeon, some twelve thousand persons filled the spacious building. A vast throng stood outside the entrance doors, and large crowds of would-be worshippers were unable even to enter the Gardens. During the service, and from various parts of the building, there arose simultaneously the cry of "Fire, Fire. The galleries are giving way! The place is falling!" Mr. Spurgeon tried to allay their fears, but the attempt was fruitless. The audience was panic-stricken, and made for the doors. Seven persons were unfortunately killed, and many others were seriously injured. The foundation stone of the Metropolitan Tabernacle was laid by Sir Morton Peto, in August, 1859, and the huge sanctuary was opened for religious worship in March, 1861. The cost was over £31,000, and the chapel provided accommodation for several thousand worshippers. Mr. Spurgeon had a church membership of over five thousand believers. During his lifetime, the Tabernacle was a hive of agencies and institutions for the reclamation of the lapsed masses, and the salvation of degraded humanity. On the morning of Monday, February 1, 1892, the English-speaking world was shocked with the news of Spurgeon's death, which had taken place at Mentone. He was succeeded by his devoted son, Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, and another Metropolitan Tabernacle is taking the place of the one that was destroyed by fire.

The Shelf of Honour ;

OR, BOOKS THAT HAVE MOVED ME.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH RITSON, AUTHOR OF "LOST AND WON," ETC.

"THE OLD DOMINION."

YES, this book has won a place on the Shelf of Honour. If I am to give the reasons I should say, first of all, it has moved me as few books have been able to do. Of course, a book must be interesting to do that. Well, "The Old Dominion" held me almost from the beginning. Once fairly begun, it was more difficult to lay down than any book I have read in recent years. So difficult, in fact, that it led me for once to depart from the rule that fiction is only to be read at odd times as a recreation. I did not sit up to read it, for I never do that for anything, either of the nature of literary work or sermonising. But I did read it when I ordinarily do serious work, and at hours of the day not usually devoted to recreation. It was a hot day, and I was not in very good form, so I made a holiday of it, and read "The Old Dominion." The fact that the effect was distinctly bracing should count for righteousness. Any book that does that, especially on a hot day, and when you are a trifle lazy, must be esteemed a boon and a blessing to men. But this by the way ; I was saying "The Old Dominion" possesses the merit of being interesting. But it is more than that—enthraling. There are chapters which make you hold your breath ; the interest is so intense as to be almost painful. Page after page you are hovering on the mysterious border-line which separates pleasure and pain. That the result of the whole is satisfactory may be gathered from the fact that when you lay the book down you do so with regret, wishing it could all come over again. Nay, more, you are compelled to pay the author the rare compliment of re-reading some of the finest passages.

Some of the elements of interest in the story are of the nature of reminiscence. It recalls some of the most thrilling experiences of one's early years. Who does not remember the feelings with which he read "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and "The White Slave"? Well, here we are in the early slave days, and when the slaves were white as well as black. And who does not recall with a thrill the stories of the Red Indians he read long ago, when he wandered amid the vast solitudes of the far West, hunted and fished, and fought and tracked with "The Last of the Mohicans," and many other noble savage whose disastrous chances, moving accidents, and hair-breadth 'scapes, kept him spell-bound by the hour. They will all come back as he reads of "the great chief" Monakatoeka, and follows him through the vast wilderness, seeking with Godfrey Landless, the lost Patricia. Then can any reader of "Old Mortality" forget how his wonder grew as he read the marvellous speeches of Habakkuk Mucklewraith, or Poundtext, or old Mause Headrigg. As he reads the harangues of the Muggletonian Win-Grace Porringer, he will be ready to admit that they would not have done discredit to the great Sir Walter himself. Oh yes, the book is interesting, and recalls some of the best traditions of the Puritan age under entirely new conditions.

The scene of the story is laid in Virginia in the days of the second Charles. There was much in the life of the time that was picturesque and romantic. The original settlers were more Royalist than the king, and more British than the stay-at-home Britons themselves. If they had acquiesced in the Commonwealth, it was sullenly and perforce. The Restoration was hailed with the utmost enthusiasm, and the man who betrayed any sympathy with the Oliverians exposed himself to insult and opprobrium. But if picturesque and romantic, life on the tobacco plantations of Virginia was not without its disadvantages. Slavery was already well established as an institution, and in addition to the negroes, there was a considerable contingent of white slaves. Virginia was the convict Colony of the time, and political offenders and common criminals were transported from England to wear out their lives under the lash of the overseer on the tobacco plantations. The horrors of the long and terrible voyage across the Atlantic, when the convicts were herded like beasts in the hold, and fought with each other for the rotten food thrown to them, are incidentally indicated in the course of the story. We have glimpses, too, of the stirring times of the Civil war; but it is with the life of the time in Virginia that "The Old Dominion" mainly concerns itself. The ruling class, from the Governor downwards, is sketched with great vividness, skill and insight. In the person of Sir Charles Carew, who is on a visit to the Colony, we get a glimpse of the exquisite of the period such as abounded in the Court of Charles II. The sketch, however, is not lacking in either sympathy or generosity. This Court gallant, with his lace ruffles and pretty speeches, may be shallow and heartless in many ways, and may reveal the possession of most of the vices of his time, but he has all the punctilious sense of honour of the Cavalier, and a good share of British pluck. He has all the insouciance, not to say insolence, of the fine gentleman, but he is a really pretty swordsman, and in spite of prejudice, is capable of recognising nobleness when he sees it.

Colonel Verney may be said to stand for the planter of the period, though perhaps of the better class. A typical English aristocrat of the time he is, bluff, honest, genial, and though not intentionally cruel, is yet in a certain degree callous in regard to the sufferings of his slaves. The negroes may have souls, but in the main they must be treated as mere animals. The white slaves are gaol-birds and scoundrels of the most degraded type, and must be ruled with an iron hand. No distinction is made between criminals of the worst class and the political offender, whose only offence probably is his avowed Puritan sympathies. He, indeed, is an object of special contempt and detestation. The feeling entertained towards slaves of this class may be gathered from the fact that the Governor of the Colony actually fights a duel with Major Carrington, the Surveyor-General, because he finds in that gentleman's library a number of works of a Puritanical flavour. The Governor's soliloquy, as he surveys the Major's library all alone, is highly amusing. He begins in high good humour, but ends in a rage. "H'm, what has he here?" soliloquised his Excellency. "'Purchas; His Pilgrimes,' of course; 'General History of Virginia,' 'New England and the Summer Isles,' well and good; 'Good News from Virginia,' humph! that must have been before my time; 'Public Good without Private Interest,' humph! What's this? 'Areopagitica,' John Milton. John Hypocrite and Parricide! A pretty author and a pretty cause he advocates,—I thank God there are no schools and no printing presses in this colony, nor are like to be,—and a courageous Surveyor-General to keep by him such pestilent stuff in the present year of grace. 'Abuses, Stript and Whipt,' 'Anglia Rediviva,' 'Diary of Nehemiah Wallington,' 'Bastwick's Litany.' Miles Carrington, Miles Carrington! I have my eye on thee! Thou hadst need to walk warily. 'Zion's Plea against Prelacy,' . . ."

At this point the Governor's language became almost too forcible to be chronicled on this page. How a convict of the Puritan type fared may be imagined. The slaves sometimes ran away, but were hunted with bloodhounds and generally brought back to a last state immeasurably worse than the first. We have glimpses of the conviviality of the period, and every phase of the life of the time is represented.

The interest of the story centres mainly in the hero and heroine. The heroine is Colonel Verney's beautiful daughter, Patricia, who may be said to represent the average attitude of the womankind of the ruling class towards the slaves. Patricia Verney on her first introduction to the reader will strike him as thoughtless rather than heartless. She shares all the prejudices of her class not only in relation to the negroes, but in regard to the round-heads and Oliverians who had played so prominent a part in the civil wars and the Commonwealth. She has never had a glimpse of the real principles for which the Puritans fought, still less of the inherent nobleness of their character. How could she, brought up in such an atmosphere! For the negroes she has much the same feeling as for a favourite animal. But she has no such tolerance for the white slaves of her father's plantation. From them she shrinks with loathing and detestation. This too, is not surprising when it is remembered that the majority of these slaves were of the most brutal and degraded type. In character and appearance they were in complete contrast with the refinement and beauty of the Colonel's daughter.

And yet they were not all alike. Now and then a man was shipped off to the plantations of whom the world was not worthy; who was guilty of no crime; whose tastes and instincts were those of a gentleman, and who managed to pass through the terrible ordeal of Newgate and the voyage untainted and untamed. Godfrey Landless, the hero, was of this type. His father, Warham Landless, had been one of the heroes of the Civil war, and he himself, while yet a stripling, had fought by his father's side in the army of the Parliament at Worcester. The whirligig of time had brought an enemy his opportunity of revenge, and entangled in the mesh of circumstance, young Landless found himself a convicted felon; innocent, yet utterly unable to prove his innocence. But his dauntless spirit nothing could subdue, and his proud mien, even amid the degrading circumstances of the voyage, had provoked the dislike of Sir Charles Carew, who sailed as a passenger in the same ship. It was a case of mutual antagonism, and the young Court favourite found opportunity for showing his supercilious contempt for the unfortunate convict. It often enough happens that even a brief voyage will suffice to generate singularly strong likes and dislikes among the passengers, but Sir Charles Carew was a favoured passenger, between whom and the convicts fighting for the wretched morsels of food thrown to them, a wide gulf yawned. Sir Charles had had occasion to mention this particular convict to his cousin, the beautiful Patricia, among the incidents of the voyage, and great was his surprise when among a batch of newly-purchased slaves which arrived shortly afterwards on the plantation, he recognised the man who had been by some curious antagonism his pet aversion.

Among the first sights Landless beheld on his arrival at the plantation was his master's daughter. He has been summoned to appear before the Colonel on landing to receive a brief lecture, and to be dismissed to his appointed quarters. His eyes fall on Mistress Patricia Verney, who has just decked herself in the finery she has for some time been expecting by the vessel which has brought her father and his newly-purchased slaves. Her sweetness and beauty impressed him so deeply that he stood for the moment spellbound. His broken heart went out to her, and if he reasoned at all in that moment it was to the effect that one so sweet and beautiful could not fail to pity him in his sad estate. Presently she becomes conscious of his intent gaze, and shrinks from him as she would from a mad dog. Sir Charles Carew finds his opportunity in the girl's manifest alarm to inflict a fresh humiliation on the convict, and so Landless begins his life on the plantation with a stern reprimand from his master.

The first day on the tobacco field makes Landless acquainted with two very different individuals, both destined, however, to exert a powerful influence over his future. One is a Red Indian, whose life he saves by promptly sucking the poison from the bite of a rattlesnake. Monakatocka never forgives an enemy, or forgets a friend, and we feel sure we shall meet him again. The other acquaintance is the Muggletonian, a Puritan fanatic, who that night introduces him to a man who turns out to be at the head of a conspiracy for overturning the existing order and establishing a republic. Robert Godwyn is a man of a refined and beautiful character, driven to desperation by the suffering and cruelty around him. His dream is a noble one, but he had to work with terribly uncertain instruments, which made the danger of detection very great. Landless shrinks from identifying himself with the plot. He has not tasted the full bitterness of slavery, and the others rightly conclude that as soon as the iron enters his soul his hesitation will be thrown to the winds. And they had not long to wait. Almost immediately afterwards Landless had his first experience of the whipping post. This degradation was brought upon him by Sir Charles Carew. Owing to the pressure of circumstances, Colonel Verney was under the necessity of employing the new convict as his secretary one day, and when acting in this capacity, Landless was the unwilling observer of an interesting scene between Sir Charles Carew and Patricia. The young gallant, having fallen in love with his cousin, declared his love, and proposed in the most approved style of the time. His impassioned proposal was received with amusement by the young lady, who had by no means made up her mind about her cousin. Then it was the discomfited swain discovered the presence of the Colonel's secretary. In the altercation which followed, Sir Charles insulted the memory of Landless's father, and the son rewarded him with a blow between the eyes. For this he was, of course, flogged. We do not witness the actual flogging. With fine insight the author describes it by means of the pantomimic and expressive account given of it by a poor mad woman. The iron indeed entered the soul of Godfrey Landless, and making a superhuman effort "the man of the breaking heart," as mad Margery called him, dragged himself that night to the chief conspirator and accepted the task of leading the enterprise.

Almost immediately afterwards, Robert Godwyn is murdered by a convict for the sake of some money he possessed, and the entire burden of the insurrection falls on the shoulders of Landless.

But before the fatal day arrives, it was his lot to take charge of the sailing boat in which the wilful Patricia goes to visit a friend. She was very angry when she found that Landless had been sent on this service, but there was no help for it. A terrific storm arose, and for hours the boat was in the direst peril. Only the skill and energy of Landless saved it from utter destruction. The proud Patricia received a humbling, and was thankful to escape with her life in the arms of the detested convict. And now begins as stirring a story as could well be desired. Seldom, indeed, have such tremendous barriers stood in the way of a man who loved. The task of subjugating the proud heart of Patricia looks utterly impossible. And when some little progress has been made, untoward events happen, and Patricia spurns the man she had come to believe innocent, and denounces him as a traitor and a liar. Through the terrible scenes of the insurrection, and the attack of the Indians, Landless is the good genius of the Verney family, and more than once stands between both Patricia and Sir Charles Carew and the death which threatened them.

And yet in spite of it all, he is branded as the leader of the conspiracy, and of that offence nothing can apparently purge him. When he would fain accompany the expedition which is setting out to rescue the lost Patricia from the hands of her Indian captors, he is contemptuously seized and bound and handed over to justice. But his old friend, the Indian Monakatocka, intervenes, and he escapes to take up the search on his own account. For days Landless and the Indian tracked the party of the half-caste who had carried off the Colonel's daughter. They have many strange adventures, but at last come up with the party, and carry off the maiden. In the return journey, Monakatocka met his fate as became an Indian brave, and then Landless was left to prosecute his journey with his charge alone. That journey is one of the most thrilling and beautiful stories we have ever read. It is not merely that the travellers are beset with perils from which it seems sometimes impossible to escape, but their relations invest the situation with an interest of the most touching kind. Fiction abounds with narratives of the triumph of love over circumstances, but none surpassing in pathetic interest the subjugation of the proud Patricia. And the end? Ah! the end must not be revealed here. The reader will prefer to wait for that till he reads the book for himself.

Yes; this is among the books that have moved me. Its pathos is at times poignant, and running through it is the spirit which makes for righteousness and truth and honour. The book is not without its blemishes, of course. There are improbabilities here and there, but these are not of such a kind as to interfere with the essential truth and reality of the picture. The story is in parts painful reading, but it is told with such charm and distinction of style that the pain is forgotten in the pleasure, and the insight and delicacy with which the subjugation of Patricia is told would redeem even an inferior story. But "The Old Dominion" is not an inferior story, and we shall look with unusual interest for the successors of this apparently first book, on which Mary Johnstone is to be warmly congratulated.

Bible Emblems.

II.—THE TREE OF LIFE: IN THE GARDEN AND IN THE CITY.

REES are the patriarchs of the vegetable world. The earliest symbolic objects mentioned in the Bible are trees. "The tree of life in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil." Since the early morning of the earth the mysterious "tree of life" has fascinated the people of the East. On the most ancient monuments it is found depicted. It played a great part in the ancient religions. The Babylonians regarded it as specially the symbol of immortality. It is significant that our Christian Bible begins with a "tree of life," and ends with one. In Genesis its locality is a garden; in Revelation it is found growing in the streets of a wondrous city. Human history began in a garden; it will end in a city. The first man began life amid scenes of enchanting beauty, and marvellous freedom. "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but—" Well, God must reserve something,— "Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it. . . ." The meaning of this restriction is not far to seek. All created life is limited.

This tree showed man where to stop; but man will not stop, he will touch the fenced-off tree, he craved for fuller knowledge, and he got it; but at what tremendous cost! At once he brought the knowledge of good and evil within the horizon of his experience. "And God drove out the man." Expulsion from Paradise is ever the outcome of disobedience. There is no going back to eat of the mystic "tree of life;" it is for ever safely guarded by the flaming sword. Man can never more go back to wander amid the soft glades of an earthly paradise. Its very site is unknown; weary pilgrims seek it in vain; poets dream of it among Persian bowers, or in some isle of the Western seas. It cannot be found. Its geography is unknown. But to redeemed humanity the vanished Eden re-appears again in vision; only its position is changed. It lies no longer in the past, but in the future. It re-appears not in a fenced-off garden, but in the very streets of a free and glorious city. No "crooked serpent" is seen in the vision of that city of "gold and gems and jewels." No fatal tree of "knowledge of good and evil" is yonder; the citizens have known evil enough—now they know it no more,—they know the Lord. Eden is to be surpassed. It was only a symbol of something better. Futurity is to transcend antiquity. The best is to come at the last. The boundary line has closed behind, but to redeemed humanity the view opens before and discloses "far up the dark glade of earth the gate of heaven." It is a glorious vision that opens to expelled humanity; "In the midst of the street of the city, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." Wonderful city! Where is its location? Is it heaven? or is it the Church of God on earth in its ideal meaning, and its ideal attainment? We take it to be a symbolic picture of the spiritual power and grandeur which God has destined for the earth. "John saw this same glorious city,—the New Jerusalem descending out of heaven upon earth. It is here now, not fully manifested, lying in the shadow cast by sin, hindered, limited, opposed by the forces of evil; but the end is not yet." We see not the fair outline of the city of glory that is to be; it is hidden by the dust of battle and the clouds of sin. The end, however, is sure. Let the Church of God calm her heart. God is leading the world step by step in an upward path of progress; He is day by day "pushing His fences back," and taking in more territory. The area of light is widening, the darkness is being shot through with ruddy light. True, the first Paradise was a garden and the first Adam cultivated it. But that was the beginning of things; not the end. It was the faint outline; not the finished picture: the throbbing seed, not the golden harvest. "The first Paradise was a corner of the planet; the second shall stretch

'from where the rising sun salutes the morn,
To where he lays his head of glory on the rocking deep.'

The first had two tenants; the second shall be peopled with ransomed millions: the first perished; the second abides for ever. That eternal, deathless life from which Adam was debarred by sin, Christ by His death has made accessible. The flaming sword which guarded it from man's approach has been bathed in the blood of Immanuel, and now it can no longer shut us out of Paradise. "Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have right to the tree of life." "Right!" Oh, wondrous transformation! The sword of justice has been turned to our defence, so that instead of driving us away from the tree of life, it guards our approach thereto. We have a right to the tree of life, to its leaves of healing. The chief work of the Church of God is not to cultivate spiritual life, but to diffuse it—to take the healing leaves to the nations.

"We are to be the makers of the new city, and God has given us the old city as the material out of which we are to make the new. It is ours to transform the earthly city so that it shall be glorified into the heavenly. "Go ye into all the world,—into all its kingdoms, into all its cities, into the innermost heart of its life, with the healing leaves." The dead-hand of the monastic idea must for ever be shaken off. Not away from the world, but into the world we must carry the healing forces of life; they must not be fenced off, made inaccessible, but must be free, open, accessible, available. Not in a fenced-off garden, but in the midst of a city is the tree of life situated. There grows the true Arbor Vitæ—the tree of life whose leaves are for healing. It is one of the daylight facts of Natural History that the leaves of our forest trees are the sanitary agents of the world; they are the great purifiers of the atmosphere. Without them carbonic acid gas would soon accumulate to such an extent that human life would be impossible. Every tree in the forest is an aerial fountain pouring life-giving oxygen into the air. Purity comes through the leaves of the glorious trees. The air we breathe to-day in Britain has been purified perhaps 1,000 miles away. The Scandinavian birches send their healing breath on the north wind; the west wind brings perfumed purity from the magnolias of North America, and the orange groves send their tribute on the wings of the south wind. As the leaves of the trees are the purifiers of nature, so the leaves of the tree of life heal what they touch. Evil influences (like the fatal carbonic acid gas) are being poured night and day into the moral atmosphere; it is laden with dense, sulphurous, deadly fumes. But there is another element (spiritual oxygen) being richly and copiously distributed. Spiritual influences, healing forces, are sweetening, arresting, neutralising and overcoming the deadly poisons. The spiritual forces are dominant. The world's best thinkers, statesmen, poets, artists, musicians, workers,—the creative forces of life,—the moving, determining, formative influences, are purifying the moral atmo-

Autumn.

Thou comest, Autumn, heralded by the rain,
With banners, by great gales incessant fanned,
Brighter than brightest silks of Samarcand,
And stately oxen harnessed to thy wain!
Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,
Upon thy bridge of gold; thy royal hand
Outstretched with benedictions o'er the land,
Blessing the farms through all thy vast domain!

Thy shield is the red harvest-moon suspended
So long beneath the heaven's o'er-hanging eaves;
Thy steps are by the farmer's prayers attended;
Like flames upon an altar shine the sheaves;
And, following thee, in thy ovation splendid,
Thine almoner, the wind, scatters the

sphere of our world. Every saved man and woman is a breathing, healing leaf. Christianised personality is telling on the ideas, institutions, peoples of the world. The nations are to be healed by the leaves of the tree of life. It is from the tree of life that social sickness, moral disease must be healed. Not by political constitutions, not by social reformations, not by scientific experiments, are the world's ills to be cured, but by the potency of spiritual forces. Patience. Give God time. The ideal shall be realised by and by.

To raise a new city cannot be done in a moment, even where the ground is clear. There are broken walls and "heaps of rubbish" to clear away. Ignorance, sin, vice, blasphemy, superstition, are to be overcome. Though the vision tarry, wait for it. It is worth all our waiting for. The tragedy of the world's sorrow shall end; the beast shall vanish, the hissing of the serpent cease, the dragon shall be bound, the tempest hushed; the dust of battle shall settle, the air be cleared. Then the light shall shine and the pinnacles of the New Jerusalem come into view. That is God's holy city. Life is blessed in that city. There shall be no more curse, no more sorrow, neither crying, nor pain. What is this? The new spiritual civilisation. Then shall the triumphant anthem break forth in the east like the opening of the morning; it shall come back from the west in waves of joy; it shall pass down from the north and come up from the south; it shall ascend from the earth and peal down from the heavens,—"Hallelujah! The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, and He shall reign for ever and ever."

The garden has vanished; the glorious city abides for aye!

ALFRED J. CAMPBELL.

Keswick Convention, 1899.

HE Keswick week" is now a familiar phrase all over this land, and in many others, for it calls up the memory of wonderful spiritual blessing obtained by many hundreds of Christian workers, alike at home and in distant parts of the world. It was with high expectancy we joined a ministerial brother to attend this notable Convention, which gains in interest, magnitude and spiritual results year by year. Our expectations were more than realised. We were impressed by the large concourse of people who attended. Every available portion of accommodation in Keswick itself was secured, together with whatever up-put could be obtained in the outskirt villages. We were fortunate in being domiciled with a happy company in a little colony of tents that had been provided under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. of Penrith; and there, surrounded by a panorama of beauty in lake, wood and crag, redolent of inspiring memories of the lake poets and philosophers, we greatly enjoyed—spite of occasional gusts of the night winds—our romantic sojourn. But we had come for the "Convention," and were conscious of deeper yearnings than nature or poetry could satisfy. The large tent, holding from three to four thousand people, was constantly crowded, and overflowed meetings in various buildings were simultaneously held. Probably throughout the progress of the week about 10,000 persons attended the various services. This was the twenty-fifth annual meeting, and it proved a worthy and memorable semi-jubilee. The note of catholicity was in the ascendant, and the visitor's eye was greeted by the striking motto over the tent-entrance, "All one in Christ Jesus." It was the Pentecostal sign—the manifest of that deep unity of the spiritual life which is as an experience the unfailing accompaniment of the Holy Spirit's presence. This was also a marked feature in the addresses. Thirty-seven were given at the chief meetings by Church of England bishops and clergy, and an equal number by Nonconformist ministers and laymen, and these were all permeated and controlled by one and the same spirit, and gave beautiful and harmonious expression to the "one faith." While, of course, we believe that where "the twos and threes" meet together in faith and prayer, there is the Master and there is the Church, it is none the less significant of the times that the denominations are coming together in holy conclave for the quickening and for the expression of spiritual life, and that the federation of Evangelical Churches is a happy accomplishment of the hour. The "Keswick week" is an impressive witness to the craving for fellowship and social worship in Evangelical Christendom on a larger scale than has heretofore been witnessed in the century; and we believe that this extensive and visible aspect of union and fellowship may be taken as the sign of an intensive and yet deepening work of the Spirit of God among the many thousands of Israel.

We do not plead for outward resemblances and organic ecclesiastical sameness. That may long remain among the impossibles of earth, but we must welcome a phenomenon like that of Keswick as a wholesome and hopeful sign, a factor of enrichment and progress in the Christian Churches.

We recognised such familiar leaders as Revs. E. H. Hopkins, (Editor of the "Life of Faith"), C. A. Fox, Dr. Elder Cumming, Prebendary Webb-Peploe, F. B. Meyer, G. H. C. McGregor, J. Webster, and others. This year's Convention was specially interesting on account of the large number of Scottish preachers who attended for the first time, such as Dr. A. Whyte, Principal Rainy, Professor Laidlaw and Dr. John Smith, Edinburgh. Principal Rainy gave it as his firm conviction that such teaching as he had heard at the Convention was much to be desired for Scotland at the present time. To us it was a special delight to listen at a ministers' gathering to Professor Laidlaw, of the Free Church College, Edinburgh. He possesses great intellectual gifts, is a most able and fresh expositor of the Word, and is deeply and fervently spiritual. Dr. John Smith, whom we also heard, was quite himself, and at his best, which is saying much. We should have been equally glad to hear the other Scottish leaders, and we regard their association with the movement as a distinct gain. Prebendary Webb-Peploe's expositions were marvels of Scriptural knowledge, luminous, full, coherent, and throbbing with evangelical fervour. Rev. F. B. Meyer was a frequent speaker, and was much enjoyed. His addresses were instinct with a rich, deep spirituality, rare poetic charm of style, keen probing of conscience, and tender loving appeal. Limit of space prevents us referring to other speakers, to whom we were much indebted, but it did us good to see and hear two Church of England bishops, each a remarkable man in his order. One was the Bishop of Mombassa, the other of Sierra Leone. Their Christian manliness and humility of spirit kept out of sight the "ecclesiastic," and made us feel they were brothers indeed, helpers of our faith and joy. They told how Keswick had helped them to a definite spiritual experience, liberty and joy, and had fitted them for their life-work. We felt that the foreign mission sphere must largely gain by such earnest and efficient Christian leaders, nor could we help thinking that they themselves had brought with them a catholicity of spirit, a practicalness of view from their contact and co-operation with other missionary societies and workers abroad which was quite refreshing. One of them told us that he had often preached in Wesleyan Chapels yonder, and would be glad to be permitted to do so in this country.

One feature of the Convention was the variety of its groups of characters. Oxford University was represented by a party of twenty-six undergraduates, the British army by several generals and officers and staff clerks; there were also several parties of missionaries of both sexes, and missionary candidates; here a household of mill-workers, there a group of Russian Christians; here another of German visitors; circles of Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A., and scores of Christian Endeavourers, knit in one desire to know the Lord's will, and receive power for living it out in their several callings and spheres. The Keswick Convention is not a mere modern and temporary phase of the religious world. We agree with "J. B." in the Christian World, that "its equivalents have been in Christianity from the beginning." The desire on the part of many Christians to come together, irrespective of ecclesiastical differences, for fuller realisation of the Divine life, has found expression in similar holiness movements all down the centuries. Nor can we doubt that this is of God. The concentration of thought for a given period on special and consecutive themes that make for the deepening of spiritual life, the respite from the routine and distraction of the common secular tasks of life, and even of ordinary Church methods and affairs, the contagion of a large body of people animated by one deep feeling and strenuous purpose Godward, the generating of spiritual currents by laws of mind and spirit which we may not yet fully explain, the distinct and overpowering sense of personal blessing received, and the obvious results for the spread of Christ's Kingdom which the past has witnessed, sufficiently justify the recurrence of these special gatherings. But Keswick, as to its immediate origin, is the outcome of a movement which began in America some twenty-five years ago, and which was followed in the same year by what are familiarly known as the Oxford and Brighton Conventions, which were attended by some thousands of members and ministers of almost all the Protestant bodies in England, and by many Continental pastors. Among those who attended the Oxford Conference was the late Canon Battersby, who became the founder of the Keswick Convention. As the result of what he heard, he passed from "a seeking faith to a resting faith." Returning home, he resolved to share the blessing with others. A Conference was called together, with the happiest results, and "Keswick Convention" became an institution in the country.

The Rev. C. A. Fox, a co-worker from the beginning of the movement, said in an address this year: "This is a 'silver wedding,' and so it ought to be. Keswick is bound to her Lord these twenty-five years with a bond that cannot be broken. You know how Keswick was founded—on two simple truths, which include all others:—(1.) Larger simplicity in our faith; and (2.) Larger unity between the churches and the brethren. And the great purpose of our gathering here year by year is, that the faith we have in Christ Jesus shall so abound that henceforth we shall simply take God at His word in everything, in the matter of holiness as in the matter of Providence, in the matter of spiritual power as of Divine truth, of daily purity as of daily progress, all shall be equally taken in the simplicity of faith, believing that what God says is bound to be accomplished if we fulfil that which the Holy Ghost is working in us to will and to do of God's good pleasure."

It scarcely falls within the purpose of this brief summary to dwell on the Keswick teaching, or to point out divergencies between it and the theology of kindred associations for the promotion of holiness. But a word or two may be offered. In the excellent brochure, "The Story of Keswick," it is pointed out that the type of Keswick teaching is "definite, complete and progressive. It has a definite beginning, middle and culmination. Six successive stages may perhaps be indicated, all of them being deemed important, and in the following order:—(1.) The definite and immediate abandonment of every known sin or hindrance to holy living. (2.) The abandonment and renunciation by faith of the self-life, or the life that centres in self-indulgence and self-dependence. (3.) The immediate surrender of the will in loving and complete obedience to the will of God: separation in order to consecration. (4.) The infilling of the Holy Spirit, or the claiming of the believer's share in the Spirit's pentecostal gift of power for service. (5.) The revelation of Christ as an indwelling presence in the believer's soul and daily life, and as his actual Master and Lord. (6.) Beyond these, there is always a sixth and last stage of teaching—the privileges and victories implied in this higher or deeper life, such as the rest-life of faith, power over sin, passion for souls, conscious fellowship with God, growing possession of promises and prevailing prayer and intercession."

Rev. F. B. Meyer, a leading exponent of Keswick teaching, in a recent "farewell" to his brethren in America, said: "It is an unfeigned delight to find that the teaching of the Inner Life is becoming so wide-spread in its influence on this side the Atlantic. Union with Christ in His death and resurrection, the reckoning oneself dead to self, the infilling of the Holy Spirit, and the rest of faith-life across the Jordan in the Land of Promise, these are familiar and deeply prized truths, and their wide dissemination and realisation on the part of believers, together with the exposition of the Bible as opposed to merely topical preaching, seem to me the conditions of a revival of God's work in this land, which shall re-animate the churches and enable them to act as the cementing bond in your vast and varied population."

REV. PREBENDARY WEBB-PEPLOE.

Earnest Methodists will see in these statements a distinct affiliation with their own belief and experience, a juncture with that "spiritual current which struck upon Wesley in his contact with Peter Böhler and other followers of Zinzendorf, by which he was brought into a more evangelical liberty," and with that still later development of his doctrine known as "Entire Sanctification," or "Perfect Love." The addresses we heard at Keswick were characterised by great grasp of truth and much sobriety of expression. There was an utter absence of the controversial element, but there was a distinct eschewal of aught like a doctrine of sinless perfection. Indeed, some type of Methodists might have thought that undue leaning was given to a side of teaching which held rather to the suppression of evil in believers than to its eradication. But for our part, we could not discover anything which Wesley's sermon on "Sin in Believers," or Fletcher's "Checks," would not parallel and endorse. The realisation of human infirmity and of the limitations of growth, was keenly, and, in our judgment, wisely accentuated. The peccability of human nature, the need of advancement which ever makes for keener spiritual insight into the Divine claims upon consecrated character, the liability to come short through ignorance which may itself be blameworthy in God's sight, and in the last result of theological analysis, the question as to what "sin" really connotes in its category,—all this gave us to feel that Keswick teaching was sane and progressive, and that, as Dr. Dale has put it, "Christ is the living prophecy of the height and glory of our holiness—a prophecy never to be fulfilled on earth or in heaven, but perpetually moving towards fulfilment through sorrow, struggle, and, it may be, frequent defeat in this world, and through endless ages of joy and triumph in the world to come." And yet the note of teaching was that of challenge and victory through the abiding fulness of Jesus Christ. For by this a man could daily "live the life of unbroken love toward God and his fellow, and of liberty from conscious transgression."

Keswick Convention is instinct also with missionary fervour. It is not an uncommon sight to see between two and three hundred of both sexes rise to their feet on the Foreign Missionary day, and in humble, but heroic resolve, devote their all to the cause of heathen missions. That great and holy cause has been largely aided year by year from Keswick, and the stories of the missionaries who themselves were present this year were remarkably encouraging. Let us bless God for the Keswick gatherings and all kindred movements. They are of the Church, and represent the interpenetrating and inter-blending operation of the Holy Spirit's presence and power throughout a widening area of her devout membership. And next to this, they are the outcome of that earnest early Methodism which after long abeyance, restored to its place in Christian teaching the doctrines of inward grace and fulness of life and power to which apostolic days gave witness; and may we not re-assure ourselves, with the new century just upon us, that such movements are a sign of the marshalling of the Church's forces for a nobler and a more aggressive type of Christianity; that they are the witness, after an impressive, yet simple fashion, to the world, of the "Real Presence" which Sacerdotalism limits within priestly prerogative and ceremonial obscurantism, but which is the heritage of all believers as a spiritual experience through faith; and that they represent the passing from our horizon of the clouds of doubt and negation that in the latter half-century have overhung the Christian Churches, to give place to the accent of faith and spiritual consciousness of these supernatural truths of grace and revelation which are the life of our life, the food of the altar kindled of celestial fire.

Men Worth Remembering.

VII.—JOHN VERITY.

BY THE REV. JESSE ASHWORTH.

VERY few men occupied a more prominent position in the earlier days of the Primitive Methodist Connexion than the subject of our sketch. It is much to be regretted that no adequate effort was made immediately after his death to write the biography of so remarkable a man, and so eminent a preacher, when materials for the purpose could, no doubt, have been easily obtained. If, however, after this distinguished servant of Christ has been nearly half a century in the Father's house of many mansions, we can gather up a few scattered reminiscences of him, it will be a source of satisfaction to the writer, and we hope also of profit to the reader.

John Verity would evidently be over thirty years of age when he entered our ministry; but little of his early history is known. Like John Nelson, of early Methodist fame, he was by trade a stone-mason, but the Divine Being evidently called him to polish rough stones from nature's quarry, and add them as living stones to the ever-growing temple of which Jesus Christ is the chief corner-stone.

To the time-honoured Hull Circuit belongs the distinction of giving to Mr. Verity the Church's call into the ministry, which took place as early as the year 1820. The circuits in which he travelled are as follows:—Hull, Pocklington, Manchester, Bolton, London, Bradwell, Blackburn, Preston, Huddersfield, Sheffield, Leicester, Chesterfield and Barnsley. Of his valuable labours in several of these stations, we regret to say, we can say but little, but the following facts will no doubt prove interesting.

We may just venture to mention that most of the stations in which Mr. Verity travelled have been favoured with an encouraging amount of spiritual and numerical prosperity. Hull has now six important circuits, Manchester nine, Bolton two, Blackburn three besides Haslingden and Darwen, Preston three besides Southport three, London thirty-six besides missions, Sheffield seven besides Doe Lea Valley and Hemsworth Missions, Chesterfield three, and Barnsley two. Not that all this pleasing success is attributed to Mr. Verity; he has no doubt been followed by a noble host of successors, in addition to having had worthy contemporaries; but we may fairly admit that under the Divine blessing, he succeeded in giving many a place a favourable start in the upward direction.

By the Conference of 1831, Mr. Verity was appointed to Bradwell, in Derbyshire. Through the great kindness of Mr. Tanfield, the present circuit steward, and brother of the Rev. Richard Tanfield, we are able to furnish our readers with the following items from the old circuit account and minute books of Mr. Verity's time, which will help to give us a faint glimpse of the self-sacrifice and arduous labours of those early days. From those records it appears that Mr. Verity's first quarterly income of the circuit was £10 10s. 4d., which during his stay was more than doubled. When he entered the circuit the membership was 177; in two years it rose to 226, nearly fifty of an increase in a scattered agricultural district. Mr. Verity's salary during the whole of his time was only fourteen shillings a week, and his house-rent four pounds a year, yet with nearly twenty places on the plan to visit, it was proposed at the Quarterly Meeting to mission two additional ones. Such furniture replenishing items as the following are in the quarterly accounts:—tin steamer, tenpence; crockery-ware, one shilling; new saucepan, one and ninepence. With a quarterly income of £21 11s. 6¾d. they voted to the Contingent Fund £1 15s. 6d., Charitable Fund 2s. 6d., Foreign Missions 10s., and unanimously resolved to call out a second preacher. One minute of Mr. Verity's last Quarterly Meeting was: "This is to certify that we have now laid before us every class paper in the circuit, and after the most strict examination, find them to contain, according to rule, two hundred and six full members and twenty on trial." These items from the old account and minute books surely speak for themselves without any comment.

We have given a view of the old Bradwell Chapel, in which Mr. Verity exercised his gifted ministry, and a photo of the present splendid sanctuary, to show the advance which our cause has made in this rural village. The old chapel was plain to the last degree; no porch or vestibule; no pews, but loose forms without backs; no stove or heating apparatus; no boarded floor, but the ground covered with what was called "small feith," or spar from the mines, which sparkled and glistened with little particles of lead ore; this was renewed every year. Mr. Verity's description of this time-honoured sanctuary, to those who had never seen it, was exceedingly quaint. He would say, "My chapel is floored with sparkling gems and diamonds, the people make no noise treading upon it coming in or going out; if a baby cries, the mother quietens it by putting it down on the floor to play with the diamonds. If I want any one to engage in prayer two or three forms from me, I get up a handful of gems and throw them at the person's back." Yet from this humble place of worship such gifted ministers were sent forth as Joseph Hibbs, John Hallam, Joseph and George Middleton, John Morton and others. Here the writer had the honour of commencing his ministry under the superintendency of the sainted Robert Hill.

We will now venture to record some of our own early memories respecting this remarkable man John Verity.

The first opportunity we had of seeing him was when a youth of fifteen, at the Manchester District Meeting of 1835, held at Stockport. The opening sermon was preached by the late Rev. James Garner on the Friday evening, from Luke xix. 10, and a band or fellowship meeting was held on the Saturday evening, at which both Hugh Bourne and William Clowes spoke. Sunday was a red-letter day; the procession to the camp ground left Duke Street Chapel about eight o'clock in the morning. Beside the founders of the Connexion, there were present such men as Samuel Smith, Samuel Tilotson, James Garner, Joseph Peart, Solomon Moor, with other preachers and laymen. But the most prominent figure during the whole day was undoubtedly John Verity. The day was a warm and genial Sabbath in May. The field was all that could be desired, and near ten thousand people were estimated to be attracted to the spot. When the crowds returned to the preaching-stands after first dividing into praying companies, Mr. Verity's company did not break up, but remained a permanent praying company, as it was then called, till five o'clock in the afternoon, not even closing for dinner. Persons deeply affected at the preaching-stands or the other praying companies, were taken to Mr. Verity's permanent praying company, which was called by some "the hospital," where a goodly number found salvation. The loud cries for mercy from humble penitents, and the shouts of Hallelujah from pardoned sinners in the open field, drew round the company a number of sceptical young men, who were laughing and mocking to make fun as they called it. Several times Mr. Verity made an opening in the ring, and very courteously invited them to come into the centre, but in vain. When at length Mr. Verity asked the praying people to follow him, he marched round and thoroughly enclosed the mockers. In answer to those fervent prayers of faith, a wave of Divine power came over them; some of the scoffers fell down crying for mercy, while others escaped from the ring as best they could. The number of persons to whom that sacred Sabbath was "the day of salvation," was estimated at near one hundred. The scenes upon the field of that glorious day are still vivid to the eye of our imagination, and the shouts of victory and praise seem yet ringing in our ears.

The next occasion on which we had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Verity was as a Missionary deputation. In those early days circuits did a large amount of home mission work, even opening and sustaining missions in Ireland, Scotland and America. Mr. Verity detailed in his own characteristic manner, how he had recently gone twelve miles from his circuit-town to open a new mission in the neighbourhood of Rossendale, a parliamentary division of Lancashire. "When I got there," he said, "I inquired of a young man whose was the largest house in the place? After a short pause, the young man said, 'Why, Bill's o' Dick's, o' Thom's, o' Jack's, o' owd Ned's o' Rossendale.' After pointing me to the house, I went and knocked at the door; when the lady came, I asked, 'If Mr. Bill o' Dick's, o' Thom's, o' Jack's, o' owd Ned's o' Rossendale was at home; if so, would she kindly tell him the Lord had sent me to preach at his house, and he must not say nay.' When the gentleman came I repeated the same question and affirmation. Mr. Rowstron, for that was the gentleman's real name, kindly invited me in, and after some consultation with his good lady, they both cheerfully consented." The servant was sent to the factory to tell the people there would be preaching at her master's house at seven o'clock that evening. The quaint message Mr. Verity gave her was to say that, "John Verity was come to sell the devil up, dish and spoon, and they must come to the sale." The Divine blessing attended the preaching of the Gospel; a society was formed, an old house was turned into a chapel, the floor of the upper room was cut out above the pulpit, so that the preacher could address those below and those above at the same time. Mr. Verity dignified this chapel with the name of Solomon's Temple. In this quaint edifice the writer has had the honour of frequently holding forth the Word of Life.

On another occasion Mr. Verity went to mission a place at the time of hay-making, during which a heavy thunderstorm—as is frequently the case—came on. He found no place of shelter but a public-house, (this, of course, was before the days of temperance hotels), which was speedily filled with men driven from the hay-field, who soon began both to drink and sing their favourite songs. After a time they asked if the stranger who sat quietly in the corner could not sing them a song? "Yes," he readily replied, "if you will allow me to choose my own song?" This was at once agreed to, upon which Mr. Verity rose, placed his hand on the table, and commenced amid the deepest silence, "No room for mirth or trifling here," etc. Before he had finished, most of the men were in tears. He then announced that he should be there again that day fortnight to preach the glad tidings of the Gospel. The formation of a society, and the erection of a suitable chapel was the happy result of his labours.

By the Conference of 1837, the writer was appointed to the Haslingden Circuit, under the superintendency of the Rev. Christopher Hallam, honoured father of our present General Committee Secretary. This circuit was made that Conference from Blackburn, during the superintendency of Mr. Verity, who still remained on the parent station,

We, of course, not only heard much of Mr. Verity's sayings and doings, but also became personally more intimately acquainted with him and his good wife, whom he familiarly called Nannie. There were romantic incidents and strange love-affairs in those early days. Mr. Verity is said to have gone on a courtship expedition, with the full intention of soliciting the hand of the daughter, but he actually fell in love with, and married, the mother. They evidently lived happily together for a number of years, and Mrs. Verity survived her husband several years. Many quaint stories are told of Mr. Verity and

BRADWELL NEW CHAPEL.

Nannie which want of space forbids us to record; but we may just mention, that when making a collection, Mr. Verity would say if his good wife were present, "I hope you have all done better than our Nannie, for I dare say she has only brought a penny or threehalfpence for the plate."

On one occasion, in coming to Mrs. Verity in an afternoon class meeting, she gave as her experience, that she felt in some measure to be growing in grace; "Yes," he replied, "I think thou art mending a little; thou hast not been so cross lately," and he began to point out rich graces which she did not seem yet to possess. One of the ladies said to her afterwards: "I wonder, Mrs. Verity, you allow your husband to talk to you in such a manner,"

"Oh, bless you," she replied, "it is not all Nannie that he means."

The following incident will go to show Mr. Verity's wide-spread influence during his Blackburn ministry. One Saturday evening during my tour in the East, while staying at an hotel in Grand Cairo, the capital of Egypt, I was called from my room to meet a tall fine-looking gentleman, whom I found to be the army chaplain to the English soldiers. Not knowing that I was a Nonconformist minister, he came to request me to take the service at the English barracks. A day or two afterwards I was passing through the grand hall of the hotel, when a clergyman out of Lancashire, staying at the same hotel, pressed me to come and take a seat beside him on the couch. He began conversation by asking me why I did not accept the chaplain's invitation, and then said, "I will give you the substance of a sermon by one John Verity, a Primitive Methodist minister, of Blackburn, delivered over forty years ago. The subject was about heaven; Mr. Verity pictured various professors of Christianity coming up to heaven's gates. The first who presented himself for admission was asked by the porter, 'Who are you?' He replied, 'I am a Baptist.' 'Oh,' said the porter, 'there are no Baptists here.' To the next who came up to the gates the porter inquired, 'Who are you?' He replied, 'I am a Congregationalist. 'Oh,' replied the porter, 'there are no Congregationalists here.' The third who knocked for admission gave his name as a Wesleyan. 'Oh,' repeated the porter, 'there are no Wesleyans here.' Then came up another who to the porter's inquiry replied, 'I am the Vicar of Blackburn.' 'Oh,' replied the porter, 'there are no vicars here.' Then Mr. Verity represented himself coming up to heaven's gate. 'Who are you?' again was asked. 'I am John Verity, Primitive Methodist Preacher.' 'There are no Primitives here,' replied the porter. Last of all he brought up a man whose reply to the porter's inquiry was, 'I am a Christian, a humble believer in the Lord Jesus Christ.' 'Make haste,' cried the porter, 'fling wide open the gates, let him in, they are all Christians here, singing, "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever."'"

This sermon had evidently made a lasting impression on the mind of the clergyman, proving that Verity, like Abel, being dead yet speaketh. The clergyman felt no small degree of surprise when informed that we were intimately acquainted with Mr. Verity during his residence at Blackburn.

We venture to give here another instance of Mr. Verity's pulpit oratory. After recovering from a recent illness he told his audience that he had been weighing himself in the balances to see if he were found wanting. He said, "I put John Verity in the scales with all his good deeds and charities; but up went the scale, short of weight. Then I heaped into the scale all my sermons, prayers, long journeys on rugged roads, dark stormy nights and other hardships; up went the scale again, Verity still short of weight. Then I bundled them all out of the scale, and trusted alone in Jesus Christ; down went the scale, Verity bumping weight." Such a description being to him so natural, especially with the application which he would make of it, must have been at once humorous, pathetic, and impressive.

Mr. Verity's appointment to Sheffield, as stated in the admirable article by the Rev. J. Wenn, in the January number of this Magazine, was to extricate Bethel Chapel from its financial difficulties. This he happily accomplished, both by collecting sums of money and attracting large congregations.

We are indebted to Mr. Tanfield, already referred to, for the following fact. He states, "I was a member of society at Bethel Chapel in the year 1853. I remember attending a public meeting there, when the chairman, Mr. Charles Spaight, an old local preacher, told a sad story of the building and maintaining of Bethel Chapel; its heavy debt, the poverty of its members, increasing liabilities, insufficient income, several trustees shrinking from their responsibilities. A young minister was actually sent out to raise money for the chapel by selling cutlery. But still the burden increased, until there was 'a man sent from God, whose name was John,' that man was John Verity. He threw himself heartily into the work as only he could do. In a short time the tide turned, and before he left, the chapel was not only saved to the Connexion but was also placed in a good working condition, and the conversion of many sinners to God was witnessed." Since that time, how many beautiful daughters have risen up around the mother chapel!

Mr. Verity was not only a man of distinguished talent, but also of remarkable tact. While seeking to obtain pecuniary aid for Bethel Chapel, a Sheffield parliamentary election happened to be going on. Attempts were made to draw out his political opinions; and in those days, it should be said, our ministers were strongly urged not to interfere with politics, but to strenuously mind their own most important work of leading men to Christ. When asked by the Conservatives for his political views, he would reply, "God bless the Tories;" when asked the same question by the Liberals, he would say, "God bless the Liberals." When asked privately by one of his friends, if he did not consider such a course marked with a little inconsistency, he would reply, "No, I want God to bless everybody."

A great change has come over the Connexion since Mr. Verity's time. Primitive Methodists fully recognise their duties and responsibilities as citizens, and consequently take part in parish, district, county, borough and parliamentary elections; some filling the mayoral or aldermanic chair, while others represent a borough or division in Parliament. These things they may lawfully do, and yet need not diminish their efforts to extend the kingdom of Christ upon earth.

While Mr. Verity was still in Sheffield, a little incident occurred which shows that his preaching was marked both by humour and pathos. It was frequently said that he could make people laugh and cry in a breath. A gifted local preacher of a neighbouring circuit declared he was sure that he could not move him in either one direction or the other. He was courteously invited by a friend to come and hear him, and had not been listening long when the tears were coursing down his cheeks, and he was laughing almost at the same time. When asked about it by his friend, "Oh," he replied, "Mr. Verity took me unawares." He was persuaded by his friend to try again, which he did, and determined to keep his gravity, but with the same result.

Mr. Verity was evidently a man of large resources and variety of methods. One of his methods was to publish his subjects with strange or taking titles. When at Leicester he found there was a number of professed sceptics; he succeeded in filling old George Street Chapel to its utmost capacity by publishing his subjects, one of which was, "The Infidel Enigma Unriddled: Where did God come from?" His text was from Hab. iii. 3, 4, "God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran," etc. We have often been told that he rose to the highest possible pitch of sublimity, when he dwelt on that portion of his text, "there was the hiding of His power." It is recorded that a number of unbelievers were attracted to hear him from time to time, and were led to surrender themselves to God through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

Mr. Verity was both deservedly and extensively popular; consequently he was much sought after for anniversary services. The Rev. W. R. Widdowson states: "I never heard any one who could tell a story with so much fascination as Mr. Verity. He was not quite so dramatic as Billy Dawson or John B. Gough, but I never heard any one who could surpass him in the combination of humour and pathos at the same moment, except it was Gough." This is a high testimonial from one who has had many opportunities of hearing speakers of the greatest popularity.

Mr. Verity had many other elements of pulpit popularity beside humour and pathos. Like nature herself, he had a great variety in both matter and manner. He never dreamt of giving to his congregations what cost him nothing. When travelling with the late Rev. Thomas Jobling at Burnley, we had the high pleasure of hearing Mr. Verity preach three of his great sermons at the Curzon Street Chapel anniversary, almost every sentence of which might be called sublime. The expectation roused by this visit ran very high; silver was expected on entering the gallery, half-crown collectors to every other pew, the chapel being crowded at the three services. The subject, previously announced, was "The Great Anthem of Redemption," from Rev. v. 9-14. In the morning, "The Song of the Redeemed;" in the afternoon, "The Doxology of Angels;" at night, "The Full Chorus." In the whole three services there was only one humorous utterance, and that was in the afternoon prayer.

The week before there had been a very great storm of wind and rain, one of the greatest we ever remember witnessing. Mr. Verity's allusion to it was in something like the following words: "O Lord! Thou hast watched over us and preserved us in the midst of the tempest, whilst houses have been unroofed, chimneys blown down, great trees torn up by the roots, and mighty vessels sunk with their crews to the depths of the sea. Thou couldst have blown us all into the air like onion-peelings, but Thy goodness has preserved us, O Lord, for which we praise Thee." Despite this rather strange expression, a cloud of Divine glory seemed to rest on each assembly.

The incidents best remembered and most frequently talked of in the marvellous life of Mr. Verity, are his winning a chapel by preaching, and the conversion of a clergyman.

He was accustomed to relate these events in the following manner. "An old gentleman, a country squire, built a chapel and offered it to that denomination whose preacher should please or suit him the best. After several ministers of different denominations had occupied the pulpit, the squire was asked if he would not also invite a Primitive to preach, which inquiry led for me to be sent for to take a week-day service in the chapel. The weather was very hot, and the place a considerable distance, so that after I had walked part of the way I became very foot-sore; I made inquiries at the village through which I was passing, whether I could engage a conveyance of any kind to get me there in time. Nothing could I obtain but a donkey, neither could I procure saddle nor bridle. The donkey being caught and brought from the common, a sack was thrown over his back to which some cord was attached for stirrups, and also cord for a bridle. So I mounted and proceeded on my journey. As I got near the place I saw a crowd of people looking out for the preacher. I learned afterwards that one of them said, 'Yonder comes the parson.' 'Nay,' said another, 'yond' looks like Balaam on his ass.' When I arrived at the chapel it was time to commence, so my donkey was taken to the squire's stable. I entered the chapel and began the service. As I was the last preacher who was to try for the chapel, I thought I would take for my text the Apostolic benediction, 2 Cor. xiii. 14, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all, Amen.' As I had come for the purpose of winning the chapel, I determined to keep my eye towards the old squire, who sat in a corner pew not far from the pulpit. As I spoke of preventing grace, converting grace, supporting grace, and especially of grace to support in a dying hour, I saw the squire was moved; his chin began to totter, and before I had finished my sermon he called out, 'The chapel's yours; the chapel's yours.' After the service, both the donkey and I spent a day or two at the squire's, and we liked our quarters very well."

On account of the favourable impression in the surrounding locality made by Mr. Verity's winning the chapel, he was invited to assist in holding a large open-air meeting in a neighbouring town. As he was returning from the said meeting on the donkey, he was overtaken by a clergyman on horseback, who had been conducting service at a few miles distance. Mr. Verity put a question to him which was very frequently asked in the early days of Primitive Methodism; he asked him, How many conversions he had recently witnessed? This question led up to what proved to be a very interesting conversation on the subject of conversion. While thus engaged in conversing, Mr. Verity's donkey happened to stumble and he fell off into a heap of road scrapings. "You are down," said the clergyman. "Yes," said Verity, in the language of Bunyan,

"He that is down need fear no fall,
He that is low no pride."

The clergyman kindly leaped from his horse to assist Mr. Verity, saying, "You cannot proceed in this condition. You had better come home with me and have your clothes cleaned." The clergyman took him home, and lent him a suit of clothes while his own were cleaned by the servants. While they sat round the tea-table, the clergyman related to his lady and children—a son and a daughter—the conversation between Mr. Verity and himself on the way. The clergyman and his family were deeply affected, and most of the evening was spent in conversation on religion and in prayer. The conversion of one after the other led afterwards to the conversion of the family doctor. After this, our preachers met with a cordial welcome at the vicarage whenever they were in that locality, and on one occasion a notice was posted on the church doors: "Gone to the Camp Meeting."

The conversion of this clergyman and his family may appear to some rather unique, but this is not the only clergyman we could tell of, did our space permit, whose conversion took place through the instrumentality of early Primitive Methodism. Those were certainly the days when signs and wonders were wrought in the name of the Holy Child Jesus, and were our faith now sufficiently strong, signs and wonders might still, no doubt, be accomplished.

The facts of Mr. Verity's winning the chapel, and the clergyman's conversion, we have often heard related, and even by Mr. Verity himself; but for the minute details of the foregoing account we are chiefly indebted to our esteemed friend, the Rev. W. R. Widdowson. He informs us that he was a youth at home when Mr. Verity came as a deputation to the Kimberley Missionary Meeting, and related the case of the chapel and the clergyman; and that he more fully entered into details when he came to his father's house, where he was entertained for the night. Mr. Widdowson further informs us, that the late Rev. Robert Smith told him that he knew well the village where the chapel was. Mr. Widdowson further states, that the late Rev. John Eckersley informed him that he had frequently taken tea with the clergyman, and had known the said clergyman to stand outside the chapel when snow was on the ground, to listen to the preaching. Probably his reason for standing outside was to avoid collision with his bishop, who had previously interposed.

We will add one testimony from America. Dr. Suddards was a minister in the days of William Clowes, who left our people and went to America, where he became pastor of a large church in Philadelphia, visited this country twenty-three years ago, and was asked by his host if the story of winning the chapel by Verity was true? "Yes," he replied, "I was the very man who proposed him. He had all the eloquence of Flesher, and with the exception of Father Clowes, I never heard any man pray equal to him."

The portrait of Mr. Verity presented is copied from an old magazine, and is considered by those who still remember him to be a very good one. The following description of his personal appearance is furnished by Mr. Widdowson, in which we fully concur. "He had a beautiful countenance, clear skin, ruddy cheeks, not above middle height, well proportioned in his make, not corpulent, and very active; he had a fine tenor voice which could be heard in singing, like Dr. Enoch Mellor's, above the largest audience; in preaching he could almost descend to a whisper, and yet could be heard well without apparent effort; always well dressed, especially considering the salaries of those days." In addition to all these qualities, there is another peculiarity which he possessed: his teeth were all double ones, and we heard him say that a doctor once told him such persons were very rare, but they always had double lungs!!

Here we gaze in imagination upon the wondrous chapel winner; the man who could unfold the nature of regeneration in the vicar's parlour or the cottage of the poor; who could accommodate himself, like his Master, to ride upon an ass; whose deep humility was evident to all who had the happiness to know him; who could attract agnostics to the faith of the Gospel; who could attract crowded audiences by the quaintness of his subjects, and when they came, not disappoint them. Here is a man who could extricate chapels from their financial difficulties; who could tramp the long, rough roads of a country circuit, as well as occupy the city pulpit; who could lead souls to Christ amid surrounding scoffers in the open field. In fine, here is, surely, a man worth remembering, and the remembrance of whom should prove a salutary inspiration for many days to come.

Brief was Mr. Verity's memoir in the Large Magazine, but it was so appropriate that we cannot forbear quoting the following extracts. "He was not an ordinary man; his imagination fruitful, his voice powerful but full of music, his person and address pleasing, his aims clear, his appeals pointed, his pulpit efforts edifying, convincing and saving, so that many will have cause to rejoice eternally that they ever heard him. The Bible was his main book; its figures were closely studied, highly prized, tenaciously remembered, and well used by him. His memory was well stored with moral and religious anecdotes, and he liberally employed them in illustration of his subjects. Though possessed of much wit and extemporaneous talking talent, he did not depend upon these to the neglect of close study and earnest prayer, but bestowed much pains on the preparation of his sermons, many of which were left in manuscript in almost a finished state."

"Barnsley was the last circuit in which he travelled; here he was struck down by paralysis and rendered unable to preach except very occasionally. Feeling this a very great trial, still remembering by whom the chastisement was inflicted, he kissed the rod and blessed the hand that used it. He retired, when superannuated, to Leicester, where he patiently waited the coming of his Lord. That event, however, took place sooner than was generally expected. In the early morning of July 6, 1849, he was apparently in better health than usual, but ere the day ended he was in the spirit world."

The record in the Magazine goes on to say that his remains were followed by a large concourse of mourners to the Leicester new cemetery; and a neat stone was purchased with the profits derived from the sale of the accompanying verses, composed by him a few weeks before his death.

We venture to add these verses, as they give us such a clear view of Mr. Verity's inner life in his closing days; and go to show how richly he was sustained by the power of that Christianity which he had so frequently and fervently preached to others.

LINES COMPOSED BY JOHN VERITY A FEW WEEKS BEFORE HIS DEATH.

Tenant of my house of clay,
Destined for a brighter day,
Quit thy tent and haste away;
Heavenly mansions wait thee!

To thy nobler seat above,
Purchased by redeeming love,
Why so backward to remove?
Jesus waits thy coming.

Burdened with thine earthly clod,
Smitten by affliction's rod,
Burst thy chains, ascend to God;
Angels will conduct thee.

From a gloomy vale like this,
Through the emerald gates of bliss,
To remain where Jesus is;
Saints will greet thee welcome!

Now my tardy spirit say,
Wouldst thou longer wish to stay,
Still to tread life's dreary way,
Where new trials wait thee?

Let thy wasted body die,
Calmly close thy faded eye;
Though in dust thy frame must lie,
Thou wilt mount to glory.

Jesus hath illumed the gloom,
Left a lamp within the tomb,
Till the last and general doom—
The resurrection morning!

Then with rapture and surprise,
Glorious thou wilt see it rise;
Mid the splendour of the skies,
Thou it put on for ever.

Then around the throne to shine,
Soul and body both divine,
And with saints and angels join
To praise the Lamb for ever

To all my friends, Adieu! Adieu
That this may be the case with you,
Always keep the end in view,
And we shall meet in glory

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

IN the previous paper we were occupied exclusively with the sanative influence which Nature exerts on the mind and soul of man—the simpler and more superficial aspect of our subject. But let us to-day take deeper soundings and ask, direct, the question, Is there a Gospel—a message of glad tidings—in Nature? What has she to say in hint or illustration or instruction as to the cardinal facts and needs of the soul—and its relation to God and Duty and the Future? Is there, in a word, a theology in Nature? and is that theology one of hope? We are much mistaken if there is not, and if our guiding sage has not some rememberable words to say to us on this theme of which the key-note may well be this passage:

“I have seen

A curious child, who dwelt upon a tract
Of inland ground, applying to his ear
The convolutions of a smooth-lipped shell:
To which, in silence hushed, his very soul
Listened intensely; and his countenance soon
Brightened with joy, for from within were heard Murmurings, whereby the monitor expressed Mysterious union with its native sea.
Even such a shell the universe itself
Is to the ear of Faith: and there are times,
I doubt not, when to you it doth impart
Authentic tidings of invisible things:
Of ebb and flow, and ever-during power,
And central peace, subsisting at the heart
Of endless agitation. Here you stand,
Adore, and worship, when you know it not:
Pious beyond the intention of your thought:
Devout above the meaning of your will.”

It needs not to dwell on the fact that Nature suggests the thought of sin. We have passed out of the shadow of that strange conceit of the old theologians—among whom even Wesley must be included—that the more terrific aspects of Nature are the direct consequence of sin—that destructive lightnings flash, and seas o’erwhelm, and earthquakes convulse, because of Adam’s fault. I have not met with the passage, but a good friend, on whose word I can rely, tells me that somewhere Wesley attributes the alternations of high mountain and deep vale on the surface of our globe, to original sin. But for that the earth would have been conveniently (?) flat! Nor can we any longer accept the theory of the famous sermon on “The Cause and Cure of Earthquakes,” that they are intended as penalties for continuing sin. But artificial and foolish though such conceptions are, they are far-away hints of the truth that there is a doctrine of sin in Nature. What is sin, in the last analysis, but the sense of demerit, of defect, of imperfection. Sin is “missing the mark,” “coming short of the glory of God.” And in the constant striving upwards of Nature, as that striving is now being revealed and certified to us by the doctrine of Evolution, is there not manifest a blind, but none the less real, sense of incompleteness? Nature is ever saying, in her inarticulate way, “Up, up, I must up;” “Forward, forward, ever must I fare.” “Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect, but I follow after if that I may apprehend and realise the purpose purposed for me of God.” Such, to an imagination quickened of the Spirit, and to the opened ear, is the low mystic whisper of Nature. Let each hear it as he may: nor say it is not audible because his untrained faculty cannot detect it. In man that latent sense of inadequateness and peccancy has but come to consciousness. He has it because it is diffused in the Nature out of which he has sprung, and of which he is still a part; and sin, in him, is conscious, willing, deliberate yielding to the lower, to the animal, in the presence and against the protest of the higher and the spiritual. Sin is to choose the worse, against the urgency, and under the rebuke, of the better. It is to forswear the ideal. What Nature, all-unconscious, witnesses, man has come to know and deplore.

But there is more in Nature—there is the gospel of forgiveness. Forgiveness nestles in the heart of Nature, because Nature is of God. Again and again in the interests of a certain narrow and exclusive evangelicalism have we heard it asserted that Nature knows nothing of forgiveness. And yet nothing is more certain than that Nature does make repairs. The scientific phrase “physiological regeneration” covers no fiction. A starfish deprived of an arm can replace it by a fresh growth. Crabs can renew the great claws which they have lost in fighting, and even as high up as the lizards the loss of a leg or a tail can be made good. Curtail an earthworm by means of a spade—the head portion will grow a new tail and the decapitated part will reproduce a head and brain. A snail has been known to regenerate an amputated eye-bearing horn twenty times running. We humans can constantly regenerate the skin of our lips and we can replace nails, though not an amputated limb. “Still,” says the authority who supplies me with these facts, “it is more marvellous that we cannot than that the lizard can.” There is no marvel in it, or no more than in the original development. It is the dividing cells simply repeating that first process. What does the vis medicatrix mean? No sooner does the blood begin to coagulate on your cut finger than the healing force of Nature commences to operate. Medical practice has passed or is passing through four stages—the stage of the lancet, the brandy stage, the drug stage, and the nature stage. We are now partly in the third, and partly in the fourth. Doctors are coming to regard drugs with less and less favour, and “Nature,” says one, “will often effect a cure in spite of the interference of too energetic physicians.” Now the natural but matches and mirrors the spiritual. It is no longer necessary to separate and antagonise the two in order to exalt the spiritual. God and Nature are not at strife. They are not two, but one. There is physiological forgiveness and there is spiritual forgiveness, but both are mediated by obedience to law. The lizard grows a new leg by unconscious conformity to nature; a man may grow a new character and realise a fresh future by conscious surrender to the laws of the spiritual world—by repentance, by faith, by hope, by love. It is the same God that worketh all in all, through the Christ—the Eternal Word, “through whom all things were made,” and who “is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth.”

The line of the poet, in the light of facts like these, receives a new warranty—

“Nature never did betray the heart that loved her.”

In the “Primrose of the Rock,” which bloomed without fear of “her annual funeral,” Wordsworth saw more than a suggestion of “God’s redeeming love”:

“That love which changed for wan disease,
For sorrow that had bent
O’er hopeless dust, for withered age—
Their moral element,
And turned the thistles of a curse
To types beneficent.

Sin-blighted though we are, we too,
The reasoning sons of men,
From one oblivious winter called Shall rise and breathe again,
And in eternal summer lose
Our threescore years and ten.”

Leaving aside for a little while the hint of immortality conveyed in that lovely little poem, straight from the heart of Nature, let us note how the central idea of Atonement—the truth of sympathetic suffering—is preached con amore by Nature. Although it is in a mood of too optimistic exaggeration that somebody has sung: “The whole of Nature is one hymn of love,” there is enough to excuse the rhapsody. One has read lately of pin-hole photography. Such a photograph is the sight, to be often seen, of a mother-spider at the mercy of an ant-lion, fighting for her eggs at the sacrifice of her own life. It is a small picture-token that means a large matter. Let me enrich my page with a few sentences from Professor Drummond—he has made this theme his own. They shall be taken indifferently from his three chapters entitled: “The Struggle for the Life of Others;” “The Evolution of a Mother;” “The Evolution of a Father.” “Love is not a late arrival, an afterthought, with Creation. . . . Its roots began to grow with the first cell of life which budded on this earth. . . . The Evolution of love is a piece of pure science. . . . It was distilled on earth.” Quoting himself from another, he shows how the salvation of self, and the good of the species, are at one and the same time secured by sacrifice: “Reproduction begins as rupture. Large cells beginning to die, save their lives by sacrifice. Reproduction is literally a life-saving against the approach of death, whether it be the almost random rupture of one of the more primitive forms, or the overflow and separation of multiple buds, or the dissolution of a few of the Infusorians, an organism which is becoming exhausted, saves itself, and multiplies in reproducing.” And he continues: “For Reproduction alone the flower is created; when the process is over it returns to the dust. This miracle of beauty is a miracle of love. Its splendour of colour, its variegations, its form, its symmetry, its perfume, its honey, its very texture, are all notes of Love—Love calls, or Love lures, or Love provisions for the insect world. . . . Every plant in the world lives for others. It sets aside something, something costly, cared for, the highest expression of its nature. The seed is the tithe of Love. . . . When man lives upon seeds he lives upon Love. . . . All the beauty of the world is Love-beauty. . . . Remember that the Family, the crown of all higher life, is the creation of Love; that co-operation, which means power, which means wealth, which means leisure, which, therefore, means art and culture, recreation and education, is the gift of Love. Remember not only these things, but the diffusions of feeling which accompany them, the elevation, the ideals, the happiness, the goodness, and the faith in more goodness, and ask if it is not a world of Love in which we live. . . . Is it too much to say that the one motive of organic Nature was to make mothers? It is, at least, certain that this was the chief thing she did. Ask the zoologist what, judging from science alone, Nature aspired to from the first; he could not but answer, Mammalia—Mothers. . . . No young of any mammal can nourish itself. There is that in it which compels it to seek its mother; and there is that in the mother which compels her, even physically, to seek her child. On the physiological side, the name of this impelling power is lactation: on the ethical side, it is Love." Drummond confesses what he owes to Fiske in the development of this subject. "From of old," says the latter, "we have heard the monition, 'Except ye be as babes ye cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven;' the latest science now shows us, though in a very different sense of the words, that unless we had been as babes, the ethical phenomena which give all its significance to the phrase, 'Kingdom of Heaven,' would have been non-existent for us. Without the circumstances of Infancy we might have become formidable among animals through sheer force of sharp-wittedness. But except for these circumstances we should never have comprehended the meaning of such phrases as 'self-sacrifice,' or 'self-devotion.' The phenomena of social life would have been omitted from the history of the world, and with them the phenomena of ethics and religion." Hear Drummond himself again in just one or two other brief sentences: "If the crowning work of Organic Evolution is the Mammalia, the consummation of the Mammalia is the Family. Physically, psychically, ethically, the Family is the masterpiece of Evolution. In a far truer sense than Raphael produced his 'Holy Family,' Nature has produced a Holy Family. Not for centuries, but for millenniums, the Family has survived. Time has not tarnished it; no later art has improved upon it; nor genius discovered anything more lovely, nor religion anything more divine. From the bee's cell and the butterfly's wing, men draw what they call the Argument from Design; but it is in the kingdoms which come without observation, in those great immaterial orderings which Science is but beginning to perceive, that the purposes of Creation are revealed." But we despair, by any quotations within our conditions of space, to do justice to the gospel of Love according to Drummond. He may leave out much that qualifies, but the side of truth he sees is no illusion. It is the vision Wordsworth had too, though the poet had no science to support him.

"Love, now a universal birth,
From heart to heart is stealing,
From earth to man, from man to earth,
It is the hour of feeling.

One moment now may give us more
Than years of toiling reason;
Our minds shall drink at every pore
The spirit of the season.

And from the blessed Power that rolls
About, below, above,
We'll frame the measure of our souls,
They shall be tuned to love."

Here again must I break off. The question of Nature and Immortality, on which I had meant to speak, must be reserved for a separate paper.

APPARATUS USED BY MR. TRIPLER IN LIQUEFYING GASES, WITH STREAM OF LIQUID AIR ESCAPING.

Liquid Air.*

BY ARTHUR E. GOODMAN.

THAT there are three forms of matter—solid, liquid and gaseous—is a fact with which most of us were early made acquainted, most probably, by the ubiquitous headlines of the inevitable copy-book; but the equally true fact that all matter may, at various times and under different circumstances, exist in all three forms has remained in doubt, almost until the present year.

The merest child is familiar with the three forms of water—ice, water and steam—and that water becomes ice by the application of cold, or to be more correct, by the removal of heat, whilst steam is formed by putting more heat into the water.

Scientists early learned how to produce cold artificially by means of "freezing mixtures," and the cold produced in this way was of sufficient intensity to freeze all known liquids. Faraday, in the early days of the present century, was able, by uniting pressure with the cold produced artificially, to liquefy some of the gases, such as chlorine, carbonic acid gas and ammonia. But in spite of all efforts, these gases were never frozen, whilst there remained many gases which sturdily resisted all the efforts of scientists who endeavoured to turn them into liquids.

For some considerable time, Professor Dewar, at the Royal Institution, has been steadily working at the so-called "permanent" gases, and one by one has overcome their resistance, until on the 11th of May, 1898, it was announced that he had liquefied hydrogen and helium, and in so doing, had reduced the last of the refractory gases, then known on the earth, to its liquid form.

Very recently, however, a new gas, which up to that time was known to exist only in the sun's corona, and for this reason called coronium, has been discovered by Professor Nisini, of Padua, Italy, among the volcanic gases of Pozzuoli. Owing to its recent discovery, and the consequent difficulty of obtaining it in quantity, Professor Dewar's methods cannot have been brought to bear on it. But, failing positive proof, it is hardly exceeding the bounds of probability in stating that when experimented upon, it will be found to behave as all other gases have done, and become liquid and solid under certain conditions of cold and pressure.

Before attempting to describe the methods by which the air we breathe, or any other gas, may be brought to the liquid state, it will be necessary, first of all, to give the general reader some idea of what the three forms of matter really are, and especially in what the difference between them lies.

* The temperatures mentioned are given in degrees on the Fahrenheit scale, that is, the one most commonly in use.

All matter consists of very minute particles. The particles forming a given substance are held together by the attraction which each particle has for the others. This power of attraction, or cohesion, as it is termed, is the most marked in the case of a solid, where each particle so strongly attracts its neighbours that they become as closely packed together as possible, and so become fixed and rigid. In liquids the cohesion is less marked, and the particles freely roll about over each other, so that the substance, if it is not to be lost, must be contained in a vessel, open, if at all, only at the top. In the case of gases, the cohesion is entirely absent, in fact, it would appear as though the particles had developed a repellent action upon each other, for they separate as far from each other as they possibly can. For this reason, gases and vapours can only be held or confined by a completely closed vessel.

It has already been stated that the application or withdrawal of heat plays an important part in the conversion of liquids into gases, or vice versa. To the scientist, heat is nothing more nor less than the effect produced upon the sense of feeling by certain vibratory movements communicated to us from the particles, of which all matter is composed. The hotter the substance is, the more rapid are the vibrations of its particles; hence the removal of heat from a body causes its particles to assume a less energetic vibration; whilst raising the temperature produces a more violent vibration.

We can now more readily understand why matter exists in various forms. Cohesion tends to pack the particles of a substance closely together. Heat, by setting these particles to vibrate, tends to cause them to separate. Solids, which are substances in their coolest form, exhibit cohesion acting practically alone. In liquids, cohesion and heat are nearly equally balanced; whilst in the third form, gas, where the temperature of the same substance is the highest, cohesion is altogether overcome and destroyed by the heat.

It is scarcely necessary to point out that different substances require varying amounts of heat to turn them from the solid to the liquid, or from the liquid to the gaseous condition. The amount of heat which will melt ice will not melt wax, nor is the amount which would vaporise water capable of even melting iron.

Inversely, if liquids be turned to solids, or gases into liquids, it can only be accomplished by losing heat. This is the crucial point in the liquefaction of gases; and how to remove the heat was the one difficulty of the earlier workers.

Whilst steam condenses at a temperature of 212° , ether will condense at 98° . Ammonia gas, however, has to be cooled to -38° , i.e., 70° colder than ice, and carbonic acid gas requires the extreme cold of -112° , or 144° below the temperature of freezing water, before condensation commences.

On cooling a gas it invariably contracts, and, of course, will expand again if heated. The contraction or expansion of a gas has been found to be uniform, and is exactly $\frac{1}{401}$ part of its volume at the freezing point for each degree of temperature it is raised or cooled. That is, 491 cubic inches of any gas at 32° will expand so as to occupy 492 cubic inches if raised to 33° , and would contract to 490 cubic inches if cooled to 31° . This uniform law of contraction does not apply to liquids or solids, both of which behave under varying temperatures with the greatest diversity.

KNOCKING IN A NAIL WITH A HAMMER OF QUICK-SILVER, WHICH HAS BEEN FROZEN IN LIQUID AIR.

As the cooling process goes on, the particles of gas become more and more closely packed until they approach the condition of a liquid. But a great many gases have their condensing point so extremely low that it is impossible to obtain freezing mixtures which are capable of producing such an intense cold. This soon led scientists to think of another method of achieving the same thing. If the particles of the gas to be liquefied cannot be made to contract to the proper density to form a liquid, why not compress the gas, and thus forcibly make them so to contract? Faraday could not have liquefied either chlorine, ammonia, or carbonic acid gas had he not compressed them. His method of compressing a gas is shown in one of the illustrations. A piece of very strong glass tube was bent in the middle and securely sealed up at one end. At this closed end were placed the substances whose chemical action on each other resulted in the evolution of the gas to be experimented upon. When the tube became filled with the gas, the other end was strongly sealed up. As the gas continued to be generated the pressure inside the tube would increase enormously. To remove the heat caused by the compression, the end to be last sealed was immersed in a freezing mixture. Such was the somewhat simple device of the first successful method of liquefying gases. Compare this with the complicated machinery as seen in Mr. Tripler's laboratory, and some idea of the advance made will be obtained.

Carbonic acid gas, which, without compression, liquefies only when reduced to -112° , can be liquefied at 32° , if subjected to a pressure of 530 lbs per square inch, or 36 atmospheres, or at 88° —a temperature equal to that of the air for several periods during the days of last August—by a pressure of 77 atmospheres.

Whilst it appeared theoretically correct that a gas could be squeezed into a liquid, it was soon found to be impossible to do so with any gas above a certain temperature, which varied for different gases. This temperature, above which it is impossible to liquefy a gas, no matter what pressure is exerted on it, is known as the "critical" temperature. And it was because the "critical" temperature of the so-called permanent gases was so very low that until recently they have baffled all attempts to liquefy them. A gas must, in addition to the pressure, be cooled below its critical temperature before there is the slightest sign of liquefaction.

Compressing a gas, however, has its drawback, for by so doing the temperature of the gas is raised, and very considerably too. A recent experiment made by fastening a small thermometer on the tube connecting the pump with the tyre, showed that the small amount of compression involved in inflating the pneumatic tyre of a cycle, raised the temperature 10° .

The heat thus made manifest by compressing a gas is easily removed by causing the heated gas to flow through a series of pipes immersed in water.

If by compressing a certain amount of gas the heat evolved is absorbed by a pint of water, which in consequence becomes 1° hotter than before, it is evident that on the gas being allowed to expand to its original volume it will re-absorb the heat imparted to the water, or an equivalent amount from the nearest substance. If matters are so arranged that the expanding gas cannot obtain this amount of heat from surrounding substances, an equivalent amount of heat is taken from its own temperature, which thus becomes very considerably reduced. It is this principle which has enabled the Russian chemists Wroblewski and Olzewski, at Cracow, to first liquefy air, and Professor Dewar, of London, to first liquefy hydrogen and helium.

The various steps made in the progress from the simple apparatus of Faraday, to the exceedingly costly and extensive machinery involved in Professor Dewar's methods, whilst extremely interesting to the scientific student, do not concern us here, and we shall content ourselves with brief descriptions of two of the most successful of modern methods.

The apparatus as used by Professor Dewar consists essentially of three very strong steel tubes, so arranged that the smallest one is completely surrounded by the second, with a clear space between the two, whilst the second is in its turn similarly surrounded by the third. Into the outermost tube liquid nitrous oxide is passed under a pressure of 1,400 lbs. per square inch, and, after being cooled, is then caused to expand, producing a fall of temperature to -150° . This cold in the outermost tube causes another gas, ethylene, which is passed into the next inner tube at a pressure of 1,800 lbs. per square inch, to become liquid. When this liquid ethylene has cooled down to -150° , which is the temperature of its surroundings, it is then in turn made to evaporate, this still further reducing its temperature to -240° . Into the innermost tube is passed oxygen, under a pressure of 750 lbs. per square inch, and being cooled by the evaporating ethylene to -240° , it becomes liquid. On withdrawing the liquid oxygen fully nine-tenths of it evaporates, thus lowering the remaining liquid to a temperature of -294° .

By forcibly evaporating liquid oxygen at this temperature, Professor Dewar got the lowest temperature yet obtained artificially, and by it he was able to liquefy hydrogen. This has only been obtained in a very limited quantity so far; but even with the small amount at his command, he produced a cold of about -346° , which was intense enough to convert oxygen and the air we breathe into snow-white solids.

Wonderful as these results are, however, this process, except by an enormous outlay, could only produce small quantities of the liquid gases.

It is to Mr. Tripler, of New York, that we are indebted for the method which will yield a practically limitless quantity of liquid air, or other gas, at a very much less expense. The method employed is so simple, that one wonders why it was not adopted previously, for it depends upon no new discovery, but, as we shall see, is merely an application of the same principle as Professor Dewar's. No other gas but the one it is intended to liquefy is employed.

The gas, or air, which needs no preparation, and is hence, much cheaper, is compressed by powerful air-pumps until it is subjected to a pressure of between 2,000 and 3,000 lbs. per square inch. The heat which this compression causes is absorbed by passing the compressed air through strong pipes surrounded by running water. Then by a peculiarly constructed device, a certain proportion of the now cool compressed air is allowed to escape, the pressure within the tubes still being maintained by the air-pumps. As the escaping gas expands its temperature is reduced, and the cold air is made to circulate about a coil of pipes, through which it had just passed after being cooled by the water, and previous to being liberated. The compressed air within this coil is thus made to cool itself on expanding, and as it, in turn, is allowed to escape, the cooling process goes on, theoretically ad infinitum, practically, however, till a temperature of about -312° is reached. This, however, is variable, and depends upon external considerations which cannot be entered into here. So well does the machine work that this temperature is obtained within fifteen minutes of its starting. This temperature, together with the enormous pressure maintained, quickly converts the compressed air into a liquid, which may be drawn off at the rate of between thirty and forty gallons in ten hours. As the temperature within the pipes is so very intense, they have to be carefully protected from the heat of the room by very thick layers of felt. It is owing to the unlimited supply of liquid air at Mr. Tripler's command which has enabled him to make our American cousins much more cognisant of the capabilities of this strange form of air, than we are on this side of the Fish Pond.

Liquid air poured upon ice flies off hissing just as water would off red-hot iron, and similarly, a kettle of liquid air boils apparently as energetically when standing on a slab of ice as it does on a fire. This, at first, seems almost incredible, but when it is remembered that the ice is 344° hotter than the liquid air, whilst steam is only 180° hotter than ice, the phenomenon loses much of its incredibility.

A jet of steam directed on to the surface of liquid air is instantly frozen into a miniature snowstorm. In a few seconds an egg is frozen so hard that it requires a hard blow of a hammer to break it. All other liquids are speedily frozen when placed in liquid air, and quicksilver becomes so hard that it may be used as a hammer to drive a nail.

Iron exposed to this intense cold becomes as brittle as glass; lead becomes as stiff and elastic as steel; whilst a hollow india-rubber ball becomes as fragile as an egg-shell.

By the simple process of allowing liquid air to evaporate in an open dish, the nitrogen escapes first, and the percentage of oxygen in the remaining liquid gradually increases. If a pad of cotton wool, dusted freely with powdered charcoal, be saturated with this liquid and ignited by a spark, an explosion follows, closely resembling that of dynamite. This has already been put to practical use in a mine in Germany for blasting. The advantage of such an explosive over any other lies in the fact that should a charge fail to explode, in a short time it becomes harmless, owing to the rapid evaporation of the liquid air. Many lives are lost annually in removing charges of other explosives which have failed to ignite.

Since about 100 cubic feet of air are condensed into one gallon of the liquid, the latter will expand some 750 times in evaporating back to its former condition. Could this latent energy of liquid air be in some way safely controlled and employed in driving machinery, what an enormous force would be placed in the hands of the mechanics!

The practical man, of course, will want to know the use of all this experimenting, and apparent lavish, if not wasteful, expenditure of money. Even the most practical of practical men, however, ought to be more than satisfied with the benefits conferred on mankind already by this branch of research. Cold storage and refrigerating plant are to be found in every city, and not one of them could have existed but for the experiments of Faraday and his successors in the liquefaction of gases. And it is to their work entirely that the ammoniacal and dry air refrigerating processes are due, by one of which, not only can ice be obtained at any season or in any climate, but perishable goods of all kinds can be stored in good condition, and by the other, meat is carried well nigh halfway round the world. In many branches of manufacture, refrigerating plant is indispensable.

Were these the only possible outcome of such scientific pursuits, they would amply repay for all the time and trouble expended by the master-minds of science; but in addition we may confidently assert that the limit of practical utility has by no means been reached, and that many things now looked upon as impossible, may in the near future be brought within the bounds of possibility by means of the vast energy stored in these abysses of cold.

A Chat about Mohammedanism.

HOW many of us realise that there are actually more Mohammedans in the world than there are members of the Protestant Church? It is to be feared that a great many people, who do not take an active interest in the affairs of the greater outside world, have no conception of this most important fact. Yet to Christian people, and particularly to those engaged in missionary work, it is a fact of great significance. For Christianity, though it had seven hundred years' start of the religion founded by Mohammed, has so far not succeeded in vanquishing that most remarkable heresy. In God's own good time, we believe, this great work will be accomplished. But at present we are face to face with the fact that there are 200 million Mohammedans in the world, as against about 160 million Protestants.

Then there is another striking fact about Mohammedanism which is not realised, we venture to say, by more than one out of a hundred persons. If the question were asked, Which is the greatest Mohammedan empire in the world to-day? what kind of an answer would most folks give? Some would answer Turkey. Some would, perhaps, hesitate between Persia and Afghanistan. Others, reflecting upon the great Asiatic possessions of the Czar, would say Russia. Well, all these guesses would be wrong. The greatest Mohammedan empire in the world to-day is the British Empire—the empire of which we are all subjects, and whose great work in the Christian mission field is at once our pride and our privilege. But, the reader may say, how do you make it out that the British Empire, one of the greatest Christian Powers, is at the same time the greatest Mohammedan empire in the world? The answer is very simple. There are, roughly speaking, sixty million Moslems in India. Now India belongs to Britain, and the people of India are subjects of the British Empire. Therefore, seeing that she rules over sixty million Mohammedans in India alone, our Queen may be said to rule over more Mohammedans than any other living Sovereign. Moreover, there are Mohammedan British subjects in our African possessions and protectorates, and in other parts of the world over which the British flag waves. So that, to put the matter in a nutshell, we shall not be far wrong if we say that nearly half of the Mohammedans living to-day are fellow-subjects with us of the British crown.

This is a most suggestive thought. We believe that the great bulk of the missionary work of the present age devolves upon the Anglo-Saxon race. If it be so in regard to general missionary work, how much more so with regard to our Moslem fellow-subjects? Why, we may ask, did God give India to us? How is it that it seems to be our destiny to civilise the vast Egyptian Soudan, and carry the torch of European light into the vast dark-nesses of Central Africa? Think of it for a moment. Who opened out Africa? Livingstone, Mackay, Moffat, Stanley, Baker, Burton, Speke, Grant, Gordon, Mungo Park, Thomson—all these men were British. Amongst them they have crossed Africa in every direction; amongst them they discovered the Nile sources, and the great Nyanzas from which the ancient river flows; amongst them they carried first the Gospel to tribes sunk and soddened in ignorance and superstition. In India, too, we see the same thing. Now, why was this? Was it merely because the love of travel and exploration was deeper ingrained in the British nature than any other nature? No; certainly not. The answer is, as the saintly General Gordon used to observe, because God has set us apart to be the great missionary nation of the earth, and because India and Africa are at present the two great countries which offer the richest fields for our Christian enterprise.

It follows, therefore, that as a nation we are deeply concerned with the religion of Mohammed. It is a religion followed, as we have seen, by nearly 100 millions of our fellow-subjects. As missionaries, as rulers, as traders, and as travellers, we are brought into closer contact with Mohammedanism than we perhaps are with any other religion. That being the case it should interest us to know something about it. We should at least be conversant with the circumstances under which Mohammed arose as a prophet, and we should know something of the doctrines upon which he based his new faith, how that faith progressed, and how it stands to-day in its relationship to other religions. The object of this short paper is to make these points clear.

The story of Mohammed's career is interesting and romantic, but it is too well known to need more than a few sentences. Mohammed himself was a camel-driver in Arabia. He was born at Mecca in the latter half of the sixth century. Though poor he came of a pure-blooded family, and though it did not keep him from having to work for his living, it yet explains how a common camel-driver should have the lofty mind which Mohammed undoubtedly possessed. Now at that time there was really no religion in Arabia. Arab rites had descended to idolatry with no spiritual significance at all. Mohammed had a spiritual nature, and his soul craved for something better than the debasing beliefs of his people. So he sought to bring back his people to the worship of one God. That was the key-note of his faith. "There is no God but God" is the corner-stone of Islam, and is the sentence ever on the lips of pious Moslems. Mind you, Mohammed did not understand God quite in the same light as we do. He was groping after truth and he very nearly took hold of it. His preaching met with very little favour. He and a band of a dozen or so followers were forced to fly from Mecca for their lives. That became the year I. of the Mohammedan era. After the flight Mohammed's whole conduct underwent a change. He determined to become a conqueror and to force his new religion upon his nation. So he busied himself at Medinah, where he had taken refuge, in perfecting his faith. He made a system of it. He introduced rites and ceremonies, laid down articles of belief, etc., and in the process it has to be confessed that it lost a great deal of its early spirituality and was considerably materialised. Moreover, Mohammed ceased to regard himself solely as a teacher and prophet. There is no doubt that he burned for vengeance upon the city which had cast him out and determined to make it accept the new religion even at the point of the sword.

We cannot follow Mohammed's career step by step. It is interesting but space is not sufficient. The writer has been privileged to do it elsewhere, and to follow closely the development of the prophet's mind. Of course, he conquered Mecca. Then he conquered the whole of Arabia. Then the whole of Syria, and great tracts of Asia acknowledged his sway. The Holy Land, Damascus, and even Europe were invaded, and the Moslem arms triumphed. Spain became a Mohammedan country, and even France was threatened. But for the great battle of Tours, as the historian Gibbon says, Mohammedan teachers might have been expounding the Koran to-day in the pulpits of Oxford and Cambridge. Meanwhile, Mohammed himself had died. He had lived to become a red-hot fanatic, consumed with a passion to conquer and proselytise. His generals swept over the land with blood-red sword, offering to the vanquished the alternative of death or submission to Islam. The lust of battle, the desire to conquer, had taken the place of the holy zeal and the spiritual yearnings which had characterised the earlier teachings of Mohammed. His religion was imposed by the sword, and it had to be maintained by the sword until its roots had penetrated deep enough to be self-supporting.

Now it is obvious that Mohammedanism must have possessed some good qualities to have taken root at all, and to have flourished in foreign soil when Arabian protection was withdrawn. Those good qualities are plain enough. For one thing, the new faith substituted the worship of one true God for the worship of idolatrous images. It swept fetishism and heathenism away with indignation. It gave men a God to worship—a rational, holy, and almighty Being, who had made heaven and earth and hell, who regarded man as His fairest work, who watched over him with pitying love, who rewarded his virtues and punished his sins. It taught man the dignity of human nature. Unfortunately, as already stated, it was too materialistic. Salvation is effected by a mechanical performance of rites and a periodic repetition of prescribed prayers. Yet, on the other hand, it inculcated cleanliness, chastity, fasting, charity and hospitality; it denounced murder, adultery, perjury, tittle-tattling, gambling, drunkenness, the lending of money at high interest, and so on. Its standard of perfection was easy of attainment, and any man who willed might become a devout follower of the prophet. On the whole, it was a great advance on the paganism which it displaced, and remembering the schisms in the Christian Church in those days, and how difficult it was for a convert to know what was truth, it is not altogether surprising, as one of our bishops has said, that Mohammedanism was sometimes embraced as an easy way out of the difficulty. One of its greatest faults is the low estimate it takes of women. A Mohammedan may have four wives and as many concubines as he can afford. Women have no part in religion, and paradise is not for "the likes of them." A great feature is the pilgrimage to Mecca and Medinah, the birthplace and burial-place of Mohammed, which is every year made by quite half a million Moslems.

How Mohammedanism will fare in the immediate future is not easy to say. If we believe the Scriptures all heresies will one day be subdued by the Gospel of Christ. At present, however, it is very strong, though it is making fewer converts now than ever it did. Moreover, the outside influences operating upon it are more numerous and vigorous than ever. Then, too, there are movements inside.

The old fanaticism is being broken down; the ancient prejudices are crumbling away. Western influences in Mohammedan countries are all working in favour of Christianity. The Moslem, however bigoted, cannot but see that the European is his superior in the arts of peace, of civilisation, of comfort, of mental and social advancement. Respect for the European begets respect for the European's religion. There is a spirit of inquiry abroad. The oriental mind is seeking information, and is becoming receptive to the truth. To us, this is of pleasing import. The work of Christianising the Mohammedan world seems to have been placed in our hands. It is for us to go forward and use the privileges we have, and await the result with patience and hope.

The Traditional Birthplace of William Tyndale.

WE are obliged to use the word "traditional" in writing of the birthplace of that illustrious reformer who first gave to English people the New Testament in their own tongue. Foxe, the author from whom we might have expected full details, tells us no more than that Tyndale was born about the borders of Wales, and up to the present time, no information of an absolutely conclusive character has been obtained. There is one place, however, where the people do not appear to be in doubt about the matter, and that is North Nibley, in Gloucestershire. Its inhabitants relate, with pardonable pride, the tradition which for about three centuries has been generally credited, and which assigns to their modest village the honour of having given to the world a man so justly renowned as William Tyndale.

Having noticed, during a journey from Bath to Stonehouse, the fine pillar which pierces the horizon to the east of the Vale of Berkeley, and learning from a fellow-traveller that it was the monument erected in memory of Tyndale at Nibley, the writer was led by appreciation of the man and his work, to make a kind of pilgrimage to the spot. The nearest point that can be reached by rail is Dursley, a quaint old country town, with its ancient market-place—one of the few such market-places still to be met with in the country. From Dursley, a walk of nearly an hour, up the long steep ascent of Stinchcombe Hill, and across the pretty valley which lies beyond it, brings the traveller to North Nibley, nestling at the foot of the lofty knoll on the top of which the monument is perched. The village itself, though picturesque, is not particularly interesting. There are a number of scattered houses, two hotels, a church and chapel, and a blacksmith's shop, where the key of the monument and an attendant can be obtained. The custodian of the key, who was busy in his garden, proved very communicative, TYNDALE'S MONUMENT ON NIBLEY KNOLL.

and was evidently quite familiar with the details of the local tradition regarding Tyndale. He pointed out the position of Hunt's Court, which stands in the fields just below the village, surrounded by trees and farm-buildings. It has usually been regarded as the translator's birthplace, and undoubtedly, a family of Tyndales lived there in the reign of Henry VIII.

From the top of the village, a steep, winding path leads up the well-wooded face of the knoll to the plateau, on the south-west edge of which the monument stands. When seen from the top of the hill, with the Severn valley for its background, it looks very massive and imposing. It was erected in 1865, and is nearly forty yards in height. The base is surrounded by strong iron railing. A heavy door, kept securely locked, leads to the interior, and over the doorway is a suitable inscription. The view from the little room at the top is very charming. From one of the strongly barred windows, the Bristol Channel is distinctly visible, while the position of Bristol city is indicated by the smoke rising from its thousands of chimneys. From another, Berkeley Castle can be seen gleaming among the trees, and beyond it the broad estuary of the Severn, on the banks of which Lydney and Sharpness are easily discernible. On the horizon rises the dense foliage of the Forest of Dean, the smoke from its busy mines ascending in dense masses. To the north the view is cut off by Stinchcombe Hill, though the attendant asserted that on a clear day the top of Gloucester cathedral could be seen. Fixed to the wall on the inside are two cases containing facsimile copies of the reformer's writings, one showing specimen pages of his New Testament, the other a letter from his pen.

Far below lies the little village, its straggling streets, gardens, ricks, trees, and leafy hedge-rows presenting an aspect of delightful diversity. The whole scene is strongly suggestive of repose and quietude. No noisy railroad, winding canal, or busy highway, with its rush of commerce, comes near it. No great industry is, or ever has been, carried on here. "Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife," nearly all the people are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and life, even in the village itself, must be very uneventful. It is, however, in many respects, an ideal birthplace for a great and independent thinker. Indeed, it was not easy to resist the feeling that if Tyndale was not born here he should have been. How pleasing to think of him as a boy, spending much of his time in the open air, inhaling the pure and health-giving breezes, bathing in the bright sunshine, rambling in the fields and lanes, or climbing the knoll on which his monument now stands! The extensive view from its summit, bounded on one side by the Mendip hills, and on another by the Welsh mountains, with the gradually widening Bristol Channel between them, reflecting, perchance, the glories of the autumn sunset, must have suggested to his youthful imagination the immensity of that world on the stage of which he was to take so important a part. Such a life would afford opportunity for thought, an inestimable boon to those who know how to use it. It would also be favourable to the development of self-reliance, and that resolute independence of character without which it is not easy for a man to dare the horrors of martyrdom.

At the time when Tyndale was born the country was in a very unsettled state. The Wars of the Roses, with their fearful expenditure of blood and treasure, had been brought to an end by the fatal battles of Barnet, where the king-maker, Lord Warwick, fell, and Tewkesbury, where the hopes of the Lancastrians were finally extinguished. During this period of political chaos, in addition to the horrors of the Civil War, there were frequent frictions among the nobles, for which, under a settled government, they would have been called to a strict account. To many of them might was right, and law was often openly ignored. In 1471, the date of the battle of Tewkesbury, Nibley Green was the scene of a remarkable conflict which illustrates the disorder of the times. Two noblemen, Thomas Talbot, Viscount Lisle, and William, Lord of Berkeley, both claimed possession of the Manor of Nibley. Becoming impatient at the tardy manner in which the law courts dealt with their claims, they summoned their retainers and met at Nibley to decide the matter in a more summary manner. In the sanguinary battle which followed, a hundred and fifty men were slain, Viscount Lisle being among the fallen. This event must have been fresh in the minds of the villagers in 1480, about which time Tyndale was born; or, if we accept the earlier date of 1470, he would be an infant in his mother's arms.

It is interesting to inquire what possible influence the environment of his early years may have had upon the later career of this "apostle of England," even though our conclusions are purely conjectural. We may be fairly certain that his parents were in a position to give to their son a good elementary education, and that he himself gave early indication of that perseverance, thoroughness, and love of knowledge which characterised the whole of his life. He tells us that as a child he had read the English Chronicle, and he remembered that a Saxon king had caused some part of the Holy Scriptures to be translated into English—a significant reminiscence. The old historical castle of Berkeley, whose lord held sway over the whole of the surrounding district, must have had great interest for a mind such as Tyndale's. But Berkeley, a century earlier, had as its vicar a disciple of Wycliffe's. That great "Reformer before the Reformation" appears to have held a living near Bristol, and prominent Lollards had preached and taught in the vicinity. Quite possibly, their views may have obtained considerable acceptance in the valley, and under shelter of the Civil War, which left bishops but little time for religious persecution, the small villages among the Cotswolds may have been visited by glimmerings of the purer faith.

In no part of the country was the need of the Reformation more apparent than in Gloucestershire. True, it had a great reputation for religion. There were in it numerous wealthy religious establishments, six mitred abbots, and crowds of monks,

AN OLD HOUSE IN SLIMBRIDGE.

while an arrogant and dominant clergy ministered in the churches. But those entrusted with the spiritual welfare of the people were ignorant and superstitious to a degree which is scarcely credible. Hooper, as Bishop of Gloucester, found no less than one hundred and sixty-eight among his clergy who were unable to repeat the ten commandments, and scores of them did not know where the Lord's Prayer was to be found. At Hales Abbey, a relic known as the "b'ood of Hales," an object of adoration to the pious throughout the West of England, was shown to pilgrims. To those in mortal sin the blood was said to be invisible, but this was explained by the fact that the exhibitor turned the clear side of the phial toward the observer, when the opposite side, which contained a coloured fluid was, of course, hidden from sight. This glaring imposition shows what must have been the moral and intellectual condition, not only of those who practised it; or were parties to it, but also of those who were so readily deceived by such jugglery. A meaningless and often ridiculous ceremonialism had been substituted for spiritual worship, and religion had come to be regarded by many as nothing more than a pious farce. The youthful Tyndale must have had some knowledge of these things, and probably the recollection of such "wickedness and worship" was one of the incentives which, in later life, moved him to provide for his countrymen the only true remedy for such abuses—the pure Word of God.

We have spoken of Nibley as the traditional birthplace of Tyndale. The tradition has not by any means been allowed to pass without question. Probably the rival which has the best ground for contesting the truth of the tradition is Slimbridge, an adjoining parish, stretching down to the banks of the Severn, about three miles north of Berkeley. A visit to this place seemed necessary to complete our pilgrimage. The neighbourhood is a great contrast to that in the vicinity of the monument. There the traveller has before him one of the finest views that even the Cotswolds afford, a fruitful valley of vast extent, with its noble river stretching in magnificent panorama before him. Here he can often see no farther than the nearest hedge. Some of the land in the parish has, in fact, been reclaimed from the Severn, and according to the Rev. R. Demaus, to whose biography of Tyndale the writer is largely indebted, these river-lands, as a part of the Manor of Hurst, were in the possession of a family of Tyndales at a very early date. Stokesley, who had been rector of Slimbridge, speaks of an Edward Tyndale, brother to Tyndale "the arch-heretic and under-receiver of the lordship of Berkeley." From another source it appears that this under-receiver in 1529 secured a lease of Hurst Manor, and there the above-named authority supposes Tyndale and his brother to have been born. Inquiries in the village, however, failed to elicit any evidence of a local tradition to that effect. Whether Slimbridge can sustain its claim to be the place which gave to the world the great reformer, experts must be left to determine. Tradition undoubtedly awards the honour to North Nibley.

A visit to the birthplace of a great man inspires thoughts and emotions somewhat similar to those which arise while viewing the head-waters of a large river. In both you have the beginning of an important course. That bubbling spring, or tiny stream coming forth to the light, how the imagination, aided by knowledge, follows its waters on their way to the wide ocean! It is pictured flowing from the uplands to the dales and valleys, amid wooded ravines or yellow cornfields, ministering in its later course to large towns with their immense industries, and having at its mouth a great city whose merchant-princes send out on its bosom fleets laden with treasure, bound for all parts of the world. So as one stands on Nibley Knoll, viewing the village and neighbourhood lying below, thinking of the beginning of that famous career with which tradition has so intimately connected it, the main facts of his chequered course are called up and pass in rapid review before the mind.

From his home, whether at Nibley or Slimbridge, he went first to Oxford, where he may have heard Colet giving his famous lectures. Then, for some unexplained reason, he moved to Cambridge, where he was brought under the influence of Erasmus, then the most popular lecturer of the University. Whether the young student's subsequent translation of the Scriptures was in any degree the consequence of the bold statement of Erasmus that he would have the Scriptures translated into "all the languages of all people," may be uncertain, but the influence of such a teacher on such a scholar must have been very great. Having completed his education he returned to his native county, and for about two years found employment as tutor, or chaplain, to the family of Sir John Walsh at Little Sodbury. Here he formed his great purpose of translating the Scriptures from the original Greek, and it was probably about this time that he made his famous reply to a learned controversialist: "If God spare my life, I will, ere many years, cause a boy that driveth the plough, shall know more of the Scriptures than thou dost." His religious opinions bringing him into conflict with the clergy and Bishop of the Diocese, he went to London, hoping to find a patron who would assist him in his great work; but his expectations were disappointed, and he soon discovered that the Scriptures could not be translated and published with safety or convenience in any part of England.

But whether in England or elsewhere the work must be done; so Tyndale left his native land, to which he was never to return, and probably found his way to Wittenburg, the home of Luther, where his work of translation was completed. He superintended the publication of his New Testament at Cologne and Worms, issued a revised edition at Antwerp, and, finally, after being betrayed by a minion of Henry VIII., triumphed as a martyr at Vilvorde.

But the men who destroyed his body had no power to arrest the movement which his pen did so much to promote; and English-speaking people to-day in every part of the world are reading in their New Testaments the very words and phrases into which Tyndale rendered the teachings of Christ and His Apostles.

Friendship.

TRUE Friendship, youthful Love's young sister fair,

On silent pinions floating through the night,
Lo! midst the threatening tempest of despair,

Thy love-lit brow breaks on my aching sight—
Nor stay nor shelter seeking, on thy breast
My storm-tossed spirit finds th' eternal Rest.

So, when the day of battle sets in gloom,

With myriad passions crowding to the ear,
While Love lies dying by the lonely tomb,

Filling the soul with images of fear,—

Thy heavenward finger points the soul's release;
Thy soft voice, whispering, breathes the perfect Peace.

The Money in the Jar.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE, AUTHOR OF "ON GOD'S LINES."

AND who was the man with the beaming face, sitting in the third pew on the right hand side?"

It was the French savant who made the inquiry. David Dale, his family and guest were dining at the house beside the chapel. The service of the morning was under review. "You must have noticed him!" Monsieur Delcasse continued. "The sermon seemed to lift him to the seventh heaven of delight. From beginning to end he was beaming!"

"It will be Ralph he means!" Bob interjected, addressing his father.

"Certainly!" responded the engineer. "That's where he sits, and sure enough he beams. Ralph Jackson!" he replied in answer to the Frenchman.

"I think I never saw a sunnier face!" Monsieur Delcasse proceeded. "His eyes were on the preacher's face, and all he heard seemed to increase his satisfaction. The truth is, he was restless with delight. He was rubbing his hands and smiling and nodding to the minister all through the piece. It did me good to see him. Fact is, I found myself smiling in sympathy. Indeed, I should not be surprised if your minister thought I was beaming also with Protestant fervour. . . . Ralph Jackson, you say, is his name?"

There were smiles on the faces of the Dales. Evidently the man who beamed was a favourite of the family.

"He always does that!" Mrs. Dale remarked. "Every service he attends is the best he ever attended. It is quite amusing to hear him. He would probably tell Mr. Kent this morning that that was the best sermon he ever preached, and when Mr. Prosser preaches to-night, he will declare to him that his discourse is the finest ever heard in Rosehill!"

"That's just what he did say to Mr. Kent, mother," Miss Dale remarked. "He came up when I was asking about the children, and he nearly wrung Mr. Kent's hand off. 'That's the best o' the lot!' he exclaimed. 'Last Sunday night's was a clipper, but not to be mentioned alongside o' this mornin's.' Mr. Kent was highly amused, and said, when Ralph was out of hearing, that the latest was always the best to him."

"Didn't you see for yourselves how he was beaming?" the savant persisted. "I'm afraid you didn't, otherwise you would all have been beaming too. It was positively contagious!"

"We are quite accustomed to all these eccentricities!" Bob explained. "We always know that Old Steve will be doing the dramatic, and that Brother Ralph will be smiling encouragement. The two of them help the preachers wonderfully, so they say, but Ralph more than Steve. A smile is more easily understood than a gesture. The students think the world of Ralph. Rosehill, they say, is a critical congregation, but Ralph helps to put them at ease when he mounts his smile."

"He's a grand fellow, Ralph Jackson!" David Dale proudly said. "Rosehill would have amply justified its existence if it had done nothing else than make him the man he is. Twenty years ago, nobody would have dreamt of such a thing. He was hail-fellow-well-met with all the rowdies, wasting his money and constantly getting into disgrace.

What a triumph it was when he got converted! You don't believe in that sort of thing, monsieur!" the engineer politely observed, turning to his guest. "Nevertheless, if Ralph Jackson had not been converted, you wouldn't have seen him beaming in a chapel. . . . Oh, yes! he was ridiculed and tempted, and the prophets generously gave him a fortnight to recant, but there he is, firm as a rock, true as steel, sound as a bell. And what a witness he is in the district! The outsiders don't believe that we chapel people are as good as we profess to be, but they are all agreed that Ralph is as good as he looks, and a great deal better."

Ralph came alone to the chapel on the mount. His wife and sons never accompanied him. Their worldliness was the cross he carried. How he grieved none but God perceived. Many an hour he spent in prayer for the redemption of those who made his home. To complain he did not dare. The indifference of his wife, and the viciousness of his lads, he regarded as the bitter harvest of his own misdeeds. The best he had done after his conversion to undo the mischief he had wrought before. All was unavailing. Nothing was done to thwart his new procedure, but Jim and Harry were godless, and the mother shared their shame. There were shadows in the sunshine and griefs in the joy. But despair never oppressed him. Without ceasing he prayed and waited for God's answer. That the answer would come he doubted not. Faith gave him the radiant visage. He "looked unto Him," and his face was "lightened."

"It'll all come right, see if it isn't!" he would say at the class-meeting. "It wasn't to be expected that the Lord would put things straight all at once. We'd get kind o' careless like if we got the notion that the Almighty was sharp to interfere when we got things in a rabble. . . . I mun bide His time, an' then when He finds it convenient, He has just to say the word, an' all 'll be as it should be!"

Ralph's denominational fidelity was a passion. He was a Primitive Methodist, he was wont to say, from top to toe. No secret he made of his ecclesiastical preference. "I was born in England, an' consequently, fond o' me 'Queen an' country," he would explain to any inquirer, "an' born again in Primitive Methodism, an' equally consequently, fond of its folks an' ways." In the Providence of God, Primitive Methodism had been the channel through which the grace had come. He never forgot the debt. He never could forget. It is to his credit that never for an hour was the obligation absent from his mind.

To some, his loyalty savoured of bigotry. He had reason to be grateful, and he was. In other churches he had been, but never when service was being held at Rosehill. The idea of being absent from his own to be present at another never appeared to him in the light of the feasible.

His ecclesiasticism decided his literature. The magazines he read were those which bore the denominational name. No books he bought save those issued by the Connexional Publishing House. If pressed he would have acknowledged that he did sometimes glance at an evening newspaper, but would have followed the confession with the affirmation that it was perfect nonsense in comparison with the denominational journals.

His loyalty took eccentric shapes. Advertisements appeared in the press of the Connexion of teas and cocoas, jellies and jams, medicines and pills. This was enough for Ralph. His patronage was secured.

Bi-annually he speculated in a new suit. Every summer he purchased a hat. During the course of years he bought three umbrellas. Quite well it was known with whom he had been in communication. It was a law with him that Primitive Methodists had the first chance; if he were obliged to make his bargains beyond the boundary, the fault was not his.

"Bless the Lord!" The ejaculation was the introduction to his testimony at the love-feast. "Bless the Lord! It's the pleasure of my life that I hev either part or lot in this matter. It was Jesus who put me right, an' He left me in the hands o' the Primitives to smarten up an' finish off. 'An' weel they're managin'! The beaver there's the make of a Ranter. The umbrel' in the corner came from one of our sort in the Sooth, an' this new suit o' mine was made in a Primitive's shop. There's all the trades in the Connexion, an' we should be loyal even wi' the shoppin'. . . . Ay! ay! I see ye're smilin', but if ye felt as I feel, ye would wish ye had more money to give all the business Prims. a lift. . . . Jesus is very fond o' the Primitives. He puts in His appearance whenever we meet. He's rare an' pleased when we're gettin'-on, because He sees that He'll be all the better when we're prosperous. . . . So let's all be loyal to the Connexion, an' then when all the Connexions come to the kingdom, we'll be worthy of a prominent place an' a special reception."

By-and-by, Ralph became an official and a financier. The Rev. Caleb Kent needed a magazine steward, and requested Ralph to oblige him. "I'm yer man!" Ralph rejoined, "an' I'll get ye yer money reg'lar!" He had neither safe nor money-box, but he had an empty jam-jar, bearing the name of a manufacturer whose munificence to the Connexion led Ralph to think that his works were a mint as well as a factory. The jar came in handy, and, standing on the cupboard's top-shelf, contained the money he received for the serials' payment.

Such was Ralph's proficiency in securing cash down that he was empowered to sell the preacher's plans. Jar Number Two was requisitioned.

The crowning honour was the gathering of the pew-rents, and a seat in the Quarterly Meeting as the representative of the Trust. This was a more serious undertaking. Coppers were not receivable for seat-rents. Gold and silver were the coins. Jar Number Three stood on the shelf.

Ralph could have supplied change to all the district, but was scandalised at the very suggestion. As he received the moneys, he put them into their respective jars, and when the times of reckoning came, emptied them of their contents.

The sight of the jars gave him a sense of importance, and the fact that they were originally the property of a distinguished Primitive Methodist manufacturer, that they had been filled with jam made in his establishment, that they now contained moneys for specific Connexional purposes, differentiated the said jars from all the millions of their kind.

"There they are!" he would say, opening the cupboard door, "three of the best financial members in the Connexion!"

The New Year had dawned. At 7.30 on the Friday night the Yearly Trustees' Meeting was to be held. By desire of the minister, the books were to be audited in the hour preceding.

Ralph Jackson had no time to lose. Five o'clock was closing-time at the Excelsior Iron Works. Only an hour and a half he had to get his tea and wash and dress. Promptly to the minute he was there, with his book and the jar.

"We must check the pew-steward's receipts first!" the minister observed to the chapel treasurer; "so that we may be sure all the items are correct. Ralph!" he announced, "I'll begin with yours. I see you have brought the jar!"

"Ay!" Jackson rejoined. "It would be no use comin' without it. The book 'll be necessary for the paper work, but figures are not to be mentioned alongside the brass. It's all in the jar, an' if weight be anythin' to judge by, this quarter 'll beat the record."

Silently he watched as the minister examined the counterfoils, and calculated the revenue of the section of seats in Jackson's list.

"Five pounds and eleven shillings!" Mr. Kent exclaimed. "Ralph, you've done splendidly. Every sitting let, and no defaulters. Every fraction due paid up. Five pounds and eleven shillings for one section in one quarter! If the others are up to yours, the revenue of the pew-rents will more than cover the lighting and cleaning, and the incidental expenditure of the year."

Ralph was beaming, and was quite condescending in his encouragement to his colleagues when they confessed that their accounts were not free from debts. "Ye'll p'raps do better next time!" he said, ill-disguising his secret delight.

The money was being counted. Ralph had the empty jar in his hands.

Slightly the minister knit his brows. He had counted every coin. The cash was short.

Silently the recount began. The pound-heaps were reckoned anew, and the odd shillings totalled. The counterfoils and the coins were at variance.

Ralph saw the frown on the minister's face.

"What's up?" he interrogated, in much surprise.

"We must have got muddled in these receipts, Ralph!" Mr. Kent replied. "I must have included some of last quarter's. There's only four pounds six in the jar!"

"Ye began at the page I telt ye, didn't ye?" he questioned. "The quarter began with the first of October and finished with the end of the year."

He was sitting by the minister's side, indicating the quarter's first receipt.

"That was the start! I always give Martha Green the privilege of paying first. It pleases her. Now begin wi' Martha's shillin', an' reckon away!"

"One hundred and eleven shillings! Five pounds, eleven!" Caleb Kent announced, re-affirming the rent-book's evidence.

"Then the five pounds, eleven shillin's was in the jar!" Ralph emphatically declared.

Again the cash was counted. There was a deficiency of twenty-five shillings.

Ralph's colleagues sat in silence, watching his bewildered face. First at the money, then into the jar he looked, utterly at a loss to know how the error had been made.

"Ralph!"

It was the minister who spoke.

"Ralph!"

For the second time he was unconscious of the mention of his name.

"Ralph!" said Mr. Kent, laying his hand on the shoulder of the baffled steward, "are you sure you always received payment when you delivered the receipts? Look through them all again, and see if you cannot recall any of the pew-holders who have not handed you the fees!"

Jackson shook his head.

"They all paid when I called with the exception o' five, an' three o' them sent the money, one gave me the rent at the class, an' the other had it put by for when I called with the magazines. Every shillin' I've gotten, an' all I've gotten' was put in the jar, an' how it comes to pass that some on't's missin's what I cannot explain!"

And in the vestry six men sat in silence. The jar was on the floor—Jackson was peering within.

"Ralph," the treasurer ventured to say, "perhaps the five-and-twenty shillings may have got into the wrong jars. Wouldn't it be well for you to go and see?"

"Weel, it's hardly likely, Mr. Johnson!" Ralph made answer. "Number One's the magazines'. Number Two's the plans'. This is Number Three. I'm not see absent-minded as to mix the moneys. This jar's had the five pounds eleven. What it's done wi' the five-an'-twenty shillin's a perfect mystery!"

"We know how careful you are, Ralph!" the minister gently observed. "Still we are all liable to err, and obviously there is a mistake somewhere. Do as Mr. Johnson suggests! Go home and examine the other jars!"

He was at the door with the jar beneath his arm. "Five-an'-twenty shillin's!" he muttered. "Five-an'-twenty shillin's!"

He would be nearly home when the others discovered that he had gone without his cap.

The trustees were all assembled when he returned. Two jars he placed on the table before the minister.

"Ye'll oblige me by takin' the money for the magazines an' the plans!" he said in a voice trembling with agitation. "An' ye'll hev' to get another man for the future. I'm done wi' chapel moneys after this. The wife an' the lads are as upset as me at the disappearance o' the five-an'-twenty shillin's. P'raps the maister 'll stand bond for me the night, an' he can keep the money out o' me wages the morrow!"

David Dale was on his feet.

"There is no need for this, Ralph!" he exclaimed. "Somebody will know about the money, and it will turn up in good time. We cannot allow a thing of this sort to lead you to resign!"

"It's very kind o' ye to say see, Mr. Dale," he responded, with tears in his eyes; "but I would never feel safe wi' the Connexion's money after this. I feel humbled. I was proud o' the way I managed things, but me career's at an end in the financin' line."

All inducements and persuasions were futile. He squared the deficiency, and retired into private membership. He lost heart in the meetings, and never beamed when the sermons were preached. His wife and sons noticed his silence at home, and often discovered him glancing at the empty jars on the shelf when the door of the cupboard was opened.

And it came to pass in the spring-cleaning that the cupboard was re-papered and the shelves scrubbed. On the kitchen-table were the dishes and plates, the cups and saucers, the jars and glasses.

When Ralph came in at tea-time, the "three financial jars" arrested his attention. The misery was revived. Gnawing at his heart was the care; the disgrace of the deficiency tortured him anew; woe-begotten were his thoughts; he was shamed to the soul.

Drinking his tea at the little round table in the corner, his eyes persistently turned to the table square where the jars were standing. Since the night of the Trustees' Meeting when he had replaced them on the shelf, he had never touched them. The sight of them was the burning of the eyes; to touch them would be the scorching of the fingers.

Why he offered his services was beyond his power to explain. "I'll hand them up for tha, Eliza!" he remarked, as his wife, standing on a chair, was reaching to the table to replace the articles in the cupboard.

She was much surprised at her husband's proffered help. It was most unusual. Whenever she had asked for his assistance in any domestic difficulty, his compliance had been cheerful; but to place his services voluntarily at her disposal was without a precedent in the thirty years of their wedded life. She never "let-on," but she guessed the reason. "It's the jars he wants to handle," she thought to herself, and the thought was provocative of contemptuous amusement, rather than of sorrowful sympathy.

Her suspicion was confirmed when she noted that the jars were left to the last. The cups and saucers, the dishes and plates were in their places. The glasses were ranged in their corner.

"What's the jars done to tha?" she impatiently interjected, as he lingered at the table.

"I was only thinkin', Eliza, that they're not in the Connexion now!" was his cheerless reply. "It's a serious thing for the Church when a member's a bankrupt; unless he can show that the doonfall's a pure misfortune; he has to be expelled." The tears were raining down his cheeks. "If only it could speak it might be able to clear the mystery up. The other two look kind o' shamed o' the one that lost the money, an' huffed that his sin has to be visited on them!"

"Ralph Jackson!" she screamed. "Ye'll be a lunatic unless ye mend yer tactics. Ye talk to the jars as though they were wise as Christians. Hand them up, an' let's get finished!"

She was glad when the first was in her hands. "What are ye shiverin' at?"

Her impatience was vexation.

"Ye nearly dropped it, an' then ye would hev wanted a reg'lar burial, an' a funeral sarmon. It's as weel it's still alive, an' on the shelf beside its mate!"

On the table stood the defaulting jar in the isolation of its shame. Ralph was blinded with his tears. The disgrace of the money's loss was anguish insufferable.

"Will ye pass me that jar?" his wife demanded savagely.

With a sweep of his jacket sleeve, he dashed the tears from his eyes, and, gripping the jar with both hands, passionately questioned it. "Where's the five-an'-twenty shillin'? Tell me that! Tha's a disgrace to the Connexion! What's tha done wi' the money?"

This was more than the woman could stand. She leaped from the chair, with a bound confronted her husband, snatching the jar from his fingers.

"What a fool religion's made tha!" she sneered. "It's stolen thee wits!"

"Lord 'a mercy! What's in the jar?"

Her voice was a whisper. Consternation was in her looks. She was looking within the jar, and at the paper package. She held the jar so that the inside was visible to Ralph.

"Put it down, an' let's think!"

Excitement had unnerved him.

"What's tha think it can be?" he breathed.

"Dear knows!" was her bewildered reply.

"Hadrn't we better open it out?"

This seemed the course of wisdom, yet he hesitated to take it.

"We'll never know unless we do!" was her opinion, diffidently given.

"See what it is, Eliza!"

"I'm sure an' I'll not!" she retorted with sharpness. "The jar's thine, an' I'll see tha far enough before I'll meddle wi' its secrets."

His hand trembled as it crept its way within the jar. The touch of the packet gave desperation to his movements. With an air of boldness he undid the paper. The coins fell on the table—a sovereign and two half-crowns.

Ralph's hands were clasped. He was offering a prayer of thankfulness. The tears welled up in his eyes again, but they were tears of grateful joy.

He apologised to the jar, and eloquently uttered his eulogy. "Tha has the best o' me this time!" he said with his dancing eyes upon the jar. "Tha's vindicated thesel' at last. Dear knows how long tha's been wantin' to speak, but I've never had the sense to take tha' into me confidence. Tha's cleared thee character. Tha's paid up the money, an' tha can come into the Connexion again without a stain on thee character. . . We'll get thee mates down, an' get them telt!"

To his happy heart it really seemed as though the other jars were proud of their comrade's honour in the proof of innocence.

The paper caught his eye. Harry's signature was affixed to the confession of his fraud and restitution. He had not meant to steal the money, and, indeed, had refunded it on the day succeeding the discovery of its loss. There it had lain through all the weeks. His father's silent sorrow had been a ceaseless reproach to the son who had occasioned it. To his brother he had confided the secret, but neither had had the courage to give the parents a hint.

The mother was broken-hearted, and wept for very shame. Ralph comforted her with prophecies of a brighter future.

When Jim and Harry appeared at eight o'clock, having finished the hours of overtime, they knew that all was known. That night was memorable in the home of the Jacksons.

He did his best, but failed completely, to conceal his pride when Eliza and the lads accompanied him to Rosehill. In the wide, wide world there was not a happier man than he. When the ministers preach, he beams as in the days of yore. Once more, he has official rank in Primitive Methodism. The jars are on the shelf, and in the financial service of the Connexion.

Browsings in My Library.

VIII.

WHEN October is at the door, and reading is impossible without the lamp at six o'clock, and there is a shrewdness in the autumn air, a fire in the book-room becomes very pleasant. Delia, to do her justice, humours me in this respect, because, she says, if she didn't, the worm (the bookworm) might turn, and she does not want my temper to become any worse than it is. I more than suspect, however, that she herself enjoys an evening spent with her feet on the book-room fender, doing her sewing, or reading a story or a favourite poet. Sometimes, too, as to-night, my eldest boy, Oliver, is privileged to sit for an hour or two in the book-room after the little ones are snugly in bed. Delia has filled the vases on the mantelpiece with Virginian creeper from the garden, rich in the hues of autumn, and scarlet dahlias flame from a bowl on the table under the window. Delia is reading Tennyson, and she makes me listen to the pretty "Swallow" song from her favourite, "The Princess," never prettier than when its word-music falls expressively from her lips.

"Don't you think," she asks, "that the poet has beautifully caught the atmosphere of the autumn? And how skilfully in the rhythm he imitates the flight of the bird as it seeks its warm winter home:

"O swallow, swallow, flying, flying South,
Fly to her, and fall upon her gilded eaves,
And tell her, tell her, what I tell to thee.

Oh, tell her, brief is life, but love is long,
And brief the sun of summer in the North,
And brief the noon of beauty in the South."

There seems something in the autumn that irresistibly inclines one to melancholy, even more so than the winter, but I don't exactly see why."

"That is a charming song," I reply, "and it is a wonderful phenomenon that suggests it—the autumn flight of the birds. I remember once, at this time of the year, being at Campbelltown, at the point of Cantyre, the long peninsula stretching out from Argyllshire. One evening the roof of the church was completely covered by thousands of birds gathered for their flight southward, away from the frosts of the North. They were probably going something like a couple of thousand miles, to the north coast of Africa. How do they find their way over the pathless waste of waters, and through the pathless fields of air, and how, in the spring, will they find their way back again to the very same districts, and very likely to the very same nests? It is a mysterious God-given instinct. I think sometimes, however, that it is only analogous to the heaven-homing instinct that God has implanted in our own souls. We have not wings of the body, but we have wings of the soul, folded up within the body, and often it seems that those wings are struggling to unfold themselves, and to carry us away to that land where there is no darkness, no cold, no hunger and no misery. I think we all feel sometimes like Browning's Paracelsus:

"I go to prove my soul!

I see my way as birds their trackless way.
I shall arrive! what time, what circuit first,
I ask not; but unless God send His hail
Or blinding fireballs, sleet or stifling snow,
In some time, His good time, I shall arrive;
He guides me and the bird, in His good time."

"But why do we associate pensive and sad thoughts with the autumn? Is it not the season of fruit?"

"Yes, but it is also the season of the dying sunshine and the fading leaves, of the growing darkness and the coming winter. The glorious colours of the creeper there are the colours of decay. We can say now, much more truly than we say on the evening of December 31st, 'The year is dying.' The almanac gives us a purely conventional year. The natural order of the seasons is Winter, Spring,

Summer and Autumn. In the autumn everything is dying. In the winter the first things of the New Year are being born. That, I think, we all feel instinctively. And consequently, our spirits tend to droop in the autumn, and all its glowing colours are like the colours of a summer sunset:

'As when some mighty painter dips
His pencil in the hues of rainbow and eclipse.'

We think of what is passing, rather than of what is coming. The sentiment of autumn has been tenderly enshrined by Henry Francis Lyte in his 'Autumnal Hymn':

'The leaves around me falling
Are preaching of decay;
The hollow winds are calling
'Come, pilgrim, come away!'
The day, in night declining,
Says, I must too decline;
The year its life resigning,
Its lot foreshadows mine.

The light my path surrounding,
The loves to which I cling,
The hopes within me bounding,
The joys that round me wing,
All melt like stars of even
Before the morning's ray,
Pass upward into heaven,
And chide at my delay.

The friends gone there before me
Are calling me from high,
And joyous angels o'er me
Tempt sweetly to the sky.
'Why wait,' they say, 'and wither
'Mid scenes of death and sin?'
Oh, rise to glory hither,
And find true life begin.'

I hear the invitation,
And fain would rise and come—
A sinner, to salvation;
An exile, to his home.
But while I here must linger,
Thus, thus, let all I see
Point on, with faithful finger,
To heaven, O Lord, and Thee.'

The boy was curiously examining the bookshelves. He is an inquiring spirit, and promises to be "a chip of the old block" in regard to books. I ask him—

"Oliver, are you looking for any particular book?"

"No, father, but I want to find if King Alfred really did spoil those cakes."

"Of course he did," said Delia. "Don't you know he was a great bookworm, like your father, and I would never trust him to look after the oven if there was anything in it."

"Thank you, Delia, you are quite right this time—at any rate, about the king. Alfred did spoil the cakes, and I will prove it on the testimony of his favourite bishop, Asser. Oliver, just reach me that book on the third shelf from the bottom, the seventh from the right hand corner—Vol. II. of 'The Church Historians of England.'"

Oliver did so. The book is a series of translations from Saxon chroniclers in Anglo-Saxon and Latin. Three of these, Bishop Asser, the friend of Alfred, Fabius Ethelwerd, one of Alfred's descendants in the next century, and the author of 'The Book of Hyde,' tell the story of the life of the great Saxon King, the centenary of whose death is to be celebrated on October 27, 1901. And this is what Asser says about the spoiled cakes: 'At the same time, (A.D. 878), Alfred, the king of the West Saxons, so often mentioned before, with a few of his nobles and some of his soldiers and vassals, passed a restless life in much anxiety among the woodland and marshy tracts of the county of Somerset. They had nothing for their use but what they obtained, either openly or craftily, from the Pagans, and from those Christians who had submitted to their rule, by constant assaults; and, as we read in the life of the holy father St. Neot, he was long concealed in the dwelling of one of his own cowherds. It happened one day, that the country-woman, the wife of this cowherd, was baking some cakes for food, while the king was sitting before the fire, and repairing his bow and arrows, and instruments of war. When the unlucky woman saw that the cakes which she had placed on the fire were burning, she ran up in great haste and removed them, and scolded our invincible king after this fashion: "Look, man, the cakes are burning, and you do not take the trouble to turn them; when the time for eating them comes, then you are active enough." This unlucky woman little thought her guest was King Alfred, who had fought so many battles against the Pagans, and had gained so many victories.'

"Well, I don't blame her," said Delia, "it would aggravate any woman."

"But, at any rate, he was not reading, but mending arrows."

"I dare say he was thinking about what he had been reading," was her retort, determined to have the last word.

It happened that this was the evening fixed for the Political Parson to call and get material for his lecture on Alfred. We soon heard his knock, and when he appeared, Delia said, "It's well you've come, for Librarian was getting quite excited about Alfred's cakes."

I explained the matter, and read the extract, of which the Political Parson made a note, and then bade me, "Fire away with the rest." And I did "Fire away," but if I were to retail here all I said and read, it would fill a dozen pages of this Magazine. I can only repeat it here in the briefest summary.

Alfred was born at Wantage, in Berks, in the year 849. He was the fourth son of Ethelwulf, king of the West Saxons, and Queen Osburga. At the age of twenty-three he succeeded his brother Ethelred on the throne, but the throne was then the most uncomfortable seat in England. For the land was ravaged by fierce Danes, who burnt and pillaged the towns, and swept over the country like a prairie fire, and the Saxons, sunk in despair, had lost their ancient courage, and were miserable and famine-stricken, and engulfed in darkest ignorance, scarcely anyone in the land knew letters, and the Bible was a book all but unknown. Asser says that even Alfred, "by the shameful neglect of his relatives and guardians, remained ignorant of letters till the twelfth year of his age, and even more; but as he listened with earnest attention to the Saxon poems which others repeated in his presence, both by day and night, he retained them in his tenacious memory." His mother one day held up a book of poems and promised it to the first who should read it, and "being excited by this offer, or rather by a Divine inspiration," says Asser, Alfred borrowed the book, took it to a master, and soon returned able to repeat it all from memory.

A grievous and mysterious disease, probably of an epileptic character, afflicted the king from his twentieth till past his fortieth year, and he was almost constantly fighting the Danes, till, only a year or two before his death, he thoroughly subdued them, and settled them as his subjects in Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex. But neither disease nor warfare affected the energy and the humanity of his spirit, ever eager to advance the highest welfare of his people. He invited learned men from Germany, France, and from among the Britons who maintained their independence in the West, to settle in his land, and founded schools at Oxford, (the original of the University), and elsewhere. He established law and order, laying the foundations of the system of trial by jury, and other institutions, out of which our self-government has sprung. Every man, at last, after the weary misery of years, could "sit under his own vine and fig-tree, none daring to make him afraid." Says the author of the Book of Hyde, "This Alfred, the most Christian of sovereigns, and the most vigilant in the service of God, promulgated most excellent laws, by which he established such security in the kingdom, that if one were to hang up golden bracelets in a place where the road forked, they were in perfect safety."

"I'll take that down," said the Political Parson, "but let us hear a little more about Alfred's religion."

"Of course, his religion was the religion of his age, externally—that is to say, a religion mixed with a good deal of Roman superstition, but Alfred, like Cromwell, showed clearly enough that his religion was a grand reality, and it was a religion that he endeavoured, if ever man did, to translate into practice, and to diffuse among his people. The Book of Hyde tells how, in his lowest estate, a refugee among the marshes, the king, alone, 'was solacing his vagrancy by meditating on the Scriptures, when there stood by his side a pilgrim, begging alms in the name of God.' The charitable monarch, lifting up his hands to heaven, said to him, "I thank God, who hath to-day visited His beggar in a beggar's garb, who this day demands back what He had given, and requires me to restore His own with usury." The compassionate king quickly calls his servant, who had nothing but a little wine and a single loaf; and King Alfred, who was a man of most holy life, bids him give half to the beggar."

The Political Parson, Delia and Oliver, all clapped at this.

"If we only had a Parliament like Alfred," said the Political Parson, "we would soon get Old Age Pensions, and tax the ground rents."

"Asser tells how keenly Alfred felt the early neglect of his education, which the ceaseless occupation of his later years prevented him from ever making thoroughly good. But he lost no opportunity of getting and reading books, and having them translated and simplified for the people's benefit. He made many such translations of Scripture, and of religious and educational books, himself. A translation of the Psalms, with some prayers, he always carried in his bosom, and eagerly seized any stray minutes to read a few pages. His descendant Ethelwerd concludes his notice by saying, 'Finally, in the same year, the magnanimous Alfred, king of the Saxons, departed from the world; the immovable pillar of the West Saxons, a man full of justice, bold in arms, learned in speech, and imbued, above other things, with Divine knowledge. . . . Oh, reader, pray as follows: "O Christ, our Redeemer, save his soul."' Every historian, of every nation, who has written about Alfred, unites in praising him, as the noblest monarch who ever wore a crown. There were troubles enough after his death, but his work, in the main and in its spirit, was lasting. He was the true father of his people, the real founder of England, and a man whose memory every Englishman and Englishwoman should delight to honour in 1901."

"I beg his pardon about the cakes," said Delia. "There was plenty of excuse for him forgetting them."

"Thanks, old fellow," said the Political Parson. "Lend me those Chronicles. With them and Green's History, I ought to get out a lecture that will go down as well as the Cromwell one."

While Delia went to fetch coffee, the Political Parson unburdened his wrath over the horrible iniquity of the Dreyfus judgment, and expressed his wish that a King Alfred would arise in France, who should make a clean sweep of the vile brood of generals and colonels who crucify justice in the name of the "honour of the army."

I opened the Bible and read from the 94th Psalm:

"Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with Thee, who frameth mischief by a law?

"They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemn the innocent blood.

"But the Lord is my defence; and my God is the Rock of my refuge.

"And He shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off."

"Amen!" fervently ejaculated the Political Parson. And "Amen!" echoed Delia and the boy,

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

VII.—THE UNION QUESTION AGAIN.

THE question of union with the Bible Christians has now entered upon its crucial stage. The Conference has decided that the whole matter shall be laid before the Quarterly Meetings for final decision—final, that is, so far as the question of union or no union is concerned. That is the main question. All others relate to matters of detail which become of no consequence whatever if the principal question should be answered in the negative. Of course, that question cannot be considered alone. The union of two Churches, even so similar in many respects as the Bible Christians and the Primitive Methodists, necessarily involves certain modifications in the constitutions of the respective Churches; unless one simply swallows the other, and that is not contemplated in this case. Before a Quarterly Meeting, therefore, can be expected to decide the main issue it must know something of the new constitution to be adopted in case of union.

In addition to the main issue of union or no union, the proposed constitution which has been drafted by the united Committee of the two churches is to be submitted for consideration. The nature of that constitution will, no doubt, determine the votes of the great bulk of our people. If they are satisfied with it they will vote for union, if not, they will vote against it. But they are not shut up to the alternative of accepting the constitution or rejecting the union. If they are in favour of union, but not satisfied with the proposed constitution, they can vote for union, and suggest the modification of the Constitution. These are the three points to be submitted to the Quarterly Meetings: Are you in favour of union? If in favour of union, do you approve of the suggested Constitution? If in favour of union, but not of the proposed Constitution, what alterations or amendments do you suggest?

The issue to be placed before the Connexion is one of immense importance. Nothing quite so vital has ever been submitted to the Quarterly Meetings. Changes, such as the breaking down of District barriers in the matter of invitations, or the division of the larger Districts, stirred our people profoundly no doubt; but they were mere matters of internal arrangement of little consequence to the general religious public. But the question presently to be submitted to our people for decision is one which must affect deeply the general progress of the Kingdom of Christ. The other Churches, and especially the other Methodist Churches, of the land are watching this movement towards union with the deepest interest. It is an essay towards a much larger movement, and on its success or failure will depend, in all probability for many years to come, the question of Methodist union in this country. I do not say that if this attempt should prove successful it will bring union with the Wesleyans within measurable distance. They will have to travel far, or we shall, before that consummation can be said to be within the range of practical ecclesiastical politics; but success would bring us vastly nearer the union of the minor Methodist bodies: whereas failure would relegate any such union to a very vague and indefinite future.

Is the latter alternative desirable? That is the question. We all have our denominational attachments, and personally I would rather see them strengthened than loosened, believing that indifference in regard to such matters is not favourable to the real welfare of the Church of Christ; but it is possible to make these attachments so rigid as to blind ourselves to the best interests of our own Church, as well as to the welfare and advancement of the Kingdom of God. The question of the union of the Free Churches of this country in any organic form is not a practical question in our day. What it may be a hundred years hence no man can predict. It is doubtful whether, after all, any such union would be possible at any time short of the Millennium, and whether if possible, it would be for the best interests of the Church of Christ. If these denominational differences have their origin in certain essential diversities of taste and idiosyncrasy, then they may be Providential, and destined to continue to the end of time.

But with the Methodist Churches it is different. Our differences are not doctrinal at all, but have to do with mere matters of Church polity and organisation. And apart from the Wesleyans, these differences are not vital. No doubt each of the Methodist bodies had a Providential origin, and each has fulfilled a distinct function in the religious life of the country. But it is open to question whether their work could not now be carried on, so far, especially, as the minor sections of Methodism are concerned, more efficiently as a united Church than in their present form. Churches, like nations, fulfil their original mission sometimes, and it becomes expedient that they should merge themselves in other organisations. In this way they attain a fuller, richer life, and more efficiently serve the cause of truth and righteousness.

The causes which brought about the formation of two of the minor Methodist bodies are now remote, and the reason for their separate existence becomes less evident every year. Why should they not unite and form one strong Church? So far as our origin is concerned we stand somewhat apart; we did not originate in an ecclesiastical division, but in a spiritual revival of such a form that the old bottles could not accommodate themselves to the new wine of our life and activities. But we no longer stand alone in our special forms of religious activity; in the matter of out-door services we have converted the whole of the churches of the country, more or less, to our methods, and the Salvation Army has even distanced us in their zeal in this particular form of evangelism. No doubt, we, like the other minor Methodist bodies, have developed a certain individuality, and accumulated certain traditions, which are not without importance and value; but do they outweigh the advantages which would result to the Church of Christ from union? If Methodist Churches in other parts of the world have been able to find a basis of union, even where their differences were greater than those among the minor Methodist bodies here, and with the most satisfactory results, why should it not be possible with us?

It is not, of course, a question of union among the minor Methodist bodies just now, but of union with the Bible Christians. What effect on the larger question would this union have? Would it not bring it nearer, and tend to remove many of the difficulties which at present stand in the way?

Not only would it be a great object lesson for the Methodist Churches, it would remove many of the difficulties which stand in the way of the larger union. Take the question, for example, of the proposed Constitution. It is not pretended that this Constitution is perfect, or anything like it; such a Constitution has not yet been devised, and never will. But it is certainly much more democratic than our own, and, so far, approaches more nearly the ideal. Then it is of the nature of compromise. It is a balancing between extremes, and seeks to blend in one all the excellences of the various sections of Methodism. In the matter of lay representation, to touch for a moment a thorny question, we stand at present somewhat apart from the other Methodist Churches, if not from all the Churches of the land. Can we expect the other Methodist Churches to accept our position of two laymen to one minister in the higher courts? It may be that some of them have within late years come nearer to our position, but can we expect them to adopt our principle without modification? Scarcely. If ever there is to be union there will have to be compromise on this question. Then would not the new Constitution be likely to furnish a convenient bridge over which the ecclesiastical hosts could meet in a common union?

As to the Constitution itself. Our own is by no means perfect. Anyone who has thought about it at all must be aware that it has some curious anomalies. We are democratic at the top, but at the bottom we are nothing of the kind. What representation have the people in our official Courts? In theory, the class-leaders represent their classes in the leaders' meeting, but in practice they generally represent themselves, and very rarely indeed consult their members about anything that has to come before the Leaders' Meeting or the Quarterly Meeting. Ministers may be dismissed, or invited, without the great bulk of the members knowing of it till it is a fact accomplished. But let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that the leaders do represent the members, and do their best to carry out the wishes of their constituents, we have not exhausted the anomalies of the Constitution. Whom do the local preachers represent? They do not pretend to represent anybody but themselves, and they are often in a position to vote down the opinions and wishes of the members, supposing these to be represented by the class-leaders.

Now the democratic principle is carried to an extreme in one of the Methodist bodies. Their system of Church government, in fact, is that of Methodist Congregationalism. This is an extreme in another direction. The proposed Constitution does not err on that side. Rather it seeks, as has already been pointed out, to blend and harmonise the best elements in the Constitutions of all the Methodist Churches. As such it would be certain to constitute the basis of any future union, and so be a powerful influence in that direction. The united wisdom of our Circuit Quarterly Meetings is, of course, to be brought to bear upon this proposed Constitution, and it may reasonably be expected that it will issue from the ordeal a good deal more perfect than it is at present. In actual working its defects will be further discovered and amended, so that by the time the union of the minor Methodist bodies becomes a question of practical ecclesiastical politics, we shall have the best polity in Methodism to put forward as a basis of union.

The question all our people should consider in regard to this proposed union between ourselves and the Bible Christians is this: Is it right? Will it make for the best interests of the Kingdom of Christ? Shall we be stronger or weaker for the great work of spreading the Gospel of Christ by coming together as one united religious community? Sentiment will no doubt play its part, and ought to play its part in the settlement of this question. If, for example, union involves dropping the name Primitive Methodist, while we may not think it the best name that could have been chosen by our founders, any more than that of Bible Christians, still it will cost us a pang to surrender it for another, even though the new name be better in itself. But ought such sentimental considerations, while allowed due force, to outweigh the graver considerations advanced above? Let us all seek to approach the settlement of this question so far as possible in an impartial spirit. It is a grave question, involving serious issues for the two Churches concerned, and for the Church of Christ at large. Every Quarterly Meeting should consider it as seriously as though the decision arrived at would settle the whole question; the responsibility is not to be shirked or evaded. Each must decide the question for himself to the best of his judgment, and then resolve to abide by the decision of the Connexion as a whole. Full notice is to be given as to when the question is to come up for consideration, and complete information forwarded to each Quarterly Meeting. May the Great Head of the Church guide us to a wise conclusion!

JOSEPH RITSON,

Connexional Biography.

REV. WILLIAM COOPER.

ON the 21st of July, 1898, William Cooper exchanged the life of earth for the life of heaven in his eighty-sixth year. Only the day before he went to Burnham, along with his daughter Elizabeth, who hoped that the bracing air of the seaside would be beneficial to his health, so that the end came suddenly, but without doubt this meant "sudden glory."

This venerable servant of God was born at Thornsett, in Derbyshire, on the 20th of January, 1813. The influence of pious parents, together with the preaching of Revs. James Garner and Thomas Holaday, led to his conversion at the age of thirteen. To Mr. Garner the credit is given for leading him into our ministry. He travelled upon the following stations:—Chester, Blackburn, Driffield, Grimsby, Swinefleet, Easingwold, Brighton (twice), Maidstone (twice), Hammersmith, Bedford, Buckden (Hunts), Deal and Dover, Chatham, Bromyard, Glastonbury, South-Molton, Hertford and Kingston-on-Thames. Some of these spheres were very extensive, and Brother Cooper had the usual experiences of our honoured pioneers.

His marriage to Miss Mary Clarkson, of Bishop Wilton (Yorks), on the 18th of September, 1840, was a very happy one. For nearly fifty-three years these two were permitted to walk the path of life together, when she who had been a good Christian wife and mother was taken from his side. Ten children were born to them, but only four now are living.

Whilst superintending the Glastonbury Station (1868-72), Mr. Cooper had a paralytic seizure which in a measure disabled him and led to his retirement at the Leicester Conference in 1875, at the age of sixty-two, after having served the Connexion for forty years.

He settled in Glastonbury, where as long as he was able he rendered valuable service to the Church of his choice. The death of his wife was followed by a very sad and serious decline of both physical and mental power; this condition continued for years, and to the end of his days. Our friend was a faithful, earnest minister; as a family visitor he had few equals; was liberal in his support of circuit and other funds, and was always eager to promote the general prosperity of his stations. He gave considerable attention to the building of chapels, schoolrooms, and ministers' houses, and also to the reduction of Trust debts. What he undertook he did thoroughly, and his faith in God was very strong. The following testimonials will serve to emphasise and establish what has already been said:—

Rev. Joseph Peck (a colleague) says, "He was a good, earnest, conscientious, plodding man, and as such I have always cherished for him the highest esteem."

Mr. John Wilson (lay missionary), speaks of him as being "sympathetically in touch with the Lord's poor, who heard him gladly."

Rev. S. J. Southwood (who laboured on some adjoining stations), writes, "Mr. Cooper was one of the now almost extinct class of men who helped to make our Church what it is."

Rev. G. Doe (a colleague of forty years ago) says, "I always esteemed him as a man of high character and sterling worth . . . , he ever sought to serve the Connexion; and extend the interests of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ. He succeeded in this beyond some who were more intellectually gifted."

On the evening of Sunday the 24th, a memorial sermon was preached in our Glastonbury church; then on the following day a short service was held in the same building, after which six local preachers carried his body to the local cemetery. The writer officiated on each occasion.

ALFRED WARCUP.

MR. JAMES JOHNSTON.

EXAMPLE operates more powerfully than precept; and practical illustrations of moral excellence act more forcibly than abstract representations, hence the advantages of biographical sketches. The Christian Church has already become wealthy in valuable biographies, of which Primitive Methodists have furnished their full share; but these treasures are constantly accumulating, as those are called away whose lives have exemplified the principles of Christianity and adorned the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

The deceased whose name is placed at the head of this sketch lived a beautifully consistent life, and commended religion to all who knew him, not only by impressive oral utterance, but by the stronger logic of an exemplary life. He was born at Ouckbourne, near Stirling, Scotland, November 23, 1829. He was converted about 1853 or 54. In the year 1858 his name was placed on the Primitive Methodist plan as a local preacher. Over the whole circuit he was respected in a marked degree, and as a local preacher was always welcome in the pulpits. He was a man of broad sympathies; he was more than a society man, he was essentially a circuit man, and also took great interest in all that pertained to the Connexion as a whole. Our departed friend was not only honoured, and deservedly, by the world, but also by the Connexion, for he was several times elected a delegate to District Meetings and Conference.

The Northumberland Park Society of the Tottenham Circuit was where his great work was done, and where his usefulness was most apparent. He was conscientious and diligent in the discharge of all his duties. He wisely apportioned his time to the various claims made upon it so that all might have attention. He was always courteous and gentle in his intercourse with the people. He possessed in a good degree that charity which doth not behave itself unseemly. His prudence in business matters, and his deep interest in the welfare of the people, made him a valuable friend to those who were in trouble. His moral character was never tarnished, but was above suspicion; slander was never heard concerning him. His deportment commanded universal admiration, and commended Christianity to every observer. His religion produced a lovely morality, but did not consist exclusively in that which could be seen. It was experimental. The Kingdom of God was within him, and while there was righteousness without, there were peace and joy within. His religion was a life that developed itself in holy deeds. His was not mere official piety. He did not lose his personality in his office. He was ever a sincere servant of God. He walked in the light as God is in the light, had fellowship with Him, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleansed him from sin. His religious life was not fitful and boisterous like a storm-swollen stream, but deep, constant and growing like a river. From the commencement to the close, his character and religious experience never changed but for the better. A more beautiful character was never seen amongst us, and a gentler spirit was probably never embodied in a human form. He was loved by all who knew him.

Among other forms in which his spiritual life manifested itself, the systematic and proportionate giving of his substance for charitable and religious uses had a place. He saved that he might give; he denied himself that he might do good. He was a most persistent worker. Quiet, noiseless, ceaseless work distinguished his whole life. He was always punctual at his class, and was ever ready to sympathise with the afflicted, to encourage the weak, to assist those who were needy; and we are happy to say that in the class meeting God frequently manifested His presence in a very special manner. His experience was of a high spiritual tone, his hope of heaven was bright, and during his leadership the Church enjoyed much of the Spirit of Christ.

In 1874 he was appointed circuit steward, and filled the position in an exemplary manner to the time of his death. He was always diligent in serving the Lord. As a man and a Christian, he was always for peace and quietness in the Church, the family, and the world. He was careful over what he said, never desiring to wound other persons' feelings, preferring to suffer himself. How we shall miss him none of us can tell. He was no narrow, selfish sectarian, but a man of sterling uprightness.

The Rev. Joseph Sheale writes: "It will be twenty-nine years next July since I made the acquaintance of Mr. Johnston, he was then very devoted to God, and diligent and earnest in His service. He was regular at his class meeting, the week-night preaching, prayer meeting, or open-air service. He never seemed absent from the means of grace, and was always anxious and longing for men's salvation. After a lapse of twelve years I returned to the circuit. . . . there was no abatement in his zeal, in his love for Christ, in his desire to save souls, and loyalty to his Church. The fire had increased in force. I left your circuit twelve years ago, but have met Mr. Johnston again and again during that time, but always found his mind in his Master's work. He was a good man, and full of faith and the Holy Ghost. I enjoyed a great blessing when praying with him the last time I saw him, when he could converse, and he expressed himself as very happy in the Lord. He has gone safely home."

The Rev. John Mayles writes: "I have always regarded Mr. Johnston as one of the very best men I have ever known. . . . The memory of his devoted life will, I am sure, be an inspiration for years to come to those who have been associated with him."

The Rev. W. E. Crombie writes: "Permit me to convey to you my strongest assurances of tenderest and truest sympathy in the loss you and your family have sustained, and to express my cordial admiration for the eminently Christian character of the departed one. Such men of purity, fidelity and charity are all too few. . . . He has been a faithful, efficient, generous servant of our Church these many years, and always so transparent, reliable and honourable in every department of Christian work. I shall ever revere his memory, and thank God upon every remembrance of him."

Numerous other letters have come to hand, speaking in the highest terms of his Christian character and usefulness. The March Quarterly Meeting of the Tottenham Circuit passed the following resolution: "That we place on record our deep sense of the great and irreparable loss that, as a station, we have sustained by the death of Brother James Johnston. From the formation of the circuit, extending over a period of thirty years, his brotherly consideration for the welfare of the circuit has always been constant, kindly, and sympathetic. His judicious advice and considerate oversight always won the confidence of those who laboured with him, whilst his unstinted generosity to all the societies in the circuit has in no small measure contributed to the prosperity of the Station."

It is in the storm that the vessel is tried, and in the fierce fight the noblest qualities are developed. Our brother's affliction, though not long, was unusually severe. For over two months he suffered, yet during all this time he calmly stayed himself on God. His patience never yielded to one murmuring breath. A calm fortitude girded his soul in the dark hour of pain. He found continual joy in the love of God, and firm trust in the all-sufficiency of Christ. Whenever I visited him I was always pleased and profited by his rich Christian experience, and his expressions of consolation and peace in Jesus. Often when I left the house I have done so with a heart overflowing with joy, that when so seriously afflicted, and in the immediate prospect of their dissolution, God's people can have such confidence, and even rapture. Too much cannot be said about the patience and fortitude, the love for the Saviour, the hopes of heaven, and the joy and rapture possessed by our brother before his peaceful exit to the Paradise of God.

Many friends visited him for weeks prior to his death, and invariably came from his room the better for going. In the midst of his excruciating pains, as he writhed in physical agony, he was as patient, loving, and trustful as a little child in the hands of a Father whom he would not doubt. The end of his suffering came January 24, 1897, and it was peace. He passed away at the age of sixty-seven, leaving a widow and three children to mourn his loss, but greatly cheered and comforted by the remembrance of his saintly life. Prior to his interment in the Edmonton Cemetery, a service was held in the Northumberland Park Chapel, on Friday, January 29, and was conducted by the writer, assisted by Revs. J. Sheale, M. Simmonds, R. R. Connell, T. Price, T. Saunders and G. P. Maynard. There were also representatives present from the various Committees of London First District, of which he was a member. The funeral was attended by a large number of sympathising friends, and by representatives from each place on the circuit.

A memorial service was conducted in the Northumberland Park Chapel the following Sunday by the writer, and very impressive addresses were given by Revs. J. Sheale and M. Simmonds. He will be greatly missed at Tottenham and throughout the whole of the circuit, but when the day breaks and the shadows flee away, we shall join our dear brother in heaven.

ALFRED SUTCLIFFE.

MRS. PEXTON.

THE death of Mrs. Pexton, of Hull Second Circuit, removed another of the few remaining links which connect the Hull Primitive Methodists of to-day with those of sixty years ago. Being born April 2, 1819, her natural life has covered the whole period of the Connexion's history in the town, with the exception of one year, and she was a little over a year old when the first Conference of the new community was held in her native town. Becoming a member in 1837, or before, her membership has run parallel with the reign of Queen Victoria; and when the nation was full of excitement and enthusiasm in preparing to celebrate the Diamond Jubilee of the Victorian era, and on the bright Sunday morning of May 2, 1897, in the seventy-ninth year of her age, and the sixty-first of her membership, she was called to receive "the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to all them that have loved His appearing."

Mrs. Pexton's maiden name was Ann Maria Lowell. Her father, who was a sailor, died when she was nine years of age, and she was left in the care of a widowed mother. It was a happy circumstance that the mother, being a consistent member of the Methodist New Connexion, trained her family in the fear of God. But at the tender age of twelve Ann Maria Lowell was deprived by death of her pious mother, and left an orphan indeed, at a time of life when a mother's care and counsel are most needed. Again, however, Providence smiled on the bereaved child, and the wind was tempered to the shorn lamb. An elder sister was married, and had a religious home of her own, and here Ann Maria was cared for under the kindness and attention of an affectionate sister. This sister was Mrs. Starkey, our chapel-keeper in Church Street for many years, and who was well known to W. Clowes, J. Bywater, W. Harland, W. Garner, George Lamb and many other old preachers. While her mother lived; and until some time after, Ann Maria, with other members of the family attended the Methodist New Connexion Sunday School, and the seed sown there was not in vain. But the town was all alive by the springing up, and rapid growth, of a new sect of Methodists, sometimes called "Ranters." The new movement had preachers and evangelists of extraordinary power and success. First of all there was William Clowes, whose name was a household word, and who with his praying, no less than his preaching, seemed to shake the town. At his command were such stalwart evangelists as John Garner, Thomas Holliday, and others whose names we have mentioned, and such orators as John Flesher, William Sanderson, whose eloquence of speech would have graced the bar or the senate of any country. The town was the centre of very extensive missions stretching along the sea coast from Spurn Point to Berwick-on-Tweed, and beyond, and running inland to many of the towns and villages in the East and West and the North Ridings of Yorkshire and Durham, Northumberland and Cumberland in the North. Frequently the missionaries, more than forty in number, were coming to the town to tell their wonderful stories of the work of God in their several spheres of labour. The mother church in Mill Street, now West Street, was quite a "converting furnace." Seldom did a Sabbath pass without conversions. Bands of prayer-leaders were sent out in different detachments to hold cottage prayer-meetings and mission services in various parts of the town. Open-air services were held on the dock side, on the wharfs, in the alleys and squares almost every night in the week, summer and winter. The street processioning and the lively singing, and the loud "hallelujah" and "glory" shouts, attracted great numbers of people. The annual camp meeting held for many years on the third Sunday in June, appeared to move all Hull, and the people turned out in thousands and flocked to the "Corporation Field," where three preaching stands were always necessary.

No wonder that the Lowell family, with many others, were attracted to Mill Street. There Ann Maria, when about eighteen years of age, and under pentecostal grace and power, was born anew. The particular circumstances of the change we do not know, but that she experienced a definite conversion and became a partaker of conscious salvation there could be no doubt. Her membership at Mill Street continued until her marriage with Mr. William Pexton in June, 1843. The newly-married couple settled in the neighbourhood of Church Street, and connected themselves with the society which worshipped in our little chapel there. They were members of George Hayton's class, a leader of remarkable power and unction, who died very suddenly in 1851. Mr. Pexton was now appointed leader of the class, and remained so until his death, a period of about twenty-eight years. For family convenience, Mrs. Pexton now joined the class of our highly esteemed friend and brother, Mr. Thomas Bell, most commonly called Tommy Bell, a brother whose praise is in all our churches in the town, and who, for more than forty years, has been the most popular camp meeting preacher in Hull. Our sister remained his member until her death, and had a most ardent attachment to her leader.

Mr. and Mrs. Pexton rendered invaluable service to our thriving cause in Church Street, which several times outgrew the capacity of the chapel, until a more commodious sanctuary was built for it in Lincoln Street. Beside the office of class-leader, Mr. Pexton was society steward, chapel steward, and trustee. Mrs. Pexton had always a prominent position at bazaars and tea meetings, and sometimes when her health and family cares would have formed a valid excuse for staying at home. Their house was open to the preachers, and the writer, with many others, shared in their generous hospitality. Our sister was one of a noble army of women in Hull of whom many preachers might say, "They laboured with me in the Gospel."

Beyond bazaars and tea meetings, and collecting for missions and various efforts for raising funds for the church, and which she continued as long as health permitted, Mrs. Pexton felt her duties to be chiefly at home with her large family, and to assist her husband in business. She was of a shy and retiring disposition, and had not the gifts for public work that some had. Nature had given her a temperament highly strung, and she was sensitive to wrongs and a want of fidelity on the part of professed friends. She was not a Christian who lived in continual ecstasies or exuberant joy. At times, in the latter years of her life, she suffered from nervous irritability and prostration, which was painful to herself and her friends. Yet through all there was an abiding trust in God and confidence in Christ and His salvation which never failed.

On the death of her husband, eighteen years ago, she broke up her home and has since resided with various members of her family, and for the last few years principally with her eldest son, Mr. W. L. Pexton. For years it was evident that her health was gradually declining. Often from several infirmities she had much suffering, and her patience and resignation were severely tested. Yet she clung to the assurance granted to Paul, "My grace is sufficient for thee: for My strength is made perfect in weakness." The inimitable hymn of Charles Wesley, which has comforted many thousands in similar circumstances, was often on her lips:

"Jesu, Lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly."

For several weeks it was only at intervals that she was conscious. She was visited by the Revs. A. Beavan and G. Welbourne, by her leader, Mr. T. Bell, and Mr. A. Walker, by her sister-in-law, Mrs. R. Milson. Though not able to talk much with them, yet when they sang or prayed she heartily responded, and it was evident that God was sustaining her with His gracious presence, now that the shades of life's closing day were gathering around her; an old hymn that had been a favourite in her younger years came to her memory with wonderful freshness, and she repeated some of its verses with remarkable accuracy over and over again:

"Earth with its vanities no more,
Shall pain my weary eyes;
I leave my prison for my home,
A mansion in the skies.
Though death extends his icy hand
No terror doth he bring,
O grave, where is thy victory?
O death, where is thy sting?"

At last the weary wheels of life stood still, and Mrs. Pexton fell peacefully to sleep.

In harmony with her oft-repeated wish, her leader Brother T. Bell officiated at the funeral service, which was attended by a large number of relatives and friends.

Our departed sister looked "well to the ways of her household," and now "her children rise up and call her blessed." She leaves behind her a considerable number who are either members or supporters of the Church she loved so well and so long. Her eldest son, William L. Pexton, is circuit steward and class-leader in Hull Third Circuit, and from his youth has been serving the cause of Christ with steady zeal and fidelity. It was a great joy to his mother when he was elected as a delegate to the Conference. Other sons, and also the daughters, are among our attendants and friends, and quite a host of grandchildren are with us as hearers, teachers, or scholars. So of this family it can be said, what we wish we could say of a greater number: "Instead of the fathers are the children." Our prayer is that we may meet them all

"Where the living live for ever,
And the dead have joined the band
In that fair and blessed land."

JOSEPH WOOD.

MR. JOHN BROWN.

A GLOOM has been cast over the Shrewsbury District by the unexpected death of the late Mr. John Brown, of Fairfield House, Shrewsbury, coal merchant and contractor, which took place at the hospitable residence of his host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. John Brown, of Alderley Lane Farm, Wem. Mr. Brown represented the Sunday School Union Committee at the Shrewsbury District Meeting held at Wem. He gave the first open-air address, and presided at the Sunday School Meeting in connection with the public services of the District Assembly, and his fervent utterances will be long remembered. While assisting at the Sunday afternoon camp meeting, he received a chill, which rapidly developed into bronchitis and pneumonia. On the following Tuesday morning Mr. Brown was so unwell that he could not leave his bedroom. Medical aid was summoned, and early on the morning of May 13, he quietly passed away. During his moments of consciousness, and as he entered the valley of the shadow, his last utterances were on behalf of the Church which he dearly loved, and for whose prosperity he had lived, contributed and worked.

Mr. Brown was a native of Croydon. While resident near Abergavenny, he gave himself to Christ in a service conducted by Mrs. Harrison, wife of the Rev. John Harrison (1). For some twenty years deceased lived in the locality of Shrewsbury, where he was eminently successful as a business man. Although not possessing a robust constitution, and being greatly absorbed in business, he scarcely ever missed the week-day services of the House of God. He was largely engaged in Christian service. At the time of his death he held important circuit and District positions. He was steward of the Shrewsbury Circuit, chapel treasurer, class-leader, and superintendent of the Ford's Heath Sabbath School. For many years deceased had been an acceptable lay preacher. He was in great demand by the village churches of the Shrewsbury and neighbouring circuits for special services, Harvest Festivals, and Chapel and Sunday School Anniversaries. He was vice-president of the Shrewsbury District Local Preachers' Association, and an active honorary member of the Tunstall, West Midland and Shrewsbury Districts'

Theological and Literary Association. He will be greatly missed, and his place will be difficult to fill.

The funeral took place in the Shrewsbury Cemetery on Saturday, May 15, and was largely attended. There were representatives from the churches in the Shrewsbury, Minsterley, Wem, and neighbouring circuits. The tenantry of the deceased, and the business firms of Shrewsbury, were also represented. The officiating ministers were the Revs. G. T. D. Pidsley, J. Taws, James Davies, Albert A. Birchenough, and J. Martin (U.M.F.C.), along with Mr. Joseph Higgins (Vice-chairman of District Meeting). The service throughout was deeply impressive, and two of the deceased's favourite hymns were feelingly sung.

On Sunday, May 23, an "In Memoriam" service was held at Ford's Heath Primitive Methodist Church, conducted by the Rev. G. T. D. Pidsley, who was assisted by Messrs. E. Gwilliam and J. Price.

Deceased was forty-nine years of age. He had been twice married, and leaves a widow and eight children to mourn his irreparable loss. Many letters of sympathy have been forwarded to the bereaved family, and much Christian sympathy was manifested. "In the midst of life we are in death."

Literary Notices.

The Expositor. Edited by the REV. W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D. Fifth Series, Vol. IX. (7s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row.

THE Expositor pursues the even tenor of its way; and as time goes on, becomes increasingly helpful, and one might say indispensable. The present volume, perhaps, contains a larger percentage than usual of articles of a scholarly type that the average English student will find a little beyond him; but there is no lack of articles of more general-interest. Amongst these may specially be named a remarkable paper by the late Professor Henry Drummond, on "The Problem of Foreign Missions." The mention of Drummond reminds us that in this volume, the Rev. Angus Mackay, in his "The Late Professor Drummond and His Critics," takes up cudgels in defence of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," as against those who, like Drummond's own biographer, assert that his main argument involves a huge petitio principii. Mr. Mackay also holds that "the service which Professor Drummond rendered the Christian Church when he gave its proper prominence to the vicarious principle in nature, to the 'struggle for the life of others,' can hardly be over-rated; he wove, as it were, a silver strand into the dark web of fate; he helped us to see in the blackest shadow a proof that somewhere the light is shining." There are many other articles in this volume of the Expositor meriting remark did space permit, but it would be unpardonable were we not to express the interest with which we have read Mr. Canton's articles on "The Nativity," and "The Star of the Magi." These show how much that is fresh and beautiful a devout and imaginative mind can find in the stories of the Old Book. Professor Findlay, in his "St. John's Creed," has given a fine exposition of I John v. 18-21.

The Book of Job. With Introduction and Notes by EDGAR C. S. GIBSON, D.D. (6s.) Methuen and Co., 36, Essex Street, W.C.

THIS is the first of the "Oxford Commentaries" to be issued under the direction of Walter Lock, D.D., Ireland Professor of Exegesis and Warden of Keble College. What is aimed at in the Series thus projected, is to furnish commentaries which shall be mainly exegetical in character. They are to be less elementary than the Cambridge Bible for Schools; less critical than the International Critical Commentary; and less didactic than the Expositor's Bible. Taking the text of the R.V. as their basis, "they will aim at combining a hearty acceptance of critical principles with loyalty to the Catholic faith." With the Vicar of Leeds' "Book of Job," the series makes a good start. We have, first of all, a very helpful "Introduction," from which we gather that Dr. Gibson holds Job to have been a real historic personage who lived in patriarchal times; but that the book bearing his name was composed during the later period of the monarchy, or the Captivity, when the old theory of retribution was felt to be breaking down. The speech of Elihu (xxxii.-xxxvii.) is regarded as a later addition by another hand, introducing a new element in the solution of the problem, viz., that suffering is designed for moral discipline and improvement. We have a good note on "Daysman" (ix. 33), and with regard to the famous passage, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," etc., the conclusion reached is that "the passage as a whole affords distinct evidence that Job has fought his way to a new belief, and has reached the conviction that after death he shall be granted a vision of God." As against Cheyne, who sees in Behemoth and Leviathan "mythic monsters," Dr. Gibson maintains that they are poetic descriptions of the Egyptian hippopotamus.

mus and crocodile. We know of no better book on Job to put into the hands of thoughtful laymen or hard-working ministers, who have little time for erudite inquiries and want something reliable and accessible.

John Howard. A Lecture. By REV. H. H. SCULLARD, M.A. (2s.) The Bedford Publishing Co., Mill Street.

SOME half-dozen biographies of Howard have been written, excluding his own letters. In spite of this fact, Rev. H. H. Scullard's book will find its own niche, and prove an addition to the Howard literature. The author speaks somewhat too modestly of his own performance. "It is not a Life of Howard, nor even a monograph, but only a Lecture," he says. Whatever the author may care to call it, it is a fine appreciation of the man, clear and concise, and evidently written out of fulness of knowledge. Unnecessary details are left out, but we have a distinct portrait of "one of the humblest, greatest men that ever trod God's earth."

John Howard was a Free Churchman, and it was chiefly through his generosity that the Congregational Church over which Rev. H. H. Scullard is now pastor was built. The writer gives an account of an interview between Wesley and Howard, both then old men. They had a hearty appreciation of each other's work, but were men of widely different temperament. "Howard had much in common, in faith, in character, and in gifts with Wesley, but a Methodist he was not, and probably never could have been. Notwithstanding his respect for Wesley he would have shrunk from allying himself with a denomination which had even the appearance of exalting the work of any man. He was almost a Quaker in his aversion to the introduction of anything like personalities into the region of spiritual life. To him God was everything, the human instrument nothing." Like all great men who have achieved anything, Howard was a man of one idea; his aim was to lessen the sum of human misery, and no personal gratification, however ennobling or worthy it may have been in itself, was allowed to come between him and what he considered his duty. Howard was a type of the true ascetic, or pilgrim. Once, when in Italy, he attended a concert, but "finding his thoughts too much occupied by the melody, he could never be persuaded to repeat the indulgence. He seems to have feared lest the sweet strains of music might drown the bitter cry of the prisoners that was constantly sounding in his ears." "Poets and prose writers have vied with one another in extolling the beneficent influence of his life," but no finer appreciation of the man can be found anywhere than on the simple block of marble over his grave in Russia.

JOHN HOWARD.

"Whoever thou art, thou standest at the tomb of thy friend."

A word of praise must be written of the printing and illustrations of this book. The paper is good, and the printing all that could be desired, and some of the fine illustrations given can only have been procured at a considerable amount of trouble and expense.

Faith; A Story of St. Porth. By J. HENRY HARRIS. (3s. 6d.) Truro: Joseph Pollard. London: Service and Paton, 5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

WE have here a simple, natural and well-written story, such as it is not often our good fortune to meet with. It is replete with delicate word-pictures, and happy phrases and turns of expression which cling to the memory long after the book has been closed. In addition to being a charming story that furnishes us with several interesting character-studies, there is a fund of information upon old Cornish folk-lore and traditions. Mr. Harris has made a special study of the history and traditions of Cornwall, and the pages which deal with that part bear the impress of personal knowledge, and are much more convincing than those which depict life in London. The scene of the story is laid at St. Porth. "Walking on a summer's day from St. Porth towards the market-town you may catch sight of the beautiful bay of which the people have always been proud as an unmarketable possession. A narrow lane, deeply shaded by tall hedgerows and scented with dog-roses, leads you to a small farmhouse which has been allowed to go into decay. . . It is the mouldering farmhouse, with its windows thick-filmed with dust, which haunts one. Why has it gone into mourning thus when its tenants have departed? When you inquire you find that Reuben Penhal and Emblem, his wife, and Faith, their daughter by adoption, lived there; that there was a son called Benjamin, who grew up with fair promise, and put forth leaves, but belied the fond hopes of abundant fruit. Then you may sit on a stile and listen to an old man in corduroys, who 'minded them well,' and hear, with long pauses and many harkings back, a domestic epic of vanished lives, human in every line." With the fortunes of these Penhals, "who were the aristocracy of the little," and their adopted daughter Faith, with her clear, hazel eyes, "only souls still in swaddling clothes could look upon the world out of such eyes," this story deals. The characters in this book impress one as portraits of real men and women who have lived and suffered and rejoiced rather than as fictitious characters.

The Humbling of Mark Lester. By BESSIE MARCHANT, (Mrs. J. A. Comfort). Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., London.

WE have derived great pleasure from reading another story from the able pen of Mrs. Comfort. This latest one quite upholds the writer's reputation as a story-teller. Our sympathies are very much with the brisk alert heroine who has to wade through such a sea of troubles before finally arriving at the harbour of complete happiness.

Alice Desart, the heroine, is companion to an old lady, and though the situation is full of drudgery, she cheerfully accepts it for the shelter that the quiet, peaceful home affords. Hers has not been either a peaceful or a happy past, and once more she receives a rude shock when on her way to the village she recognises her husband, from whom she has been separated since six months after their marriage, in a tramp who has been knocked down and severely injured by a village cyclist. All the old bitter past is raked up, and becomes a nine days' wonder; for the man dies and she identifies him as her husband. Some time afterwards, she marries Mark Lester, who is described as a man "who had a way of metaphorically putting himself into other people's shoes, and finding out where they pinched the hardest."

The story does not end here with the assumption "that they lived happily ever afterwards;" in fact, it only begins, for in the one great test case, Mark Lester's pride proved stronger than his charity. Though somewhat tragic in theme, there is nothing morbid about the story. It is brightly written.

Whispers from the Unseen. By the REV. E. W. SHEPHEARD-WALWYN (Great Malvern). Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

"THESE Whispers have been drawn from the Friend of Ages, in strong and continual concentration of Prayer. They are written especially for those who may have experienced the unutterable yearnings of the upward-bound soul, and whose life is one Long Cry for more intenser contact with their Adorable Redeemer, the Everlasting Jesus." These words are from the preface to this little book, and are set out on the page with typographic art, and adorned with abundant ornamental capitals, the last two sacred words being printed in red. All this raised misgivings whether we had not to do with a book that would prove more curious than profitable. Happily our misgivings were uncalled for. The author has something to say. He has heard "whispers from the unseen." He may be what the world calls a Mystic, but he does not get away from the great verities of religion, or the practical requirements of life. Let us give one specimen of the detached thoughts which comprise the staple of the book. The one given is selected rather because of its shortness than because it is the most striking.

XXI. THE SOUL'S SEVERE ISOLATION.

"Even when our truest and best friend is earnestly trying to bring his soul near to ours, and convey to us spiritual consolation or hope, have we not often felt the utter separateness of our inner being from that of any other person? There is a hard and distinct line, beyond which no human sympathy can go. Has not this flashed upon us at times?—'He means to help me, but he cannot touch the inner wound of my spirit.' Every awakened soul knows the absolute necessity for direct personal dealings between his soul and his God in prayer. He must have such dealings. To forego them means eternal death."

Ten to One; and Other Papers. By the REV. J. A. CLAPPERTON, M.A. (1s. 6d.) "Helps Heavenward" Series. C. H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

It was Richard Baxter who wrote of taking "Ten looks at Christ for one at self." This saying Mr. Clapperton makes the occasion of a short practical talk. The same method is pursued throughout this little book. Some fine saying of heroic and saintly man or woman is made the text of a brief paper, rendered more interesting by the biographical references that are given. The result is we have a book very much to our mind, as it makes an incursion into a profitable field of Christian literature too much neglected. Mr. Clapperton has chosen a very apt motto for the title page of his book—"For the love I bear to the champions of Christ, I am ambitious to celebrate their valiant achievements." Since these words were written by Orderic the monk, (circa 1140), how many saints God has given the world! It is right that we should treasure their deep sayings, and seek to follow them even as they followed Christ.

After Death. By F. W. PITT. (9d.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row.

IN the course of fifty-eight pages the author states the three theories as to the future of those who die impenitent; two of these—Final Restoration and the Annihilation theory—are vigorously criticised, while the third, which we may call the orthodox view, is expounded and defended against objections. The remaining two-and-twenty pages consist of Notes on passages of Scripture supposed to support either Restoration or Annihilationism. Mr. Pitt's explanation of 1 Peter iii. 19 is that it means, (1) Christ died in the flesh. (2) He arose in the Spirit. (3) It was in the Spirit that He preached, through Noah, to those who are now "spirits in prison." Some of Mr. Pitt's arguments will be challenged. For example, he makes great argumentative use of the substitutionary character of Christ's sufferings in his strictures on the Restoration and Annihilation theories. But we suspect that many who hold by these—the former of these especially—have let go the belief in the penal character of Christ's sufferings. They would deny his premise, or so greatly modify it as to invalidate his conclusion. Mr. Pitt's brochure may be recommended as brief, clear and vigorous, and likely to be of special use to those who think that the "orthodox" view has nothing to say for itself.

Christ Bearing Us Company. By F. J. WILLIAMS. (2s. 6d.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS pretty little devotional book deals with the nearness and helpfulness of the Divine presence. "Lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." "Christ bearing us Company," a book that can bring home to us that precious truth, as this one does, is never superfluous. Each chapter is enriched with gems of poetry, some from the writings of our well-known poets, some by the author himself; while many instructive and interesting incidents and illustrations are given, showing from personal experience the blessedness resulting from "Christ bearing us company." It is a book likely to prove helpful to young Christians, and its sweet and simple faith may stimulate wavering and half-hearted Christians. In the appendix is printed an appreciation of the life and works of the late John Pulsford, who during his life strove to live very near to Christ.

Letters of Samuel Rutherford. Selected from the Edition edited by the Rev. Andrew A. Bonar, D.D. (1s.) Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, Edinburgh and London.

As the title intimates, this is not a complete collection of Rutherford's letters; but it is probable the selection here made and arranged in chronological order will amply suffice to enable the reader to taste Rutherford's quality. Yet more, this little book will prove very helpful to the devout life. A biographical sketch of Rutherford is prefixed, together with a view of the old church of Anwoth; each letter is introduced by a word or two indicating what are its main topics, and obsolete or uncommon words are explained in foot-notes. We are glad to notice that this neat and well-printed book is one of a series in which such religious classics as Bunyan's "Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners," and Thomas Boston's "The Crook in the Lot," have a place.

The Official Handbook of the Presbyterian Church of England, 1899-1900. (6d.) 14, Paternoster Square.

CONTAINS a mass of information respecting the above-named Church. We have the doctrine, worship and government of the Church briefly set forth; a record of the chief denominational events of the past year; the constitution and work of the Committees of Synod; the senatus of the New Theological College at Cambridge, the course of study pursued, scholarships open, etc.; very complete information relating to the various Presbyteries; alphabetical list of ministers, etc., etc. We learn that the Presbyterian Church of England has 315 congregations, and 12 preaching stations, with 73,249 members. The average annual congregational contribution is £688. The Juvenile Missionary Association raised during the year, £2,167 for Foreign Missions, and the Formosa field has been allocated to the Children of the Church. The Monthly Messenger has a circulation of 26,000, which does not cover the cost of production, and the Synod has authorised a grant of £100 towards the cost.

Light and Darkness; or, All One in Christ. By SPES. (1s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS is the picture of the conflict between the man and the lion, painted by the man, in which, of course, the man gets the victory. In other words, we have here, in the form of a story, a tractate on the Crisis in the Church from the Kensit point of view. The Church of St. Agatha has the same history as many other churches. The old evangelical clergyman was called to his rest, and in his place was appointed a young and vigorous man, full of new ideas, who gradually changed the old simple service; one by one fresh innovations crept into the form of service, until at last the congregation discovered that there was absolutely no difference between their service and that of the Romish Church. Tom Winton, the hero of the book, returns home after a long absence abroad, and these changes are sprung upon him all at once. He protested during the service, in the following words: "I, Thomas Winton, a baptised, confirmed and communicant member of the Protestant Reformed Church of England, do enter my solemn protest before Almighty God against the idolatrous practices I have witnessed this morning." From this point onward his career and aims are identical with those of Kensit.

In this connection may be mentioned two tractates we have received, both of which may be recommended as worthy of being read at this juncture:

The Foundations of Ritualism Exploded by a Clerical Engineer. (4d.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row.

The Mechanical versus the Spiritual: Two contrasted conceptions of the Christian Religion. A Word for the Times. By W. HAY M. H. AITKEN. (1d.) John F. Shaw and Co., 48, Paternoster Row, E.C.

The Connexional Outlook.

By PROXY.

THE PRESIDENT'S HEALTH.

—It is gratifying to learn week by week that the President is making steady progress towards the recovery of his health. By this time most people know that the breakdown has been of the most serious kind, and might have had the very worst consequences. The greatest care has been necessary to avoid a complete collapse, and it is to be feared that his work during the whole of his Presidential year will be interfered with more or less. The churches that have been anticipating the pleasure of hearing his voice in the pulpit and on the platform, must for some time longer possess their souls in patience, and cherish a feeling of thankfulness that in the order of Divine Providence, a valuable life has been spared to the Connexion. Meanwhile, the expressions of sympathy coming from all over the country must have been very grateful and cheering, both to the invalid and to his good lady whose ministrations in the sick chamber have had so much to do with the happy results that have been realised. The journey from Kettering to Scarborough was a serious undertaking, but en route, at Nottingham, Sheffield, and on reaching Scarborough, the meeting of the train by friends must have been very cheering.

RETURNED MISSIONARIES.

—The Rev. R. and Mrs. Fairley have arrived home from Fernando Po, and by the time the October Magazines are in the hands of their readers, Mr. Fairley will probably be settled in some station for the year. He will hardly be able for some months to do the work of a regular circuit minister. He must have a strong constitution, but the climate of West Africa is trying to the strongest, and time will be needed to enable him to recuperate. Until Conference he will be supplied with a helper. On the whole, it might have been better to have left him unstationed till next Conference, allowing him till the end of the year for complete rest, and leaving him open during the rest of the time to be employed as a missionary deputation.* Mr. Fairley's experience of missionary work is now very extensive, and it may be assumed that he knows Fernando Po, the character of the people, the difficulties of the work, and the measure of success that has been secured there by these thirty years of missionary enterprise as well, and possibly better, than any one in the ranks of our ministry. At missionary meetings he will have an entertaining and inspiring story to tell.

—One unusually pleasing testimony of the effect produced upon the native mind and character by the work of the missionaries has been given to the General Committee by Mr. Fairley. He has brought with him a gift of £73 10s. od. from the native churches of Fernando Po, to be divided as follows: fifty guineas for the Missionary breakfast in May, 1900; fifteen guineas for the Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund; two guineas for the White-chapel Mission; two guineas for the Southwark Mission; one guinea for the Orphanage. The members of our churches in Fernando Po, with a few exceptions, are poor; in comparison with our members in England, extremely so. They have always supported the cause liberally through the regular methods, as is evident from the large amounts they have raised for chapel building, at their annual missionary meetings, and for ordinary Church purposes. Mrs. Fairley's class at Santa Isabel last quarter sent £5 to the Quarterly Meeting of the station. To add to all this, as a thank-offering, and an expression of their appreciation of what has been done for them by our Missionary Society, the handsome gift of seventy guineas speaks volumes for their Christian liberality and devotion. The gifts themselves, especially that to the Breakfast, are substantial, but their chief value unquestionably lies in the Christian feeling that prompted them.

"THE PLAGUE SPOT OF THE METROPOLIS."

Under the above striking headline, the London Morning Leader calls attention to the work of the Rev. James Flanagan and his helpers, and the character of the Southwark people. In an interview between a representative of the Leader and Mr. Flanagan, the latter gave a few figures which were duly published in the newspaper. Bethnal Green is considered a part of London sufficiently wretched. It has a population bordering on 370,000, of whom 44 per cent. are in extreme poverty. But in Southwark and Bermondsey 64 per cent. are in extreme poverty; in Southwark alone the figure is 68 per cent., and in St. George's parish, the scene of Mr. Flanagan's labours, 80 out of every 100 persons are in extreme poverty. These 80 do not know in the morning where their dinner is to come from, they have no regular means of subsistence. The wretchedly poor are there. The criminal classes of all kinds are there in vast numbers. And if by any means a considerable portion of these can be inspired with the desire to live honestly and respectably, a great work will have been done for the metropolis, and for the nation, to whose safety such masses of degraded people are a standing menace. It is gratifying to know that Mr. Flanagan's work is being recognised by the independent daily press, and by philanthropic people outside the denomination. If a little more help could be afforded to the building fund, Mr. Flanagan would be able to devote himself again to his regular work. For some time past he has been mainly engaged in raising money for his new hall and schools. The undertaking has been very expensive, but he has received very generous help from many, and if those who have not yet considered the need of the case would do so quickly, the burden would be lightened.

EXPENSIVE CHAPELS.

—Last month attention was called to new chapels at Leicester and other places of a very costly character. Within the last few days the foundation-stone of a new church and schools, which will cost not less than £8,000, was laid in Harrogate. In these magnificent structures we have the evidence of the increased wealth and culture of the members of our Church. It is reasonable, also, to assume that they are the evidence of a deeper devotion to the cause of Jesus Christ. The step taken by the Harrogate friends is bold, but it is also in every respect commendable. In chapel building, as in all other matters, fitness is a thing of primary importance, and a beautiful church is certainly needed in a town recognised as one of the most fashionable health resorts in the country.

VILLAGE CAUSES.

—In large centres of population it often happens that the chief difficulty in the prosecution of the work of God is the lack of money. Sites are expensive, and, with beautiful and inviting places of worship all round, cheap erections mean failure. The societies may be fairly strong numerically, but they are mostly working-people, who find an outlay of £4,000 or more a very serious undertaking. In the villages the difficulty is of a different character. Not much is needed to erect a chapel suitable for the locality, but after it has been erected and even paid for, it is not always easy to succeed with the real work of a church. The population is small and usually on the decline. Two or three families may be the mainstay of a place, and it often happens that in the course of a year or two these families remove. If in addition to these misfortunes, the feeble cause has to withstand the attacks of an aggressive clergyman or curate, the outlook becomes unpromising indeed, and it is not astonishing if the friends give way to despondency. Recently the General Committee have had under consideration an application for liberty to sell Henderd Chapel in the Wallingford Station. There is practically no cause there at present, and the local preachers of the circuit are not disposed to take the journey to preach to a mere handful of people. And yet the Primitive Methodists are the only representatives of the Free Churches in the locality. If we sell and leave the place the people will be deprived of the chance of ever attending a Nonconformist religious service, a result which will not be good, either for Nonconformity or the villagers, or for that matter, for the Established Church. On the other hand, it may be argued that where there is absolute failure it is wise to look the plain fact in the face and act accordingly. The situation is a difficult one, and yet, perhaps, a little enthusiasm in work, with a little genius for the initiation of new methods, might change the whole aspect of affairs. The General Committee, at least, seem unwilling to allow the place to be abandoned.

CIRCUIT LIBRARIES.

—It is too soon to ascertain the result of Mrs. W. P. Hartley's generous offer for the establishment of circuit libraries, but judging from the few reports that are to hand, the circuits seem inclined to avail themselves of a great opportunity. The more the matter is thought over, the more will the advantages of the proposal become apparent. The advantage to those who cannot buy books for themselves is, of course, obvious. What is not quite so obvious is the advantage that will accrue to those who are quite able and have been accustomed to buy books for themselves. And yet most people who have built up a library know to their cost how long a period elapses, and what money is wasted before the "right vein" is struck, and they learn what kind of books they ought to buy. The local preachers who avail themselves of Mrs. Hartley's offer will be saved from the mistakes of inexperience. It is to be trusted that those who are able will not cease to buy books of their own. But the advantage to them will come from the association they will have with their reading brethren. There will be meetings where the books to be bought will be discussed, and many a novice at book-buying will learn what otherwise would have cost him years of experience to know. There is also the question of intellectual stimulus, and the desire to read, that will be created by these discussions and conversations. Indeed, on reflection, it will be found that the advantages accruing will be immeasurable.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS AND PRIMITIVE METHODISTS.

—On the one side and on the other, there are many good people becoming impatient and irritated on account of the protracted character of the negotiations on the proposed union between the Bible Christians and the Primitive Methodists. The Bible Christians have some cause for complaint, though it must be admitted that the Primitive Methodists have none. The Primitive Methodists were the first to propose union, and in the negotiations they have raised the most of the difficulties that have stood in the way of the happy consummation. At the Bible Christian Conference there was a decided disposition on the part of a section to close the agitation, at any rate, for the present.

This is not a matter for great wonder, though we are glad that other counsels prevailed. We must have patience, and whilst avoiding fatalistic ideas, and allowing that human action is characterised often by mistakes that bring most undesirable results, still remember that God has to do with these things, and that He will not make haste. The caution manifested in the movement is calling forth the commendation of those outside, many of whom are watching the effort with keen interest. The Methodist Recorder says that all Methodists in the country, including the Wesleyans, are interested in the movement, and wish it success. But, it argues, no good could result by an attempt to rush the union. The issues involved are too important for such a course, and, besides, a union hurried would inevitably mean disaster. At the same time, it must be remembered that four years have gone since the movement began, so that if it were consummated by 1900 it could hardly be said that it had been done in a hurry. And to begin the new century with a union between these two churches would affect for good the whole of English Nonconformity. What the future will be in relation to this question will depend to a large extent on the decisions of the Quarterly Meetings, to whom certain questions will be submitted shortly for their consideration. Hitherto, the one regrettable feature in the discussion of the question is that instead of considering the subject in a broad-minded manner, taking account of its rightness, or otherwise, the effect it will have on the Churches concerned, on Nonconformity generally, and on the national life, trifling matters about the probable effect it may have on the number of representatives likely to go to Conference belonging to some class or other, have been regarded as matters of vital importance.

HULL PRIMITIVE METHODISM.

—Primitive Methodists everywhere have been accustomed to regard Hull as in many respects the capital of the Connexion. Nowhere, in the days of the pioneers, were such large permanent results secured as in the great Yorkshire seaport, and for a long period after the death of Clowes, steady and substantial advancement was made. To-day we have more large chapels there than in any other town in the kingdom, and in most of them there are strong societies and large congregations. Besides, there are seventeen ministers in the town in active work, and a number of superannuated ministers. It has to be admitted, however, that during the last twenty years Primitive Methodism has not made the progress there that might have been expected. Some of the churches are aggressive as ever. Others have been overtaken, as happens everywhere, by adverse circumstances. West Street has long been a cause of no little anxiety to many, both ministers and laymen, and we are among those who are admirers of the devotion and self-sacrifice of those who, amidst much discouragement, and in the face of many difficulties, stood loyally by the cause. At the present time a determined effort is being made to inaugurate a new era of prosperity, and it may be hoped that the enterprise of the friends will receive its due reward.

LONDON PRIMITIVE METHODISM.

—To the statesman, the religious and moral reformer, and, indeed, everyone who seeks to improve effectively the life of the people, London presents difficulties not to be found in any other part of the country. To a Church like our own the difficulties are singularly formidable. The enterprise and boldness of London Primitive Methodist ministers and laymen have always commanded admiration. But they have not always commanded financial help to any large extent, and that, after all, is what is chiefly needed. Sites are expensive, and the city is growing at so great a rate that if an income of £10,000 a year could be secured, it could be spent judiciously and with very great advantage to the denomination and to London. We are hopeful that as more men of wealth spring up among us, some of them, at least, will make it a part of their mission to promote Primitive Methodism within the Metropolitan area. Good work is being done on a limited scale at present by the London Chapel and School Extension Fund, and the usefulness of this Fund would be greatly increased if wealthy friends in the provinces would give it the attention it deserves. Valuable additions are now being made to the chapel property both at Battersea and Harringay.

REV. JOSEPH HOCKING AND THE LARGE MAGAZINE.

The thousands of people who month by month are reading the serial tale by Rev. Joseph Hocking in this Magazine, will be glad to learn that he has been engaged to contribute the Story for next year also. The circulation of the Magazine has increased considerably this year, and it is believed the increase is due very largely to the high quality of Mr. Hocking's story, entitled, "The Purple Robe." As it is believed that next year's serial will, at least, be equal to that of the present year, it may be assumed that a still further increase in the circulation will be secured.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES.

—Not many circuits have shown greater activity during the last year or two than Stockton-on-Tees, in the Darlington and Stockton District. Lately a beautiful new church at Yarm was opened, costing some £1,400. This undertaking was barely completed till the foundation-stones of a new chapel were laid in Thornaby. This new departure was much needed. Thornaby is a corporate town with over 30,000 population, situated just across the river from Stockton. But Primitive Methodism has never taken a position worthy of itself in such a town. The society for years has not numbered more than thirty or forty members, and the chapel, at the beginning a very poor place, had got greatly out of repair. The circuit as a whole undertook to bear part of the liability in the event of a new chapel being erected, and it is expected that in a short time the handsome new premises, which will have cost over £3,000, will be opened. And already arrangements are being made to erect a third new chapel in the same station at Eaglescliffe, a suburban residential village, about two miles out of Stockton. The land has already been bought, and building operations will begin in a short time. For these results the Connexion is indebted largely to the Rev. E. Phillipson, who has acquired a certain fame as a successful chapel builder, and to the munificence of R. Clapham, Esq., and his son, J. R. Clapham, Esq.

REV. N. BOOCCOCK AT ARCHIBONGVILLE.

—The Rev. N. Boocock, it is well known, is both an indefatigable worker, and a man of resource. It is therefore not surprising to learn that he is realising very satisfactory success in his mission work on the west coast of Africa. Recently he has baptised several natives. As this ceremony is only performed in cases that have proved by a lengthened probation their fitness to be members of a Christian church, it is evident that on this comparatively new mission the work of the Society's agents is having its effect. It is a matter for regret to learn that the poverty of the people, even for Africans, is unusually great. This arises from the poverty of the soil. A large proportion of the people are slaves, and even the masters are not in comfortable circumstances. There is no market for their produce, so that trading is on an exceedingly limited scale. The missionaries, therefore, it will be seen, have before them a great deal of hard work. Besides the moral reformation of the people, they will have to improve their methods of industry so as to enable them to get more out of the land than hitherto. No improvement in their social condition will be possible till by some means they can produce a greater amount of wealth. One great advantage the missionaries have enjoyed from the beginning,—they have been welcomed by the people, and with perhaps one exception, by the native kings also. In addition, the people, for Africans, are intelligent, and readily imbibe new ideas.

The Wider Outlook.

THE WESLEYAN PASTORAL.

—As might have been expected, seeing it has come from the pen of the Rev. George Jackson, of Edinburgh, the Wesleyan Pastoral is a singularly thoughtful, sane, and inspiring document. With but few modifications it may be commended to the careful study of all Protestants. One or two of the matters it discusses only can be referred to here. Its deliverance regarding Protestantism, setting forth the need of something more than mere protest, is pregnant with valuable teaching. "It is not enough that we reject with indignation the dogma of a Christ bodily present on the altar through the wonder-working power of the priest; we must proclaim a Presence not less real because unseen in every faithful heart. It is not enough that we make light of the claims of an infallible church, or an infallible Pope; the wayward soul of man has need of some one to guide him; we must proclaim Him who, by His Spirit, is with us for evermore to lead us into all truth. It is not enough to denounce the Confessional—the fierceness of our wrath will give no relief to the agony of unconfessed sin which drives the penitent to the priest for absolution; we must proclaim Him who has power on earth to forgive sin." There is also an unusually fine appeal for clear and definite thinking on Christian truth as a necessity to those who would maintain a high level of Christian morality, and a steady and unfaltering walk with God, that is deserving of an oft-repeated perusal. Vague conceptions of the truth will never admit of a high-toned spiritual experience; on the contrary, it will always be a serious peril to the religious life, and it is urged that if the warmth and fervour that are a distinctive note of Methodism are to be preserved, there must be clear conceptions of the truths of the faith—conceptions which can only be enjoyed by those who think much and deeply on religious things.

ORGANISED CONGREGATIONALISM.

—Dr. Parker, in the British Weekly, and an anonymous correspondent in the Christian World, have lately been saying what should afford food for reflection, not only to Congregationalists, but to Methodists and Presbyterians also. The only deduction it is possible to draw is that Independency as such is a most unsatisfactory thing, and that it is desirable to secure for Congregational Churches some form of Connexionalism to save it from certain serious evils from which it is suffering. Few, it may be safely concluded, will be prepared to go as far as Dr. Parker in dreading evil for the Congregational Churches, even though they are themselves very strong in their convictions regarding the advantages of Connexionalism. No doubt he has special and intimate knowledge, but he can hardly have been in the most judicial frame of mind when he wrote the following:—"We are, in my opinion, bound in the matter of organisation to do more or to do less, or our days are numbered." It is a far cry to the day when an organic union among the Nonconformist Churches of England shall be an accomplished fact, and till that day has been reached, it is probable that Congregationalism will hold its own at least among the churches of the land. At the same time, it would probably be all the stronger if some reform of the kind suggested could be carried out. The churches, acting independently for themselves, it appears, often make mistakes in the calling of new ministers, which might in some cases be avoided were there some court like a District Meeting or Conference to consider these appointments. If disputes arise in a church there is no court of appeal. There is also a lack of the denominational spirit, which prevents the initiation of great forward movements. Every human system has its imperfections, but it is evident that Congregationalism as it at present exists might be very greatly strengthened by the introduction of some more or less pronounced connexional element, and such a movement would unquestionably create a stronger, (and in this instance, because of the character of the people, it would be an intelligent) denominational spirit. Two new provisions, at least, in view of the present situation, should be made at an early date; the door into the ministry should be better safeguarded, and the position of the minister rendered more secure. It is worthy of note that during the century Congregationalism in the United Kingdom has made great progress. The returns as far as the membership and number of persons in the congregations are not given with the same care and regularity as in the various Methodist denominations, but this one fact is a striking proof of the vigour of the body, that in 1800 there were 873 churches, whilst to-day there are 4,569.

FREE CHURCH COUNCILS.

—The Federation of the Free Churches of England in the National Federation proceeds apace, and every one who desires the spread of the spirit of Christian unity and concord must wish the movement success. Difficulties here and there arise however. It is well known, for instance, that the Unitarians in many places have taken an active and leading part in movements for civic and moral reform, and these naturally have become associated with the local Free Church Councils. But the Constitution of the National Council does not permit of Councils being federated who admit Unitarians as members, and hence arises friction. Sometimes the Unitarians have not only taken an interest in civic and moral reforms generally, but have taken part in town evangelistic meetings, keeping their own special views out of sight for the sake of the general good, and in these cases good Unitarians feel it to be somewhat hard to ask their Unitarian friends to retire from membership. Others besides the Unitarians find it difficult to fall into line with the Free Church movement. The Strict Baptists of Wales have lately been raising objections. There can be no doubt that the Constitution of the National Free Church Council is a very fine piece of statesmanship. That it is not absolutely perfect is only what could be expected. But seeing it admits so many holding such different religious convictions, it seems a pity that it should be narrow and exclusive just on one or two sides.

THE WESLEYAN MISSION IN EDINBURGH.

—The success of the Rev. George Jackson in Edinburgh has been phenomenal. He went there a few years ago, a raw young man, we believe, fresh from the college, and enjoyed to a large extent from the first a free hand. But he was expected to build up an entirely new cause in the capital of Presbyterian Scotland, where Wesleyan Methodism for years had been at a standstill. Before he had finished his probation he had built up a church of 300 members, and, we believe, had a Sunday evening congregation of 1,500 persons. He is an exceedingly able minister, combining evangelistic fervour with a philosophic cast of mind. And, after all, it is these men who, since the days of St. Paul, have been most successful in getting on the work of God. He is about to begin operations in building a new set of premises suitable for his work in Earl Grey Street. When it is stated that the scheme will involve an outlay of £50,000, some idea of its magnitude will be realised, and when it is added that up to the present he has only raised £8,000, it will be seen that Mr. Jackson is not overdone with timidity.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

—There are many ardent temperance reformers in the Church of England, and some of them are able to see the question in its true bearings, and accordingly act consistently. So much, however, cannot be said of all. Canon Martin, of Stockton-on-Tees, has recently been in correspondence with that amiable temperance stalwart, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and has made a rather pretty self-revelation. One of the pieces of advice the Canon gives is, that temperance parties should lay aside all their differences and press upon the Government some practical reform like Sunday Closing. What does the Canon mean? Is there any temperance organisation in the country that is not prepared to seek for Sunday Closing? It may be assumed that there is not. If, however, the Canon means that temperance reformers must promise to be satisfied with this if they can get it, and seek nothing beyond, it is another matter. In another of his sage counsels he reveals his fear of radicalism. He wants Sir Wilfrid Lawson's section of reformers to declare that temperance is not a party question. Now all the world knows that the United Kingdom Alliance, with which Sir Wilfrid Lawson has been so long honourably associated, is in no sense a political partizan organisation. Its members are willing to work with Tories or Liberals, Churchmen, Catholics, or Nonconformists, and to include all in their membership for their purposes. The Canon deplores that so many temperance advocates are disestablishers also, but surely that is not the fault of the men who do not believe in a State Church. Why are there not more State Churchmen found among the ranks of temperance reformers? Is it because of the unholy alliance between the Tory party, the brewer, and the Church? Really the Canon is hard to please! If, however, he thinks that every temperance reformer should become a churchman as the price for the support of temperance principles by those who are already churchmen, he must be told that the price is too heavy, and the risks of a return in value too great for the bargain to be made. The need of something to arrest the drink evil is every day becoming greater. Some figures on the injury it is inflicting on the womanhood of the nation have recently appeared in a popular magazine. Last year, while there were 3,830 convictions of men who had been convicted over twenty times, there were 6,762 such cases among women. The woman "habitual" has advanced from 5,000 cases in 1878, and 7,000 in 1881, to 12,000 at the present time, and the chief cause is intemperance.

LORD HALIFAX'S MANIFESTO.

—Last month, referring to the decision of the Archbishops regarding Lights and Incense-burning in churches, we ventured to suggest that in spite of this decision, the Ritualists would continue their illegal practices. The result has proved the correctness of this prediction. Lord Halifax, who is looked upon as the leader of the High Church party, has written a manifesto on the "present distress." It is a curious document, and yet exactly what Englishmen have been taught to expect from Ritualists since the publication of the "Secret History of the Oxford Movement." It questions the legality of the judgment, but advises a show of obedience. Not more than "a show," however. The clergy are asked to obey when bad consequences are likely to ensue from disobedience, but even then, to go no farther than they are compelled, and makes suggestions which will enable them to, in part, at least, evade the decision. The High Church laity are urged, in all circumstances, and whether they act legally or otherwise, to stand by their clergy. The Church Times is angry with the Archbishops, and suggests that disestablishment is to be preferred to this interference with the clergy. This is logical and honourable. But many of the clergy are defiant. Themselves claiming powers and gifts not given to ordinary men, they seem to forget that their ecclesiastical superiors should, at least, have equal powers, and that if they claim obedience from their flock on account of their office, bishops and archbishops should claim similar authority at least over the clergy of their diocese.

THE DREYFUS TRAGEDY.

—The whole civilised world has been horrified by the decision of the court-martial at Rennes. From the beginning it was evident that the judges were not impartial, and that the President, especially, had his mind made up as to what he would do, let the evidence be what it might. As the case proceeded, this bias became more and more evident. Englishmen, watching the proceedings through the press every morning, were astonished to find that the court had allowed the prosecution to retail uncorroborated gossip, mere suspicions, evidently born of malice, and outrageous hypotheses without any shadow of fact to support them; whilst cross-examinations were refused, important evidence shut out, and every possible method adopted to prevent the accused having his case presented. In spite of this, however, at the end of the trial, not a single fact remained for the side of the prosecution, all the facts were in favour of Dreyfus. Seldom, indeed, has even an innocent man come through such an ordeal with so fair a name. And yet he was found guilty. The outburst of horror at the iniquity, and of sympathy with the martyr has been phenomenal. Never in the history of the world has the fate of a single individual commanded so much attention. Most people feel that France has put herself outside the pale of civilisation, and that thus late in the Christian era, she has resorted to methods that were thought to belong exclusively to the dark ages. So great is the indignation that everywhere there is an agitation to boycott the Paris exhibition. Already many orders for places for exhibits have been cancelled, and thousands who had intended to visit the exhibition have resolved to stay at home. This is especially the case with the Americans. One party of 700 have all altered their arrangements in this way. It would be well for humanity if this feeling continues to grow. Let every Christian man mark his horror of France by having as little as possible to do with both the people and the country. To adopt this course is not vindictiveness, but simply a manifestation of loyalty to justice, and of indignation against an extreme form of iniquity and cruelty.

REV. ISAAC R. BARNSELY.

Rev. Isaac R. Barnsley.

OW us it is a pleasure to describe a worthy ministerial brother, whom we have long known, and whom we were privileged and honoured to have as our colleague in our own first term of superintendency, and with whom we have ever since been on terms of mutual friendship.

Isaac Rains Barnsley, the subject of this sketch, was born Sept. 2, 1840, at Aldwarke Grange, near Winstar, Derbyshire. He was of godly lineage. His father was a local preacher of our community for sixty-six years, and reached the great age of eighty-eight. Isaac, the son of whom we write, gave himself to the Lord when a boy under ten years of age. He wandered not from his Lord even in his boyhood's days. His home surroundings and Church associations were undoubtedly helpful to his best life. After serving as a local preacher in the home (Winstar) Circuit for nearly four years, he was called into our ministry by the then extensive Chesterfield Circuit, in 1863, and he subsequently served in the ministry at Melton Mowbray, Nottingham Second, Loughborough, Sheffield First, Rotherham, Sheffield Second, Derby, Buxton, Wirksworth, Grantham, Burton-on-Trent First, Wakefield and Lymm Circuits, and is now at Ashbourne, formerly a part of the Wirksworth Circuit. His record in all these circuits is honourable to himself, as his work on them has been helpful to the circuits concerned. In some of the circuits named, he had times of great blessing and success. At Melton Mowbray, at Rotherham, at Sheffield, and at Buxton, there were gracious revivals of the work of God during his and others' sojourn. He ministered devoutly and devotedly to these revivals. We personally well remember the palmy days of his service and stay on the Melton Mowbray Circuit.

Mr. Barnsley regards and affirms himself "specially favoured" in his early time, in that he had as his superintendents in the work of the ministry, the Revs. John Dickenson, J. Barfoot, J. C. Antliff, B.D., A. Clayton, W. Price and myself. With all these he had great fraternalness of spirit, and by each of them he was highly esteemed as a true "yoke-fellow" in service for men, and a sincere "co-worker with God."

In his own terms of superintendency he has been at once peaceful, patient, painstaking and persevering. New sanctuaries have been erected under his counsel and guidance: at Holloway, in the Wirksworth Circuit; at Hilton, in the Burton-on-Trent

First Circuit; and at Lymm, where a cost of £1,700 was incurred, and only £450 was left as debt. The Parker Street property, Burton-on-Trent First Circuit, was also purchased during his stay there, and happily none of the erections, or the purchase referred to, are heavily burdened with debt. At Hognaston, a place on his present circuit, our brother esteems himself to have chiefly "entered into others' labours," yet here he has well followed up the labours of others by the further raising of £100 since July, 1898, for the new sanctuary so lately built and opened. In these enterprises and kindred work, such as improvements and renovations of houses of prayer, he has usually had the loyal co-operation of his official brethren and the people generally. Our brother has occasionally had circuit and Church troubles, but he has coupled wisdom with quiet firmness, and thus has arranged his difficulties locally and amicably.

During his stay in the then Sheffield Second Circuit, which is now the Seventh Circuit, twenty-three years ago, he had a protracted and serious illness of some twenty-two weeks' duration. Some of his friends thought that his work was finished, but by rest, hydropathic treatment, kind, wifely nursing, the assured sympathy of his brethren and his people, he was, with God's blessing, completely restored; and has for years been, as he is now, both well and strong.

Our brother has had circuit honours in abundance; he has frequently represented his circuit in District Meeting, and has been chosen by his District as delegate to Conference. He has not, however, as we think, been ordinarily ambitious for Connexional honours. He has uniformly "preferred others before himself." He has declined to be even a "good echo" of his own views and sentiments, as they have been well expressed by others. Intelligent and hearty voting has served for him in highest Connexional courts. His silence has not risen from inability, or small modicum of power, to share in and contribute to the counsels of his brethren, but rather from high appreciation of his brethren. In our view, some things have passed him that he ought to have taken, and this from his quiet and even retiring manner. This may have been a loss to the interests concerned, and a gain to our brother personally. Be that as it may, if he has not come to the front in Connexional courts—we think we know the reason why.

In the actual work of the ministry, Mr. Barnsley has been "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." He has quietly striven and "studied to show himself approved unto God." He has not greatly delighted in abstruse works of philosophy, nor has he had a prevailing turn of mind and taste for subtleties and metaphysics, though he is not unacquainted with either the one or the other. Tutored in Methodist theology and in intelligent love of it, he is in no danger of being loosed from old moorings. He would teach and preach well from the apostolic injunction, "Hold fast the form of sound words." To give the list of books he has read would occupy too much of our space; suffice it to say: he is widely and well read in Methodist theology, and has delighted in books that have enabled him to understand the Bible. He has all through his life been both a lover and a student of THE BOOK. He is eminently an example of the homo unius libri—nor that alone. Church history, Christian or sacred biography, in particular, and general history and biography, together with a wide reading of homiletics, and general current literature, for the past thirty years have fairly occupied his time and powers. He is a tolerably well up-to-date brother in general subjects and modes of expression, and so discovers he is not afraid of anything new, so-called, as he sees and realises it is good. He is indeed a very companionable brother in conversation when the subjects referred to are under consideration. If not a brilliant conversationalist, he unintentionally discovers very much more than appears likely, and than the hasty-judging would suppose he could do. He is not known all at once, but improves upon acquaintance.

His work for the pulpit has been carefully prepared, and if his preparation is less lengthy now—for he still preaches fresh sermons—it is not less apposite and appropriate to the needs and claims of the people he ministers to. In the delivery of his Master's message, he is usually grave, sober, sincere; one of the very last men, certainly,

"Who would try to court a grin,
When he should woo a soul."

This notwithstanding, he treats of the joyous themes that make the Gospel of the grace of God, and that make men glad, in verily joyous manner. His speech is jubilant, his face lights up, his form becomes erect, as his voice rings out, and his whole gesture and bearing seem to unite in saying, "Come to my Saviour, the Christ of God, who has all power and love to realise His mission, and who ever waits to be gracious to all who will come to Him." We regard our brother as a well-informed, earnest, useful and successful Primitive Methodist minister of the great verities of our holy religion. Surely it goes without saying, and yet we will to say it, that such a minister is indeed a manly man. His excellences are more than our description.

As a pastor he holds it as a principle that he out-works in his life, both to visit and pay special attention to the poor, the sick, and the dying. Our brother fully believes in the devotional means of grace. He has joy in the communion of saints, and has old love for the fellowship of the godly in the old Methodist live class meeting. He yet calls for, and holds, his Sunday evening prayer meetings after his public services, and he rejoices, as of yore, as he sees the "pleasure of the Lord prospering in his hands."

Our brother, greatly favoured in the home of his youth, has rare joy in thinking and knowing that two sisters and a brother (deceased) were members of our Church, and died in the Lord; that one brother in Canada is a local preacher, and another a class-leader among the Methodists; that Mrs. Dean (widow), his sister, has been a member with us for nearly fifty years, and that a younger brother is in the old home, and is an acceptable local preacher in the Winstar Circuit; while of his own home, his three children are all members of our Church. His son has just completed his third year as a probationary minister amongst us, and has lately received and accepted an invitation to be the coadjutor of the Rev. J. T. Parr, at Surrey Chapel, London; while Mrs. Barnsley, who has truly been his helpmeet and mate, was the daughter of our old Dr. Watts, as he was generally and familiarly called, and her eldest brother, the Rev. Nathaniel Watts, is a minister amongst us, and is successfully serving on our Leamington Circuit. These facts minister to our brother's joy.

It is a joy to us to rejoice in our brother's joys and work, and to know that he is still able and willing to work in the vineyard of our Lord, and we sincerely trust that he may be long spared to successfully serve in the Church of his choice and his love, and like his sire, may come like a ripe shock of corn in the end of his days, all ready for the garner of his Lord. So, D.V., may it be. Amen.

CHAPTER XXXI.

DUNCAN'S FIRST LOVE LETTER.

T first Lady Neville could not believe her daughter's words. The confession was absurd, because, to her, it could not be true.

"My child, you have taken leave of your senses," she said. "You are not well. My illness has been too much for you. We will go away from here, we will go back to England."

"No, no, mother," cried the girl, "I am not ill, I am not speaking without thought. It is true, mother, it is true. I believed as long as I could; but—but I cannot believe longer."

Lady Neville was no longer able to control her feelings. Her daughter's words entirely unnerved her, for a moment she was overcome by her confession.

"And this is your work, I suppose," she cried bitterly, turning to Rutland, "this is your idea of honour. Not content with disturbing our town with your pernicious doctrines, you seek to pour poison into my child's mind. This is baseness personified."

Alizon sprang to her feet before Rutland could reply. Her mother's words made her feel less sensitive to the pain she had given her.

"It is false, mother," she replied. "Duncan has never uttered one word to persuade me to change my faith. Never breathed a wish, in my hearing, that I should cease to be a Catholic."

"Then why this madness, why this treason to the faith which not only the Nevilles, but the Bartons, have held for hundreds of years?"

"I cannot give you many reasons, mother, except that I find it impossible to believe. Until that discussion I believed without question. I had been taught to regard all non-Catholics as heretics, and I never for a moment doubted the absolute truth of all the claims of the Church. Even when Father Sheen failed to deal with the difficulties which Duncan raised at the discussion, I did not doubt. I felt sure that everything was right, although I could not understand. I did not feel a bit influenced by what he said in his speeches, although he seemed certain of the things he spoke about. As you know, mother, it was your wish that he should be converted, and——"

"This has nothing to do with your madness," cried Lady Neville, interrupting her. For the first time she realised that she had been guilty of trying to do that for which she censured Rutland in such unmeasured terms. The thought made her uncomfortable, for she felt she had deliberately become a party to a plot, the purpose of which was to make the young minister stand up in the Industrial Hall and declare his belief in Popish doctrines. There seemed nothing wrong about this, nay, rather it was a deed which, had it been successful, would have gained her the smile of her Church. But when she fancied that Rutland had tried to convert her daughter to Protestantism, she felt indignant. She believed that in converting a Protestant to Catholicism she was snatching a brand from the burning, but when a Protestant perverted a Catholic, he was dragging a soul to perdition. Although this might be true, however, she shrunk from letting Rutland know that his conversion had been deliberately planned, and thus she stopped Alizon, who was going so dangerously near to making the confession.

"This has nothing to do with your madness," she repeated angrily, "what made you give up your salvation and become the child of lies?"

"I have not given up salvation," replied the girl, "rather I have realised it. I have come to see that it is not to be obtained by penances and confessions and repeating prayers, and——"

"Silence!" cried her ladyship sternly. "I will not have you utter such blasphemy. Who taught you to say these things? What led you to this heresy?"

"I could not help it, mother, I really could not," replied the girl. "What really opened my eyes, and led me to doubt was—that Bambino, to which your restoration to health has been attributed."

"That is only a venerated relic, child," said her ladyship. "Belief in its power has not become an article of faith."

"But it has been venerated by the Church, it has been declared to have miraculous power, and this by the Pope's consent. The priest attributed your recovery to its influence."

"Well, and why not?"

"Because there was not a shadow of evidence. It had no more to do with your recovery than any doll I might buy in a shop!" cried the girl.

"Well, and what then? Suppose it had not, surely there was not enough in such a trifling incident to lead you to change your faith."

"Not in itself. But it led me to consider other things. It led me to examine the evidences on which the distinctive Papal doctrines were built, and I saw that in many cases they were mere legend, mere fable, bolstered up by the Authority of the Church."

"And where had you the opportunity of examining evidences, you foolish child?"

"I found a New Testament, I read it through, and I discovered that many of the doctrines in which I believed had no foundation there, and oh, compared with the teaching of Christ, that of the Church seemed so poor, so trivial."

"How dare you! How can you, an ignorant girl, understand these things? Besides, the Church has expressly forbidden you to judge of such matters."

"And why should I not?" asked Alizon. "I have my life to live, and God has given me some intelligence, besides, I have prayed many hours, and God has opened my eyes. I cannot help it, mother, neither can I altogether explain how it came to be; but many of my old beliefs left me, just as my belief in the story of Cinderella left me. In some things I still believe. The doctrines which are common to all Christians are real; but those on which the Papacy rests are to me unbelievable. I cannot, cannot accept them. Why, this Rome, this Mecca of the Church, is the very home of superstition, of baseless legend, of Pagan relics. Why, even the ceremony we saw to-day has no suggestion of the Christianity of the New Testament. Oh, I held on as long as I could, I struggled and prayed to keep on believing, but I could not, mother, I could not!"

The girl's overtaxed nerves gave way, and she burst into passionate sobs, while Lady Neville stood by in speechless anger.

"Mr. Rutland, I wish to be alone with my daughter," she said presently. "When you are gone, I shall doubtless be able to bring her to reason."

"Of course I will go since you bid me," said Rutland. "But, but——"

"I have given you my answer, it is impossible, it is madness. You will be wise, you will be kind to both Alizon and me, if you adhere to your former resolution and go to Naples to-morrow."

"No," said Rutland, "I shall not go."

"And why, pray?"

"Because Alizon claims my protection."

"Your protection. Against whom, pray?"

"Against you and those you will select as your advisers," replied Rutland quietly.

"I think I told you I desired to be alone," said her ladyship presently. "It is not for me to answer you."

"Then I must go." He took a step towards Alizon.

"I forbid you to go near my daughter," said her ladyship. "Kindly go."

"Thank you, your ladyship. Good night, Alizon. Remember I shall always try to be near you, and that I shall be always loving you."

He left the room, leaving mother and daughter together.

The next morning when Rutland went into the breakfast-room of the hotel, he looked everywhere for Lady Neville and Alizon, but they were nowhere to be seen. After breakfast he wandered for a long time around the corridors in the hope of catching a glimpse of them, but in vain. He was not at all surprised at this, however, as he knew that Lady Neville would do her utmost to keep Alizon out of his sight. He had spent an almost sleepless night thinking of what had taken place after his departure, and in wondering how Alizon fared, and when, at last, he fell asleep, his dreams were haunted by unpleasant memories of the scene through which he had passed. Still, the fact remained that Alizon loved him, and that made all things bright, and he comforted himself with the thought that her mother loved her too tenderly to continue to be unkind.

When noon came, and neither had appeared, however, he felt more anxious. Was Alizon ill, or had Lady Neville suffered a relapse? Although he had been tempted to go to her ladyship's rooms and inquire, he had up to now refrained from doing so. As the hours passed by, however, and he could see nothing of them, he at length made up his mind to personally discover if all were well. He had scarcely reached the landing on which Lady Neville's suite of rooms was situated, than he saw servants flitting about as though something of importance had taken place. A few minutes later he discovered the reason for this. The rooms had been vacated, and the servants were preparing for the incoming guests.

Utilising his small knowledge of Italian, he asked a servant for information. The only answer he was able to obtain was that the Countess had vacated the apartments. The woman knew nothing else, however, and as Rutland had a difficulty in understanding her, he made his way to the entrance hall. The concierge spoke English fairly fluently, as indeed, he seemed to speak all other languages.

Yes, the lady, whom he persisted in calling "the Countess," left the hotel that morning.

"At what time did she go?" asked Rutland.

"Soon after eight o'clock."

"Where did she go? Have they left Rome?"

"I do not know where they are gone, except that they have left Rome."

"But she left instructions concerning her letters?"

"Certainly."

"She gave you an address to which you should forward them?"

"Certainly."

"What is the address?"

"I am sorry to disappoint you, signore, but you must please excuse me," said the Italian.

Rutland was nonplussed. During the afternoon he made as many inquiries as he dared, but he gained no information as to where Alizon had been taken. He was comforted by the thought that neither of them could be ill, or they would not have left the city; but, as may be imagined, his mind was torn with anxiety.

"They are gone back to England," he concluded at length. "Lady Neville has taken Alizon home that she may get the advice of Ritzoom and Sheen."

But he had no sufficient reason for believing in this, as he knew that Lady Neville was not sufficiently strong to bear continuous travelling.

He felt he could not stay longer in Rome. Now that Alizon had gone, the city had lost its charm.

"Yes, that is it," he said at length, "Alizon has gone to England, and I will go too. I will catch the midnight train to-night, and return as fast as I can; I shall then be near to help her."

He walked into the Piazza del Popolo, then along the Corso, and presently returned by way of the Via dei Condotti. When he reached the hotel, he realised that he was not strong enough to take the journey to England. The experiences of the last twenty-four hours revealed to him the fact that he had not yet recovered his strength. He was sick and faint. He went to his room and threw himself on his bed. For a time he thought he was going to faint; but presently he recovered himself. The first dinner bell rang, and he rose and dressed.

"I think I will try and go after all," he said presently, "I feel much stronger now; besides, I want to be on the move. I cannot stay in Rome now Alizon is gone."

When he reached the smoking-room, he saw men reading letters. Evidently the evening post had come. He did not expect any himself, but he mechanically made his way to the entrance hall where the letter-rack was placed. Turning to the space containing the number of his room, he saw that several had arrived for him. He scanned them eagerly in the hope that Alizon had been able to send him a line, but he saw at a glance that they were all from England.

"I will not read them until after dinner," he thought, as the second dinner bell rang. "Perhaps they will help to distract my mind." When dinner was over he found his way into the billiard-room, which was quite deserted. There was only one letter of importance, and that was from Tudor Church secretary. It contained the news that the pulpit had been supplied for four Sundays more, and while the people longed for his return, the church officers had forwarded his next quarter's salary, with a resolution, unanimously passed, that he must not come back until he was perfectly restored to health.

The letter decided him. "No, I'll not go back yet," he said; "besides, Alizon may be in Italy. I'll follow Lady Neville's advice and go to Naples. I promised myself that I would see Pompeii and Vesuvius before returning to England."

By two o'clock the next day he had reached the capital of Neapolia, and was, from his hotel windows, looking at the finest bay in the world.

The change did him good; new scenes, new associations, added to the sight and sound of the sea, helped him in spite of himself. Besides, the consciousness that Alizon loved him made the impossible seem easy; with that thought to cheer him he could not despair.

He did not like Naples, however. True, the situation of the town was very fine, while the bay deserved all the praise it had received ; but the life of the city was abhorrent. The commonest deficiencies of life were not observed, filth prevailed almost everywhere, and of self-respect the people seemed to be deprived.

"Surely this is the home of superstition, lying, cheating, dirt and devilry," he said, after he had been there three days.

Still he enjoyed his visit to Pompeii, and wandered among its ruins like one in a dream. During the hours he was there it seemed as though long centuries had never been, and that he was living in the far back past, when gay chariots swept through the narrow streets of that wonderful city. Vesuvius, too, inspired him with awe. That great sea of fire burning in the heart of the mountain impressed him as it must impress all who see it. It aroused his imagination, and made him realise the cry of the people of Pompeii when they saw the burning lava sweeping down the mountain side, "The end of the world is come! The end of the world is come!"

At the end of four days, however, he wanted to be on the move again. His mind was racked with anxiety about Alizon ; he painted all sorts of gloomy pictures, and called to mind what Catholic girls had often had to suffer when they doubted the faith of their fathers.

On the morning of the fifth day in Naples, however, a letter was brought to his room which made all things new. It was a letter from Alizon which had been forwarded from Rome. It was the first letter he had ever received from her, and he broke the seal with all the eagerness of a boy of fifteen.

It was sent from Florence, and was evidently written in haste, but it contained words which made the young man's heart beat for very joy, and made every fibre of his being pulsate with exquisite gladness. It revealed traits in Alison's character of which he had no conception; it told of a thoughtfulness and tenderness which he had never attributed to her.

"I have a great difficulty in writing you, Duncan," she said, "for every one seems against me, even my maid. But still, I do not mind, I am very happy, happier than I ever hoped to be in this life; perhaps it is because I still have hope of a greater happiness in the future. As you will know ere this, we left Rome suddenly; my mother willed that we should, and I thought it best not to refuse to accompany her. She is far from strong, and my action has hurt her more than you can think. We shall not stay here long. Where we shall go I do not know, but probably to Venice. You can guess the reason why I am kept in ignorance. It seems very strange that mother and I, who have been such friends, should be opposed to each other; but I cannot help it. I am trying to be kind and patient and cheerful, although it is difficult to be so. Mother thinks it wise to taunt me because I have ceased to be a Catholic, and to accuse me of being a traitor to the truth. It is what I should have done under similar circumstances a few months ago, so I must not complain. She also continues to be angry because of you, but I brave that anger gladly, for through you, life is more glorious than I had ever conceived that it could be.

"Mother will, I am sure, never consent for us to be more to each other than we are now; but even if we are not I shall continue to rejoice.

"I think of you continually. Do not be anxious about me, nor let yourself be unhappy, for your happiness is more to me than my own. I wish I could ask you to write, but I cannot, neither must you expect another letter from me, for I am afraid I shall not have another opportunity of writing.

"Mother is surrounding me with priests, learned and grave, in the hope of leading me back to her faith; she is also trying to make me believe that to think of you is madness. But she fails in both these things—fails because 'I know in whom I have believed'—fails, because—but I need not tell you the other reason."

That same day Duncan started for Florence, where he stayed for two or three days; and after making sure that Alison had left that city, he took train for Venice. His mind was full of anxious thoughts; but as he read and re-read Alison's letter, he could not help rejoicing with great joy.

CHAPTER XXXII.

FATHER RITZOOM DELIBERATES.

"WELL, what is the meaning of this, Sheen?"

It was Father Ritzoom who spoke, and the old parish priest noticed that the Jesuit was both anxious and angry. They were sitting together in the study of the former in Lynford, and both were burning the fragrant weed.

"You know as much as I do now," replied Father Sheen. "Lady Neville sent for me as soon as she arrived, the day before yesterday, and on hearing her news, I immediately telegraphed for you."

"I've been a fool," said Ritzoom presently.

"Most wise men become fools sometimes," replied Father Sheen.

"But my foolishness is inexcusable. If I were a boy just completing his novitiate I could not have muddled the business more."

"I thought it a splendid plan."

"So it was, but I reckoned wrongly. I forgot that women live outside the realm of any known law, and I did not realise that Rutland's prejudices were so deeply-rooted."

"Of course, it was my fault in the first instance," said Father Sheen ruefully; "but for my giving that series of addresses all this would never have happened."

"There's no knowing," said Ritzoom.

"No, of course that is so, and really, when I understood your plans, I thought that Providence had interfered, and would overrule everything for the glory of the Church."

Ritzoom sat quietly for several minutes, his face looking more like a mask than the features of a living man.

"Put on some more coals, Sheen," he said presently. "It may be the end of April, but the nights are cold."

The old priest obeyed without a word, looking anxiously at the Jesuit's face as he did so. Father Sheen had great faith in Ritzoom's judgment, but the results of the scheme which he had formulated had staggered his faith. As we have seen, the old priest was not a clever man, and he saw no loophole of escape out of the business which brought them together.

"Did you see Alison?" asked Ritzoom presently.

"Oh yes."

"Well?"

"Oh, she was very kind to me, but I saw that all my authority had gone."

"You never had much, I am afraid."

"Well, there was always an atmosphere of liberty in the house, but I never knew a time when she would disobey me in matters of religion."

"Did you say anything to her about Rutland?"

"No. I—I, somehow I dare not."

"And did you speak to her about her change of faith?"

"No, I did not think it best then."

Ritzoom laughed quietly. He read this simple-minded priest's thoughts like a book.

"You were wise."

"What are you going to do?" asked Father Sheen, after several minutes' silence.

"I am trying to think. Give me another cigar!"

The Jesuit smoked for several minutes in perfect stillness. His face was utterly expressionless, his eyes were closed.

"Well?" said Sheen presently.

"It's not well, it's bad."

"Yes, it is bad. I see no loophole anywhere. Even although her ladyship persists in her refusal——"

"Which she will."

"Yes; well, even if Alizon disobeys her mother——"

"Which she will not."

"I don't know."

"I believe you."

"Well, come now, what do you suggest? Let's face the facts."

"That's what I've been doing ever since I entered this beastly town."

There could be no doubt about it, Ritzoom was very angry. His impatient, curt replies to his friend, the rasping tone of his voice revealed the fact continually.

"Sheen, as you know, I've been engaged on delicate matters for more than twenty years. During that time I've failed only twice to carry out my plans."

"I am surprised at your failing at all," replied Father Sheen.

"My first failure was when I was a very young man. I need not give you the details of the affair. But I failed utterly. I was altogether inexperienced at the time, so I may be excused. For twenty years after that, everything I touched succeeded. I was very careful, and I never attempted the impossible. Then I bungled another matter."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. I matched my wits with a fellow by the name of Lancaster. In some things I suppose I beat him, but in others, I, well, I came off second best. That was not so long ago; and I made a vow that I would never be beaten again."

"Ah!"

"You may guess, therefore, how I feel about this business. It is more serious than you can think."

"I am afraid it is all my fault," sighed the old priest.

"Pah, it was no longer your fault when I took the matter up. I promised that I would turn your failure into a victory for the Church, and instead, unless strong, definite action is taken, it will mean just the opposite. Not only has the Protestant remained a Protestant, but the girl will give up her faith, if the man is allowed to influence her."

"She has given up her faith!" suggested Sheen.

"Nonsense."

"But, but——"

"My dear man, the faith is not given up so easily, it is woven into every fibre of her being, she is the child of many generations of Catholics. She still belongs to us."

"But her mother told me that——"

"Oh yes, yes, I understand. I've made a mess of it, but I am not quite in my dotage. She is a woman, and she is a young woman. She has been brought up in an atmosphere of spiritual authority, her mother remains true, and exercises control. Therefore she cannot cease to believe so easily. As far as she is concerned, it is only a matter of careful, skilful management."

Father Sheen looked doubtful.

"It is the man about whom I am most troubled. We have no hold upon him. I made up my mind that he should be converted, I promised you that he should be, and—and, well, I'd move heaven and earth rather than be beaten."

"I don't think you understand Alizon."

"No."

"I don't. I am afraid—oh, I am—I'm not sure that Alizon will not—marry Rutland."

Ritzoom took no notice of the other's words; evidently he regarded them as unworthy of an answer.

"Well, what are you going to do?" asked the old priest rather testily.

"I am going to have a conversation with Alizon."

"Yes, and then?"

"I shall call on Rutland."

"He is not in England."

"But he soon will be. He'll find out where the girl is, and then——" Ritzoom shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, suppose you fail with them?"

"I shall not fail, at any rate with Alizon."

"But suppose you do?"

"Well, then, my friend," and Ritzoom's eyes flashed dangerously, "if that happens you will see some ——" but he did not complete the sentence.

"When are you going to see Alizon?"

The Jesuit looked at his watch.

"To-night," he answered, like a man who had made up his mind to undertake a difficult task.

"Then we must start at once."

"Yes, at once."

"Shall I call a cab?"

"No, we will walk. And I have a request to make of you."

"What is that?"

"Do not speak to me as we walk to the Priory, unless I speak to you first."

The two men started on their journey. After they had walked a few minutes, Ritzoom stopped.

"Did I not tell you?" he said.

They were standing opposite Tudor Chapel, which loomed large in the dim light, and cast a dark shadow on the street.

"What?" asked Sheen, "I see nothing but Rutland's church."

"Don't you see that announcement?"

Leaning against one of the huge pillars which supported the portico was a notice board, on which an announcement was made. The old priest put on his spectacles and read it.

"A welcome home meeting next Saturday night," he said. "Evidently his church officers know when they may expect him."

Ritzoom did not reply, but walked quietly on. No other word was spoken until they reached the door of the Priory. Father Sheen had obeyed his orders.

Lady Neville received the two men with cordiality, but there was an anxious look in her eyes.

"Thank you for coming so promptly," she said, "I want a quiet chat with you very much. As you may imagine, I am sorely troubled."

"Yes," replied Ritzoom, "we had better have a private interview at once."

He uttered the word "private" with such emphasis that Father Sheen expressed a desire to go into the library and read The Times.

"Will you give me a detailed account of all that happened in Rome?" said the Jesuit, when the two were seated in Lady Neville's private sitting-room. "Please omit nothing. The merest trifle may be of importance."

"I will tell you all I can remember," replied Lady Neville, and forthwith she described faithfully what had happened.

"Were Rutland and your daughter much alone?" asked Ritzoom when she had finished.

"Very little. He sometimes appeared desirous of avoiding her company."

Ritzoom looked grave. "That suggests that he tried to be true to your English notions of honour," he said.

"As you know, I tried to make him feel that we were his friends, and until that last night,—well, I could find no fault with him."

"It seems that this Bambino was the first occasion for definite doubt on her part?"

"Yes. I was ill at the time, I have explained. She said that people believed in the image without sufficient evidence, and this led her to think of other things. Presently she came to the conclusion that many of our beliefs were accepted in practically the same way."

"You say she got hold of a copy of a Protestant Testament?" queried the priest.

"Yes."

"You never detected signs of doubt before you went to Rome?"

"Never. And that in spite of the fact that I had allowed her to read widely. I have always maintained that our religion courted the freest investigation, and so she was allowed to read everything, except those books absolutely forbidden by the Church."

"And many that are, I expect," said the priest.

"Perhaps so. Still, Father Sheen never——"

Ritzoom interrupted her with an impatient gesture.

"Sheen is refreshingly innocent of all knowledge concerning such things," he said presently, with an indulgent smile.

"Still, she never betrayed doubt. Indeed, she felt angry towards those who professed liberal ideas."

"Exactly; nevertheless, she was influenced. Her reading formed a sort of deposit in her mind, although she was ignorant of its influence. I see, I see. One cannot be too careful as to what such as she reads."

"We had a terrible scene after Rutland left us that night, simply terrible. I could not have believed that she could have conceived such terrible heresy. She said that Romanism was not religion at all, and that its teaching was entirely wanting in the essentials of Christianity."

Ritzoom looked very grave.

"She still obeys you?" he queried presently.

"Yes," replied her ladyship doubtfully.

The priest understood perfectly the affirmative answer, as well as the tone in which it was spoken.

"What are you prepared to sacrifice?" he asked presently.

"Anything, everything."

"That is well."

"You would not consent to her marrying Rutland?"

"I would rather see her dead."

"That is well," repeated the priest with a satisfied smile. "Do you think she would disobey your direct commands?"

"No, I think not. She has always been a good girl, and in spite of her apostasy, I am sure she loves me as much as ever."

"Do not call it apostasy, Lady Neville. I do not regard it in that light. Most children have childish complaints, but we do not think of them seriously; they get over them. Let us say that your daughter has an attack of spiritual measles. I do not think the attack is serious, and I can assure you she will get over it."

"You have not seen her, Father Ritzoom; you have not spoken to her since she came from Rome."

"No, but I do not think it matters. I fancy I understand the situation."

Lady Neville looked at the Jesuit keenly. For a moment she doubted his powers. His very confidence, while cheering her, made her afraid that he did not understand her daughter's disposition or character. Moreover, she could not help remembering that it was through Ritzoom that Duncan and Alizon had been thrown together. It was at his instigation that they had visited Rome, rather than some other Continental city. Up to the present nothing that he had prophesied had come to pass, rather, events had taken place which threatened to darken the rest of her life.

"What do you intend to do?" she asked presently.

"I cannot tell you exactly until I have had an interview with your daughter," replied Ritzoom. "But you need not be afraid. Your daughter will soon be ashamed of her fancy for Rutland, and she will bitterly repent her momentary doubts."

"I am very glad you think so," replied Lady Neville.

"I should like to see her at once," said Ritzoom, "the sooner we take action the better."

"Very well, I will send for her immediately," and she rung for a servant.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE PRIEST AND THE WOMAN.

WHEN Ritzoom and Alizon were left together, the former looked somewhat ill at ease. As he told Father Sheen, he had been for a quarter of a century dealing with difficult cases, and having interviews with men and women on very delicate matters. As a rule, moreover, he felt perfectly at ease, even when skating over thin ice, and when engaged in matters on which the slightest false move would destroy his plans. On this occasion, however, in spite of what he had said to Lady Neville, he did not feel certain of his ground. Although Alizon's face was very pale, and her lips trembled somewhat, her eyes shone with a steady light, while her features were set and determined. Somehow, she was different from what she had been when they had met before. He did not feel sure of his power over her, as in the past. Still, he was not a man who would easily lose his self-control, or be likely to make false moves.

"Well, you have escaped a good deal of our English winter, my child," he said quietly. "I had hoped to have gone to Rome myself, but the fates forbade it. Besides, I was doubtless doing better work in England. And, after all, nothing gives one so much satisfaction as hard work. Sometimes when I am overworked, I think I should like to take my ease; but that is only for a brief time."

Alizon simply nodded. She knew that she had not been asked to meet him to hear this, and she wished that he would at once approach the subject which brought them together.

But Ritzoom was too wise to do this, even although he guessed what was passing in Alizon's mind. He knew that his first business was to try and create a certain atmosphere, and to impress the girl with his presence. And so for the next few minutes he talked pleasantly about some of his experiences in Rome, and in other parts of the world. Experiences which impressed the girl with the man's own cleverness, and with the apparently impregnable position of the organisation to which he belonged. All the time, moreover, he kept his great dark eyes upon her face, watching every twitch of the eyelids, and every tremor of the lips, just as a skilful diplomatist does when trying to find out the weak place in the armour of his opponent. He seemed to possess a kind of mesmeric power too, a power which influenced Alizon in spite of herself.

She felt that he was drawing the net of the conversation slowly around her, and by subtle inference made her feel the heinousness of opposing the will of God as expressed in His Church. The atmosphere became more and more charged with priestly influence, and he impressed her with the idea that he spoke not simply as a man, but as an ambassador of a great mystical power. She could not explain why, but he made the last few weeks seem as a dream, he aroused old influences, old memories. He made her think of the long line of Nevilles on her father's side of her house, who had been true to the ancient faith, and of the equally long line of Bartons, of which her mother was a descendant, who had all been faithful to the Church. She remembered, moreover, the boast of both the Nevilles and of the Bartons, that they, through the stress of the centuries, in spite of changes of kings and governments, in spite of war and persecution, had never married into Protestant families, never changed in their attitude towards religion. Ritzoom said nothing about these things, but he made her feel them, and thus the influences of heredity, of association and history, became working forces in the girl's life.

Thus, at length, it seemed natural that he should refer to the plans to which she had been a party, as though she were still interested in winning a man who had been a dangerous antagonist to the servants of God, to become a champion of the true faith.

"It seems we have not been altogether successful, my child," he said confidentially, keeping his eyes fixed upon her; "well, that is all the more reason for renewed effort, for unflagging service in the cause of truth."

He did not seem to regard her own change as worthy of notice, rather he seemed to look upon her as faithful to her old ideals, and as being filled with the longings which possessed her six months before.

Alizon did not answer; indeed, at that moment

"Of course you did. Well, it appears that up to the present he has not yielded to the truth, and grace has not yet touched his heart. What would you advise now? What can we do to save his soul, and make him a champion for the truth? It will be a glorious victory, will it not?" and Ritzoom's voice became, if possible, more gentle, and for the first time Alizon noticed a tone of pleading.

"You do not appear to understand," she said, as if struggling with herself.

"Oh yes, I think I do," he replied, "I know there are difficulties, but, as you know, we never give up hope. We go on year after year, decade after decade. Besides, you have great influence over him. You must have. Well, it is for you to use it for God and His Church."

"Mr. Rutland will never be converted to your faith," stammered Alizon.

"You should never say that, my child. Your she could not. It was as though a weight was placed upon her lips and upon her heart.

"You were with Mr. Rutland a good deal in Rome?" he asked.

"Yes; but scarcely ever alone. Father Matthew accompanied us on the few occasions on which I went sight-seeing with him."

"Oh yes, I suppose so. And yet you must have noticed how he was impressed, you must have noticed how Rome influenced him?"

"Yes."

"SHE ROSE TO HER FEET."

fathers never gave up hope even in the darkest hours. Besides, the greater the difficulties the greater the reward."

"But, but——" Alizon struggled to say.

"We never admit of 'buts,'" interrupted Ritzoom with a smile, "never. We all had before us a glorious ideal. We arranged to fight a bloodless battle. We determined to win over a dangerous enemy and make him a friend. Well, so far we have failed; but we must not give up. That would be cowardly, unworthy of the children of the Church. And, my child," here Ritzoom's voice became more solemn, more impressive, "God expects it of you. He is looking on us now. He is pleading with you, and yet commanding you never to turn aside from such a glorious object. And it is a terrible, TERRIBLE thing to disobey God."

For a moment Alizon felt almost overcome. The man, more than his words, made her as weak as a child. She almost lost her mental balance, and a great longing came into her heart to fall on her knees before him and beg forgiveness. It seemed as though her very life hung in the balance, and as though priestly power and the influence of past centuries was greater than all else. It was an awful battle that she fought, all the more awful because her strength seemed gone, and because the very foundations of her life were shaken.

Ritzoom saw his advantage, and he kept his eyes fixed steadily upon her. He was fighting a great battle, too. He knew that his own suggestion had brought around the present condition of things, and he was anxious for the sake of his promises, his influence, and his reputation, to undo the evil which had been done. Besides, he was, doubtless, sincere in what he had said. He had been reared in the atmosphere of the Church, and he loved that Church beyond all else. He believed in its Divine rights, he had no doubt but that it was the true, the only Christian Church. He could not be called a spiritual Catholic, but he was a loyal one. It appealed to his own nature, and satisfied its cravings, and because all the forces of his life had intensified his interest in its welfare, he could not see how those outside its fold could understand true religion. To a Protestant this may be strange, but to the Romanist, it is natural, nay, more, it is inevitable, it is the natural outcome of Papacy.

And thus Alizon stood shivering on the brink of begging forgiveness for what seemed at that moment a sin, she appeared about to yield to the influences which were around her. Then her strong vigorous nature asserted itself, the life-blood of her intellect began to flow, the intuitions of her soul were made manifest.

She rose to her feet, and as she did so, a great weight seemed to roll from her. Life in a second became larger, religion appealed to her again, not as the acceptance of the creeds of a Church, and the promise of obedience to its commands, but a new spirit, a spirit which she had herself felt. It was the realisation of those great words of Christ, "I came that ye might have LIFE, and that ye might have it more abundantly."

"It is no use my keeping back what you perhaps already know," she said firmly. "Mr. Rutland will never become converted to your faith; and I cannot assist you in such an object, because I no longer believe in those things which I formerly held fast."

"You cannot mean this, my child," said Ritzoom, like one surprised.

"I do mean it," replied Alizon, strength and conviction coming back with every word she spoke. "Religion is no longer what it was to me."

"If what you say is true, it cannot be," said Ritzoom. "But I cannot believe it; you are a child of the Church, and you cannot give up truth for error. She cannot leave that one true Church to become a mere sectarian."

"No, I do not leave the Church," replied Alizon, "rather, I more truly enter it."

"My child, what you say is impossible, there is no Church outside the Holy Catholic Apostolic Church. Where is this Church that you speak about?"

"It is in my heart, my life," cried Alizon.

"This is foolishness," replied Ritzoom. "What you say is but the groundless phraseology of heretics."

"It is not groundless," cried the girl. All fear was gone now, and she spoke freely.

"Where is your authority?" asked the priest.

"I have our Lord's own words," replied Alizon. "'The Kingdom of God is within you,' He said."

"Ah, I see!" and there was a touch of asperity in his voice, "you have been reading the New Testament."

"I have been reading but little else for a long time," cried the girl.

"It is one of the most profound books in the world," said Ritzoom; "but it cannot be interpreted except by God's chosen ones. You are but a child, and would you pretend to know its meaning more truly than the elect of the Church who have given it to the world, and who have been studying it for eighteen hundred years?"

"Our Lord said that God hid many things from the wise and the prudent, and revealed them unto babes," said the girl.

"But what can you know of the New Testament, its history, and its deepest meaning?" asked the priest.

"I know enough to read and to pray," she replied, "and because I have accepted Christ rather than a Church, life has become new to me. It is more, it is greater, it is holier."

"I see," said Ritzoom, "I suppose you will be soon of the opinion that we of the Catholic faith do not belong to the true Church?"

"All who know Christ belong to the true Church, whether Catholic or Protestant," replied the girl. "The true Church is the Spirit of Christ reigning in our lives."

"Who told you this?"

"God."

"But think, my child. Christ came to establish a Church. You believe that?"

"Yes."

"Well, where is it except in the Catholic Church?"

"It is everywhere, where there is love and faith and obedience," said Alizon. "It is not narrowed by sects or boundaries of any sort. It embraces all those who love Christ and accept Him as their Saviour."

"Let me show you where you are wrong," said the priest.

"You may adduce arguments which I cannot meet with argument," answered the girl, "for you are cleverer than I. But—I know it seems boastful—I have knowledge which has not come to me through the intellect, and I know that the Church of Christ is larger than the Roman Church, and that in claiming to be the only Church, it limits God, it resolves religion into a mere sect. Christianity is a spirit, a great motive-power in the soul; it is Christ living in us."

"And how came you by this knowledge?" asked the priest.

"I do not know," replied Alizon reverently. "I feel as the blind lad must have felt to whom our Lord gave his sight, and who answered Christ's enemies by saying: 'One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see.'"

Ritzoom was for a moment staggered. Alizon had led the conversation into a channel with which he was not familiar. The calm assurance of the girl gave him the impression that she regarded him as being ignorant of the great truths which had become hers.

"My child," he said, "while this seems very plausible and beautiful, it is in reality full of deceit. God has appointed certain means whereby men must be saved. That means is expressed in the Church."

"Who said so?" said Alizon quickly. "Give me our Lord's authority for saying this?"

"That could be easily given," said the priest, "but you would not understand. It is for you to obey those whom God hath appointed. And let me say this," here Ritzoom's voice became rather angry, "it is no light matter for a child of the Church to disobey her teaching."

"Will you explain?"

"I mean this: Protestants may be forgiven, for their sin is that of ignorance; they have been robbed of religion, they have not been reared in the light of truth; but for one who has known the truth, who has lived amidst all the advantages of the Church, who has received her sacraments, and yet who becomes apostate, I know of no forgiveness."

"Then you mean to say——"

"I mean to say that your position is terrible," said Ritzoom, "more terrible than you can think. Reflect, my child, reflect."

"I have reflected," said Alizon, "and God has told me that your words are false. What! Do you mean to say that God will punish me for ever for following His own leadings, for being true to what I believe to be truth, for obeying the commands of our Lord? Father Ritzoom, whatever I once believed, I could not believe it now! It is repugnant to everything high and holy."

"Nevertheless, it is true."

"When you can make me believe that the sun causes darkness, you may persuade me to accept that," said the girl. "No, I do not fear the threats of the Church. All that is gone!"

Again Ritzoom felt baffled. He could not appeal to her fears. She had thrown off the weight of authority. She seemed to possess convictions, assurances, secrets unknown to him. He had appealed to two forces in her nature, and had failed. But he had not been a student of human nature during twenty-five years for nothing. So far she seemed to present an impregnable barrier to him; but he felt sure that he could find the vulnerable place in her armour. The quiet conviction of the girl, which his priestly authority failed to touch, staggered him, but he knew that she had a loving, affectionate nature.

"If you will not yield to the pleadings of the Church, I assume that you are not dead to love, and to filial duty," he said. "Do you know what you are doing? You are breaking your mother's heart, you are blighting her life. Does your new religion teach you to do that? You know that she is not strong, and if you persist in your madness, I fear the worst; you will be guilty of your mother's death."

Ritzoom had fixed his arrow at last. Alizon burst out sobbing; and seeing his advantage Ritzoom pressed it. He pictured Lady Neville's joy if they were again united in sympathy and faith, he told of her agony if she, Alizon, should persist in her terrible course. Perhaps he was not wise in saying so much, for presently Alizon's eyes flashed defiance.

"Father Ritzoom," she said, "suppose my mother was a Protestant instead of a Catholic, and had the same feelings towards Catholicism as she has towards Protestantism; and suppose that I her daughter was converted to Catholicism, would you have me remain a Protestant, because by becoming a Catholic, I broke her heart?"

"That—that would be different," stammered Ritzoom, "surely you cannot place the——"

"Excuse me," said the girl, interrupting him for the first time, "it is no use, I love my mother more than words can say; but I must be true to my convictions, I must be true to God."

"And this man?" said Ritzoom, "this man who has been the means of leading you into error, will you persist in your madness concerning him?"

"Father Ritzoom," said Alizon, "for the sake of what I once believed, I have told you of the new life which has come to me. But I decline to speak with you concerning Mr. Rutland. Good night."

The Jesuit sat for a long time in perfect stillness. Presently a look of conviction came into his eyes. He had thought of a new method of action.

"Yes; that will do it," he said with a smile.

The Songs of Our Fathers.

BY THE REV. A. T. GUTTERY.

EVER since the sons of Israel celebrated their Red Sea triumph by loud and eager praise, all the great religious movements of the world have been marked by song. Just as nations demand and create their own national hymns, so every crisis in history seems to claim and form its own melody. It would be an easy and fascinating task to trace the Hymnody of the ages, to show how the early Christians, the Lollards, the Reformers and the Puritans assured their courage, and declared their faith by psalms and hymns; of many movements, the only record we have is the sacred strains, to whose mighty rhythm contending hosts marched to battle. He who makes a hymn is greater than he who builds an ironclad, or makes a fortune; and when you remember that in hymns you have mightiest truth reinforced with the enthusiasm that music alone can give, it is easy to see how song has done more than the sword to shape the destinies of the world.

Get to know the songs of a nation, and through an open window you see right into its inmost heart and life; then it is off its guard and allows its most sacred secrets to rush to its lips; this is no poetic fancy that comes easy to a lover of music, it is an historic truism which every careful student can discover for himself.

Of course, the songs that usher in, and accompany, great religious movements have their own individuality—signs that set them apart. It is their very individuality; destroy it and they become but exertions of the throat rather than energies of the heart. Most markedly is this true of Methodism. She can never be divorced from the hymns of Charles Wesley. These hymns were the language by which she could reach the common heart. They made, and still make her a national force; and while many a sermon or argument or book has been lost in the rush of years, the hymns remain a priceless heritage and a perennial fount of inspiration. The hymns of Methodism are distinct from all others. Some of them you can transplant into any service, but for the most part they need their own soil, and maintain their own beauty. That is, they are the product of a certain spiritual consciousness, of a certain ideal of worship, and only there can they preserve that fitness which is as essential as unity of tone.

When you come to the fathers of our own branch of Methodism, this individuality strikes you still more. They were true to the genius of the generations that sang them. They will always be precious as memorials of labours and struggles of years ago. We rejoice to sing them over, now and again, in gatherings such as this; but I do not think we shall ever return to them. I do not know that we ought, for we have lost that intense denominational keynote that was such a distinctive feature. Some think that a great loss; others will look on our wider tolerance and larger charity as a distinct gain.

I will not claim for these hymns more than they deserve; we can afford to be perfectly frank here. They were not all good poetry; from an artistic point of view, many of them are not good music. Many of the airs have an origin into which it is not well to look too closely. It may offend our notions of good taste to have one portion of the congregation singing at other portions. The hymns may sing too much of the future and not of the present; they may not be faultless in a literary, or social or musical sense; and yet they are precious to us. They set our pulse beating; they make the very heart to dance. They carried many of us into spiritual liberty. We would teach them to our children; and to belittle them is like speaking ill of the homestead where we spent our childhood, or like a sneer at the mother that loved us. The Songs of our Fathers may not now be the ordinary instruments of our work and worship, but they are precious heirlooms with which we are unwilling to part.

For these hymns to have made such a deep impression upon our age and done such magnificent service, they must have had solid qualities worthy of our remembrance and esteem. Let us look at one or two of these.

THEY WERE HYMNS FOR ALL. As a rule, the air is one which simple folk can pick up. Our fathers never left room for mere professional skill. In their eye the service of song belonged to the congregation, and not merely to the choir. My friends about me will not misunderstand my meaning. I esteem their department one of the most important in the Church; and more than once or twice I have been helped by the way in which great hymns have been rendered. But I beseech of choirs that they should lead the people and not go away from them. Now and again we want an anthem; for it is song-service in its highest and most elaborate form. But do give us new tunes by degrees. Only a few days ago I was in a church where the choir will persist in singing the tune set for the hymn, known or not; and some dear folk said to me: "Oh, Mr. Guttery, get us some tunes we can sing!" and you may depend upon it, I did so. Our fathers would have all the people join in praise.

THEIR HYMNS WERE DENOMINATIONAL. They were Primitive Methodist hymns, and everybody knew it. I know this may be carried to an excess, and often was; but I wish we had a little more of this denominational loyalty. We never know how to love other Churches well till we have learned to love our own best. There is a spurious kind of tolerance that is very popular in these days. It is in earnest about nothing; is easy in its convictions; as far as it is concerned nothing matters very much. Such a spirit is never strenuous for service or valiant for battle. Imagine my being as fond of every house in our Avenue as I am of my own home, you would think such a flabbiness of affection did me little credit, and you would be right. Young folk, be intensely true to the Church of your spiritual birth; reverence it as the home of your best life; give it your labour as well as your love; guard its honour as you would your own life.

THEIR HYMNS WERE DOCTRINAL. Many of them were really the dogmas in which our fathers believed set to verse. Sin, the New Birth, the Witness of the Spirit, Judgment, Penalty and Heaven: all these can be found in the hymns our fathers sung. Father, Son, and Spirit; each and all were worshipped. I know that in many circles there is a revolt against doctrine; why, I never can see. Doctrine is simply orderly thinking seeking expression. You have it in science; you welcome it in art; and why it should be odious in religion, where it is most needed, I leave to modern wiseacres to tell us. Many of the doctrinal statements may have been crude and faulty; and no wonder, when you remember the men our fathers were, and the pit from which they were digged. At the same time they declared unfalteringly the great essentials of that supreme Gospel which alone can lift our world into unison with the Divine will. These hymns, evangelical to the core, are a splendid bulwark of Protestantism.

They may be too individualistic, and often are, but they contain a compendium of truth that we must never allow to be frittered away.

The longer I live, and the more I know of the solemnities of preaching, the more I am convinced that we need to make both our message and our music of our supreme central truth:—"Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."

Everyone will have noticed that these hymns were the OUTPOURING OF EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION. The intensest note is that of personal consciousness. What they had seen and felt they published to the sons of men; and in this they were true to the genius of Methodism; for the genius of Methodism is personal Christian testimony. The most distinctive of all Methodist services is the experience meeting. I regret, and regret deeply, that it has so largely fallen into abeyance, and I say here solemnly, that one of the finest things that could happen to this Church, or any other Methodist Church, would be a revival of the art and liberty of testimony. The old-time preaching was full of it. Men who knew little of books, little history, theology, or philosophy, could tell the story of their conversion. It was common advice to young men, "When you stick fast, tell your experience;" and thousands of men and women who could scoff at the argument, and ignore the appeal, were melted and conquered by the personal testimony. We want more of this spirit. It may not be so clever, but it is more effective, because it brings heart to heart, and quick to quick, and it is only when we come into real and vital touch that we can bless each other.

THE HYMNS WERE FULL OF MIGHTY FAITH, and faith as distinct from the mere acceptance of doctrine; they knew no whispered fears or treacherous doubt; they were full of immovable confidence in Christ as mighty to save, and His blood as a never-failing fountain of cleansing. They never dreaded the waning of the Gospel, or wavering of the Cross. They felt sure the stars in their courses fought for them, for God was above the stars and guided them. In their confidence they shook the nation; in that same faith we must save the England of to-day.

I plead, then, for a revival of song. I do not ask that we should go back to the hymns of our fathers; could they speak here, they would not wish us to be bound to the songs they sung. But I do desire that we may possess their spirit, their faith, their passion for souls, and their delight in service. Then glorious as were the victories they gained, our morrows shall be more glorious still, till they break into the universal acclaim:—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honour and glory and blessing." Amen.

Bible Emblems.

III.—THE SYMBOLISM OF LIGHT.

LIGHT is a sacred symbol—an emblem of the greatest Personality in the universe, for "God is Light." The Apostle John could select no fact of nature so fitting as Light to illustrate his idea of God. Light is universal, illuminative, penetrating, revealing, life-giving. "It brims the Western prairies, smiles on eternal snows, steals through the cranks of the gipsy's tent; difficult to shut out; easy to let in." Such is John's picture of the "beautiful God."

The source of light is in itself a wondrous paradox. So mighty, so gentle! So far away, so near! A raging fiery sea, whose disc is the birthplace of light, yet how silent its action! Morning by morning God's great mercy of sunrise steals upon a darkened world; its light has a force that has carried its pilgrim-beams across gulfs of space that the imagination staggers in trying to conceive, yet falls so gently that it does not move the petals of the sleeping flowers, or hurt the lids of an infant's eyes. But the sunshine that falls round us in the day does not exhaust the possibilities of light. The sun is a wonderful economist; it stores up its fertile beams in the cellars of our coal strata, for coal is but bottled sunshine. For thousands of years the light of the sun was absorbed by plants and condensed into carbon (coal); after long ages that latent light was liberated and made to work for great human purposes. We are indebted to sunlight for our light by night, as well as by day; for warmth within doors as well as without. Coal is but invested sunlight; it was warehoused ages ago, and only re-issued when man began his occupation of this planet.

The drift, however, of our thought to-day is not so much with the treasured sunlight that lies latent in the capacious cellars of the earth, but with the sunlight that rules the day,—the King whose smile brings gladness on each returning morn.

How impartial is his sway! The sunlight is not selective; is never limited in its range of operations; has no choice of locality; is not geographical, but universal. It throws itself upon the crest of the mountain, and the mist gathers like a fleecy carpet at its feet; it penetrates into the gloomiest gorge in the wildest glen. It shines equally upon humble hut and bannered tower. It forces a way and struggles through dirt and squalor in our city alleys to give a glimpse of heaven to the poor; it shines through the prisoner's one-paned window; it distributes its blessings to wayside weed and exquisite orchid alike. The sun makes no distinction. It is not botanical at all. "I cannot teach it anything," says Beecher; "if I say to the sun, 'This is not the old-fashioned single zinnia,' the sun says, 'Single zinnia and double zinnia, take as much as you want.'" The sun that pours its rays through the trees, and bathes and nourishes the mighty oak, takes just as much pains with the meadow thistles, (old sinners though they are) as with the useful oak. The sun does not look upon highness any more than upon lowness; it goes diffusing itself through the air, and everything, whether it be butterfly or beetle, is shined upon. The lonely pine on the mountain top waves its sombre boughs, and cries, "Thou art my sun," and the little meadow violet lifts its cup of blue and whispers with its perfumed breath, "Thou art my sun." And the grain in a thousand fields rustles in the wind and makes answer, "Thou art my sun." So God is not for the favoured few, but for the universe of life, and there is no creature so poor or so lone that he may not look up with confidence, and say, "My Father, Thou art mine." What a significant emblem is the Light of Him "who maketh His sun to rise on the just and on the unjust!"

How abundant, too, is the Light!

No metre registers to you and me the measure of God's sunlight, but with abounding freeness it falls through every silent hour, belting the globe with its golden girdle, flashing from every ocean wave, distributing its commerce with liberal hand, over the wild wastes of Northern ice and snow, lighting up whole Continents with the light of its seeing eye, sending its noiseless traffic without delay, to the outlying South, the untrodden East, the populous West. Gather up, if you can, this immense outpour and treasure of sunlight that falls down through the bright hours and runs in liquid ether about the mountains, and fills all the plains, pouring over and filling every flower, shining down the sides of every grass-blade, resting in glorious humility upon the humblest things,—on stick and stone and pebble; on spider's web and sparrow's nest; that strikes radiant beams through the negro's tears, that puts gold upon the widow's weeds, that plates and roofs the city with burnished gold, and goes on in its wild abundance up and down the earth, shining everywhere and always, without faltering, without stint, without waste or diminution; as full, as fresh, as overflowing to-day as if it were the very first day of its out-play. If one might gather up this boundless, endless, infinite treasure to measure it, then might he tell the height and depth and unending glory of the "bountiful God."

God is Light; gentle, impartial, abundant in His glorious outflow.

And Christ is Light also. He said so once as He stood in the old Hebrew temple: "I am the Light of the world,"—specialised Light, focussed Light,—Light of the World. Instantly men thought of the sun and its mission. No image could be more abundant in its meaning. "The sun, however, has its significance only in the earth's possibilities. The sun is nothing without the world on which it shines, and whose character and glory it displays. When the sun rose this morning it found the world here. It did not make the world. What did it do? It found the world in darkness, torpid and heavy and asleep, with powers all wrapped up in sluggishness. The sun found this great sleeping world, and woke it. It bade it be itself. It quickened every slow and sluggish faculty. It called to the dull streams, and said, "Be quick;" to the dull birds, and bade them sing; to the dull fields, and made them grow; to the dull men, and bade them talk and think and work. It flashed electric invitation to the whole mass of sleeping powers, which really was the world, and summoned it to action. It did not make the world. It glorified, intensified, fulfilled the earth. In the light the earth is only truly itself. How beautiful a parable of Christ! He is a Christ of Light—a luminous Christ, yet all His glory is bound up with the possibilities of humanity. Christ rises on a soul. What happens? He finds the soul existent, having in it wonderful possibilities, and what He does for it is to quicken it through and through, to sound the bugle of its true life in its ears, to bid it be itself." Jesus glorifies humanity because He is the Light of the World—the world of men and women. It is not His matchless teaching that is to light the world. It is not ideas. It is He Himself; not what He taught, but what He is. It is His character, His personality that shines. "His life is the Light of men." When He moved amongst men His Light shone out amid the world's shadows. Blindness opened its long-sealed eyes; sunless hearts were thawed by His beams; the tainted air was sweetened by His breath. Sick men sat in the sunshine and were well again. Out of the world's dreary, sunless glens men crept into the Light of His presence and were "healed of their infirmities."

It is a scientific fact that natural sunlight has "healing in its beams." Absence of light means blanched faces, withered limbs, hopeless lives. The house-surgeon of a London hospital says that, "In one of the wards, which was very dark, simple fractures took seven to fourteen days longer in uniting than they would have done in a well-lighted ward." In France there are hospitals where they trust almost entirely to sunlight for the cure of disease. And in Scotland, where sunlight is supposed to be only an occasional visitor, the sun-bath has got beyond the region of experiment. In Peebles Hydropathic Establishment certain forms of disease are cured by no other agency than the potent, healing sunbeams. The baths are so arranged that every pore of the skin is an open gateway through which the sunbeams carry their message of health to the sick and sad. It is not diffused light—simple daylight—that is effectual in the cure of disease. It is focussed sunlight that carries healing to the wasted organs.

And so in the world of spiritual realities, those who are sick and wasted in soul need direct contact with the warm, vital rays of the "Sun of Righteousness."

It is not spiritual atmosphere that men need. It is direct gazing on the face of the Son of God. We must drink in the sunbeams; dwell constantly in the Light. Thus we come to the glorious truth that Christians also have the Light in them. God is Light: Christ is Light: Christians are Light. It is Christianised personality that shines—that and none other. "Ye are the light of the world. . . . Let your light shine," is the command of the Master. Not a phosphorescent gleam, not a periodical radiance, but a calm, uniform, steady light. This is the high calling of every Christian. He must shine. Christ gives the light: Christians supply the point of manifestation. Only as we dwell in the Light are we illumined. We are but common clay; but it is clay transfigured by the light of Christ's face. We have no original light, no grace, no beauty, save that which we receive from the shining of the face of our glorious Lord. It is our high privilege to dwell continuously in the Light. "A glance at Christ's luminous face may save a man, but it requires a steady gaze to perfect a man."

The sunlight of a single day brings forth nothing. There are days of sunshine in winter—but nothing grows. The light does not enter in, it only shines upon the earth. It is only when the sun returns from its equatorial pilgrimage and enters into the earth and abides within it that life is awakened. The earth knows his coming and welcomes him; then the sun abides in the earth, filling it with warmth, and afterwards comes life and growth and beauty. It is a grand thing for a human soul to have a single bright flash from the face of God; it is grander still, and more effective, to dwell in the Light. A Christian is to bear much fruit. This he cannot do unless he abides in summer. For mere relief, even a casual visit of God's grace is potential. But for fruit, much fruit, and ripened fruit, nothing will suffice but the whole summer's sun. "We all, with open face, beholding as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." Perfection of life is all a question of gazing, of beholding. "I am sorry to believe that our nineteenth-century Christianity, with its bloodshot eyes, and its fevered pulse, has lost the art of contemplation. We need to re-learn it. We need to come into God's presence, and say, 'Lord, I come not to-day to ask; I come not to-day to give; I come simply to look upon Thy face, to gaze into Thy glorified countenance, if perchance I may be permitted to catch and reproduce some of the lineaments of Thy face.' The light of God must sink into us, not as the sunlight falling on some lonely hillside, lighting up the grey stones with a passing gleam that changes nothing and fades away; but as it shines on some cloud, cradled near its setting, which it drenches and saturates with fire till its cold heart burns and all its wreaths of vapour are brightness palpable. So must we have the glory sunk into us before it can be reflected from us.

It is told of St. Columba that on one occasion while living in a rude stone hut on an island near Mull, he was raised into a rapt, ecstatic state, and for three days and nights he neither ate nor drank, nor suffered anyone to approach him. The hut was filled with heavenly light, and through the chinks of the door and walls, rays of surpassing brightness were seen to issue during the night. This luminous appearance of the great saint was, no doubt, greatly exaggerated by superstition, but there was in all probability an element of truth in it. Prolonged gazing upon God raises the spiritual life

"IT SHOWS ITSELF UPON THE CREST OF THE MOUNTAIN."

the flesh the spirit shines—but one day when the flesh is dropped and left behind, the light will shine more clearly still in the land that never knew a night. In that fair land no sunlight shines but only spiritualised character. "The face of the Lamb" is the light of God's new city; that is heaven's only illuminant.

"O'er all these wide extended plains,
Shines one Eternal day.
There God the Son for ever reigns
And scatters night away."

"Across that bright land there never comes a darkening cloud. No thunder disturbs the peace of its inhabitants. No lightning ever flashes along its to such a pitch of rapture that it glows and shines in the face. When Moses shuts off all side-lights and gazes steadily upon God's glory for forty days—then his face shines. When Stephen looks steadfastly up into heaven—then his face is as an angel's. Illuminated personality is no uncommon experience among men and women who constantly dwell in the Eternal Light. Through the veil of skies. There is no night there." Where? There in the foreground of life, not very far off from any of us, from some of us a little day's journey. A few more breezes shall fill our sails, and we shall enter the haven. A few more nights shall fold us in their restful bosom, and then, farewell night and weariness and darkness for ever. A little day's journey! What matters the roughness, the toil, the loneliness, the failing scrip, the broken staff, the fading sight, the muffled hearing? A few more steps through the darkness, and Home! And home yonder is a land all light and perfect felicity. No restless nights, no anxious days, no vacant chairs, no dead lamb in the fold, no open graves into which to drop hot, bitter tears.

"In that blessed land, neither sighing nor anguish,
Can breathe in the fields where the glorified roam;
No sickness can reach them, that Country is healthy,
Oh, say, Will you go to the Eden above?"

This is our portion. It is no poet's dream, but a Saviour's promise. It is the inheritance of the saints in light.

"No night shall be in heaven! no gathering gloom Shall o'er that glorious landscape ever come;
No tears shall fall in sadness o'er those flowers,
That breathe their fragrance through celestial bowers.

No night shall be in heaven! but endless noon;
No fast declining sun, nor waning moon;
But there the Lamb shall yield perpetual light,
'Mid pastures green, and waters ever bright."

ALFRED J. CAMPBELL.

The Shelf of Honour ;

OR, BOOKS THAT HAVE MOVED ME.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH RITSON, AUTHOR OF "LOST AND WON," ETC.

"LOCHINVAR."

THE author of "The Lilac Sunbonnet" and other works too numerous to mention has come in for his full share of "slating" at the hands of the critics. In some quarters, indeed, there has been something very like a dead set against him. I remember reading an article on one of his books in the "Saturday Review," of the good old-fashioned sort, in which the writer managed to crowd an astonishing number of spiteful things into a column or so of criticism—if criticism it could be called. A certain class of critics have done their level best to write down this particular member of the "Kailyard school," as they contemptuously term it; but they have ignominiously failed. Mr. Crockett pours out his books at a bewildering rate; it is difficult, indeed, to keep pace with them. And yet his sales are enough to make his enemies grow green with envy.

Since the appearance in these pages of the article on "The Lilac Sunbonnet," Mr. Crockett has produced some of his finest work. Indeed, more than one of these books has been spoken of as his best. He has broken new ground in several cases, and although his works are not all of equal merit, they, nevertheless, maintain an astonishingly high level of excellence. Verily, a man needs to rise with the sun, as is Mr. Crockett's wont, to do so much work, and to do it so well. In fact, I sometimes feel as though I owed him a grudge. He is one of the few writers of whose works I do not care to miss anything. But it is not easy for a busy man to keep up with him, and when I find his new books accumulating, I feel very much like what is called in another connection, "overfaced." That, however, is not quite a fair description of the situation; for, after all, the arrears in this case are of the nature of a reserve of good things against the time to come.

Let me say here, I am not in the least disposed to admit that big sales, steadily maintained, are to be accepted as a refutation of the indictment of the critics. The critics are right sometimes, and the public wrong. There is one author who has all along been at war with the reviewers, so much so that she has ceased to send them her books; and yet her books have an immense sale. Well, in that case I am heartily on the side of the reviewers, and have no sort of doubt in my own mind as to what will be the verdict of posterity. But most of the reviewers side with the general public in their estimate of Mr. Crockett. Had it been otherwise, however, I should still have maintained that his works have in them not a few of the qualities which make for endurance. The root of the matter is there. And then I like them. What more is there to be said?

There are many reasons why Scotland should be proud of Mr. Crockett. He has won a distinguished place in the literary world. If not the greatest, he is certainly the most prolific Scottish writer of his time. He is one of a famous trio who have shed a splendid halo over the humble religious life of their native land, and carried the fame of the simple grandeur of the Scottish peasantry to the ends of the earth. But in nothing has Scotland so much reason for pride in Mr. Crockett as this, that he has reproduced with unrivalled insight and fidelity, one of the grandest periods of Scottish history—the period of the Covenanters. Unrivalled, I say advisedly: for although it can never be forgotten that "Old Mortality" is one of Scott's masterpieces, and presents a picture of the Covenanters never to be surpassed, either in its humour or the force of its genius, it is undeniable that in some respects the picture is exaggerated and unjust. In "The Men of the Mosshags," and its successors, the Covenanters have at last come to their own, so far as fiction, at any rate, is concerned; and that, after all, in these later days, has more to do with the formation of the estimate of the great bulk of the people on many questions than a sober and matter-of-fact work of history.

"Lochinvar" must rank as the most brilliant and successful of the successors of the "Men of the Mosshags." The hero and heroine of the earlier work reappear in these pages, and Will Gordon and Maisie, his wife, play an interesting, though, of course, subordinate part in the stirring events here recorded. The book deals with a section of the Covenanters with whose life we have hitherto had little acquaintance. When the novelist or the historian has told us that one of his characters has managed to make his escape to the Low Countries, he does not deem it necessary to follow his fortunes further. The hunted Covenanter has gained a land where he is henceforth safe from the malignant foes who have so long dogged his steps. But we cannot help wondering how it fared with those escaped children of the Covenant. We long for something more than the mere glimpse of their life in the land which has given them sanctuary than is afforded by the passing allusions of the historian.

This desire is gratified in "Lochinvar." In the closing pages of "The Men of the Mosshags" we are told of the escape of the hero and heroine to Holland; here we behold them in the land of their exile and sanctuary. We renew our acquaintance with that very pretty fighter, John Scarlett, and gain a general knowledge of the life of the Scottish refugees. The tale opens at the house of Balmaghie, in the year of grace 1685. Here Wat Gordon, of Lochinvar, was hiding from the persecutors, and acting as under-gardener. He was suspected both in the matter of the wounding of my Lord of Wellwood, and of accompanying and intercommuning with the wild Whigs of the hills, as the Covenanters were called. The young laird of Lochinvar was therefore in ill-odour with the king's Government. But while Balmaghie possessed superior advantages as a hiding-place, it had other and quite as powerful attractions. We are told that the sweeping, darksome under-curve of Kate M'Ghie's eyelashes, and the little specks of light which swam and sparkled in the depths of her hazel eyes had not a little to do with the place of young Lochinvar's refuge. And yet it must not be inferred that Wat Gordon was either very deeply or very seriously in love, nor yet that he was an out-and-out thoroughgoing Covenanter. He was one of a considerable class, who from the force of circumstances rather than from conviction, were led to throw in their lot with the Covenanters. And Kate M'Ghie, knowing him for what he was, and being (unlike her father, but like most of the women-folk of Scotland), a sympathiser with the oppressed of the Covenant, showed no small kindness to the under-gardener.

Kate is very prettily drawn as she was in these days before the dawn of love. At this period she is not committed either to young Lochinvar or the Covenanters. It is true that Wat had a gift of love-making that might have "wiled a bird off a tree," but with Kate he wiled in vain. She was the reigning beauty of the country-side, and though she might think well enough of Wat Gordon as a handsome exile from his heritages and lordships, now in picturesque hiding as her father's under-gardener, she was, in her own estimation, at least, in no danger of permitting that liking to develop into any feeling more dangerous or more exacting.

Lochinvar is an equally interesting figure in these early days. Tall, lithe, and handsome, he is accomplished in many things besides the pruning of roses. The art of fencing he had acquired under the tutorship of John Scarlett, the most renowned master of the time, and now he was busily engaged in another kind of fencing destined to bring him face to face with dangers from which he could only extricate himself by the use of the sword he had learned to use so well. "So these two fenced, each of them in their own way, right gallantly with light-some love; while the love that is not lightsome, but strong as death, smiled out upon them from behind the rose-bushes, and lay in wait for one and the other."

But it was not in Balmaghie that love found them. A serpent crept into this earthly paradise, and with its wonted cunning, managed to separate the young people. Before they met again many things had happened. Scotland had passed through the terrible days of the "killing time," and the hour of her deliverance was drawing nigh. The Stuarts had filled up the measure of their iniquity, and William of Orange was waiting for the summons to deliver the people of these realms from the hand of the oppressor. It was in the month of April, 1688, at the Dutch city of Amersfort, that our hero and heroine met once more. Walter Gordon was now a private in the Prince of Orange's Douglas regiment of dragoons. His cousin Will and Maisie Lennox were resident in the same place, and in their lodgings one evening he found his old friend Kate M'Ghie. The vision on which his eyes rested as he entered the room was to him, at any rate, a startling one. Kate was now a woman grown.

"Slender and supple she was as willow that sways by the water-edges, yet returning ever to slim, graceful erectness, like a tempered blade of Damascus; above, the finest and daintiest head in the world, profiled like Apollo of the bow, with great eyes that were full of alternate darkness and tenderness, of tears and fire; a perfectly chiselled mouth, a thing which is rarer and more excellent than the utmost beauty of eyes—and sweeter also; a complexion, not milk and rose like that of Maisie Lennox, but of ivory rather, with the dusky crimson of warm blood blushing up delicately through it."

The meeting was somewhat constrained and awkward, but with that first glimpse of Kate poor

Wat passed from the safe heights of admiration into the bottomless abysses of love. Ere yet he had fully realised what had happened, he found himself dispatched on a dangerous mission. Already the young Scotsman had an enemy who had planned his destruction. The story of the night's adventure is a stirring one, and is told in Mr. Crockett's best style; and although Wat came out of it safely, he made the unwelcome discovery that this deadly enemy was one of his own countrymen. This man was Murdo, Lord of Barra and the Small Isles. He played a deep game, for while holding an important position under the Prince of Orange, he was engaged in various intrigues with the King of France. By his order Walter Gordon was required to compile a true numeration of each regiment in the camp and city of Amersfort, and to transmit the lists with his own hand to an officer appointed by the Prince of Orange to receive them. This was to be done at the inn of Brederode, which was situated some distance from the city. Arrived there, Lochinvar discovered he was in a trap. Indeed, on the way he found that the escort that had been provided for him was of the most villainous kind, mere cut-throats in the pay of Barra. The person appointed to receive the lists was an emissary of the French king, and the whole thing had been planned to ensure young Gordon's destruction. Two things served to frustrate this design: Walter Gordon's wariness and skill, and the fact that the French king's agent was none other than Lochinvar's old friend and tutor John Scarlett, the most renowned swordsman in Europe. In the duel which had to decide the issue, the pupil conquered the master, and Wat returned in safety to the city, accompanied by his old friend, who forthwith abandoned the service of the French king for that of his Highness of Orange.

Barra, of course, disowned the order issued in his name for the compiling of the lists. This did not clear him from complicity in the affair in Gordon's estimation; for it was the sound of that worthy's peculiar laugh which had nerved Lochinvar at a critical stage of the duel with John Scarlett. But the Lord of Barra set himself to secure Gordon's removal by other means, and he found an additional ground of dislike on the score of rivalry. Having conceived a violent passion for Kate M'Ghie, he managed to get young Lochinvar thrown into prison, and then procured the abduction of the fair maid of his desire. But now retribution for one of his sins came upon him. He was checkmated, though not defeated, by the little Marie, one of the most charming creations of the book. Her misfortunes, her delightful naivete, her sweetness and tenderness and dog-like faithfulness render her a singularly interesting and pathetic figure; and while one could have wished that she should have escaped with the friends she had served so well, we feel that her end is as fitting and inevitable as it is pathetic.

Kate M'Ghie is carried off by Barra's orders to his island of Suliscanna. Had the Lords of Barra and the Small Isles not won their brides by this summary method for five hundred years? He himself was detained by the wound which the little Marie had inflicted upon him, partly in revenge for her own great wrongs, but chiefly because he was the enemy of the man who had shown her kindness, and all unwittingly won her heart. How Walter Gordon managed to follow the girl he loved, till at last he and his friend John Scarlett were wrecked off the treacherous coast of Suliscanna, is too long a story to be told here. The people of the island were only half-civilised, and the abject slaves of Barra. There was no boat on the island, and the captive maid was to be kept in safety till Barra came to make her his wife. Here is a situation of extraordinary difficulty, and how young Lochinvar, after being wrecked, won his way to the island and met his love at last, and, after rescuing her from the clutches of Barra, lost her once more, is a narrative of thrilling interest. It is said that many waters will not quench love, and verily Lochinvar illustrated the truth of the saying. But he braved the perils of the deep, and the worse perils of the treacherous currents around Suliscanna; and yet when success seemed within his reach he fell once more into the hands of his hated enemy.

Cast among the wild Highlanders, our hero found himself ere long fighting under the banner of King James at Killiecrankie. The victory won by the dauntless Claverhouse did not stay the victorious progress of the Prince of Orange, and now that Walter Gordon is in the wrong camp we despair of his ever winning the woman he loves. But the reader's extremity is Mr. Crockett's opportunity, and the skill and ingenuity he displays in extricating his hero and heroine from the labyrinth of difficulties in which they are involved excites our warmest admiration. Towards the end we imagine nothing can save Kate from the clutches of Barra. The wedding-day has arrived, and the guests assembled. But at the fateful moment Lochinvar appears upon the scene and carries off his love from under the very nose of the enemy. It is a wild ride to York, where the Prince of Orange is staying at this time, and right up to the end we do not know how things will go. But the hero triumphs, and the Lord of Barra and the Small Isles is covered with disgrace.

"Lochinvar" scarcely ranks with the very best of its author's works. It has not the freshness and charm of "The Lilac Sunbonnet," but is a good second to that exquisite romance; nor does it equal in tragic force such stories as "The Gray Man," "The Red Axe," or "The Black Douglas;" and it lacks the breadth and insight as a Covenanted tale of "The Men of the Mosshags;" but it has a charm and power all its own, and well deserves a place in that splendid library of fiction Mr. Crockett has given us on the Covenanted period. That period he has now pretty fully covered, and even the one immediately succeeding it, and the chaplet he has thus laid on the graves of the heroes and heroines of the Covenant is worthy of the brave men and women who so freely laid down their lives at the behest of conscience and in their country's cause.

ST. HELEN'S PRIORY.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

IX.—THE OLD JEWRY PRESBYTERIAN MEETING-HOUSE.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

AT the Poultry, extreme of crowded Cheapside, and contiguous to the Bank of England, is the insignificant street known as the Old Jewry, which, in the days of the Norman kings, was the Ghetto, or the favourite quarters of the Jews. In this Jewish colony the sons of Abraham built the first synagogue that was erected in Great of £2,000. King John made a levy on the Jews of sixty-six thousand marks, and cruelly blinded, tortured, and imprisoned those who refused to pay. In the reign of Richard I., eighty-six of the wealthiest of the London Jews were hanged under the mere pretext of having crucified a Christian child. The Barons encouraged a riot, in which five hundred Jews were cruelly massacred, and their synagogue was burnt. In the year 1290, Edward I. expelled some sixteen thousand Jews from the English realm and confiscated their wealth, which amounted to over £420,000.

In this ancient street, with its memories of Jewish massacres and the shedding of innocent blood, a Baptist Chapel was erected in early Puritan times, and the congregation was favoured with the ministrations of the Rev. Jeremiah Ives. Not a vestige of the building remains. In the year 1701, a substantial Presbyterian Chapel was erected in Meeting-house Court, which was half-hidden from the main thoroughfare. At the time of its erection it was the largest and the most influential Presby-

Britain; it was succeeded by many others, of which Great Portland Street is the central. During the reign of William the Conqueror a number of wealthy Jews who had migrated from Rouen settled in the city. The persecution of the Jews in England began with Stephen, who demanded from them a fine terian Meeting-House in England. It comprised an area of two thousand six hundred feet, and was furnished with three galleries, which were some five or six pews in depth. It is said to have had an imposing exterior, for it was lighted with two large central "bow-windows, one above the other, and four smaller ones on either side."

The Church which worshipped at the Old Jewry Meeting-house was founded in 1662 by Rev. Edmund Calamy, who had been ejected from his living at Moreton, in Essex. He came to London and commenced preaching to a faithful few who assembled in his house in Aldermanbury. After the proclamation of Charles II., he gathered a congregation of Nonconformists at Leathersellers' Hall, which adjoined St. Helen's Priory, and was the priory house of Benedictine nuns. In 1692 the congregation removed to Jewin Street, and nine years later, to their newly-erected chapel in Meeting House Court. During the eighteenth century several divines of more than average ability, who gained national repute for their varied gifts and graces, ministered and lectured on Divine themes to the Old Jewry congregation.

Calamy, the founder of the Old Jewry Church, belonged to a distinguished family whose doings are largely interwoven with Puritan history. His father, Edmund Calamy, was born in London in 1600. He was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and became domestic chaplain to Felton, Bishop of Ely. He vacated his lectureship at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, because he refused to subscribe to the obnoxious teachings of "The Book of Sports." In 1639 he became minister of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, in the city of London. It was his custom to devote sixteen hours a day to study, and he consequently became one of the most celebrated preachers in the Metropolis. As an evidence of his popularity it may be stated that his week-day lectures were largely attended by aristocratic families, and it was no uncommon occurrence for there to be sixty carriages in waiting upon the worshippers at the church-gates. His services were acknowledged by his becoming a Royal Chaplain. The Bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield was also offered to him, but this high Church distinction he respectfully refused. He was ejected in 1662, and five years later he died broken-hearted. The sight of the smoking ruins of the great fire of London, with its destruction of property and the poverty it entailed upon the suffering inhabitants, made a deep impression upon his mind, and hastened his untimely death.

Two of his sons were clergymen—Dr. Benjamin Calamy, who became a Prebendary of St. Paul's, and Edmund Calamy of the Old Jewry congregation, whose son, Edmund Calamy, after completing his studies became a minister of considerable renown in the city of London. In recognition of his learning the Universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen conferred a Divinity degree on him. He was the author of over forty distinct works, his best-known being "The Nonconformists' Memorial," which gives a brief biography of over two thousand of the ejected ministers of "Black Bartholomew" fame.

Edmund Calamy, the pastor of the Old Jewry Church, had a genial nature, and was greatly beloved by his congregation. In doctrinal matters he followed the Puritan teachings of his father. Continually was he watched by the enemies of Nonconformity, and on several occasions narrowly escaped imprisonment. He was a devoted student, and his close application to his books undermined his health, and proved "a weariness of the flesh." He died of consumption when only fifty years of age.

Calamy's successor was Samuel Borfet, who was the ejected minister of High Laver, Essex. His enfeebled health was followed by periodical fits of mental depression. In the later years of his life his nervous debility caused him to relinquish all pulpit and pastoral duties.

In 1691, the Rev. John Shower, a preacher of great power, and who had a remarkable career, entered upon the duties of the pastorate. He was born at Exeter in 1657. His father died when he was only four years of age, and left his widow and family in affluent circumstances. His mother had him educated with a view to his becoming a minister. In his youthhood the family removed from Devon to Stoke Newington, where they shared the friendship of Dr. Manton, who encouraged the promising student in his early attempts at preaching. In his teens he ministered to a congregation which met in a room at a coffee-shop in Change Alley; and when he was twenty-two years of age he became the assistant, or co-pastor, of Vincent Alsop at Westminster.

In those days, when foreign travel was a much more serious business than it is now, he, in company with a gentleman, made a tour through the countries of Europe. They visited Rome, and because they declined to kiss the Pope's slipper, and refused to kneel at the elevation of the host, they exposed themselves to dangerous consequences. He made himself thoroughly acquainted with the moral and social condition of the Roman Catholic and other countries that he visited. For some time he was lecturer to the English churches at Utrecht and at Rotterdam. Upon his return to London in 1690, he became the co-pastor of the celebrated John Howe, at the Silver Street Nonconformist meeting. After labouring for twelve months, he was invited to be the successor of Samuel Borfet. The Nonconformists of the city strongly maintained that no congregation ought to claim exclusively the ministry of two such noted divines as Howe and Shower. He accepted the pastorate of the Church worshipping at Leathersellers' Hall. Under his powerful ministry the congregation rapidly increased, and the Church removed to Jewin Street Chapel, and ultimately to the new meeting-house in the Old Jewry, where he ministered with increasing popularity until his death in the year 1715. Like other Puritan preachers he was a writer of some literary repute. He was the author of over twenty distinct publications, which include works of divinity, philosophy and biography.

John Dunton, the brother-in-law of Samuel Wesley, the eccentric Nonconformist bookseller of the Poultry, was a worshipper at the Old Jewry Meeting-house, and a warm admirer of Shower's preaching. He has described him as being "a popular preacher, with a small shrill voice, and noted for his funeral sermons." Dunton, in his "Dissenting Doctors," says:—

"Shower— thy name and nature both agree,
For both, (yes both,) refreshing showers be—
You're Chrysostom, let down from beams on high,
You preach like him, charm with his orat'ry:
So moving are your sermons, that 'tis clear,
You've brought the rhetoric of angels here;
So pious in your life, meek in your place,
We think you brought up in the schools of grace—
Your pulpit's fragrant, for you preach in flowers,
And when the hearer's truly blest it—showers.
Showers, indeed I for both thy tongue and pen,
Have often made our graces spring again."

From 1691 until 1708, the Rev. Timothy Rogers, M.A., was the assistant minister at the Old Jewry Chapel. He was characterised by a thoroughly catholic and Christian spirit, and was "a man of great vivacity, wit, and mental vigour." He was the son of the ejected minister of Croglin, in Cumberland, respecting whom the following interesting incident is related. Mr. Rogers and his followers were brought before Sir Richard Cradock, who was a High Churchman and a magistrate. Having found them guilty, he was about to send them to prison, when the grand-daughter of the Justice of the Peace, who was an intelligent child of seven summers, and pitied the old minister, threatened to drown herself if the preacher and his parishioners were punished. The old minister pronounced a fatherly blessing upon the little girl. They parted, and some years afterwards the child, who had grown to womanhood, and now resident in London, had a dream, in which she saw a certain chapel and heard a minister preach from a particular text. It made a deep impression upon her mind; and the next day she worshipped at the Old Jewry, where she at once recognised Mr. Shower as the preacher whom she had seen in her dream. The lady related the incidents to the son of Mr. Rogers, who as a result became a Nonconformist, and eventually a preacher of the Gospel. Rogers first preached to the congregation at Crosby Hall, and there gained some celebrity. Like many other Nonconformist preachers of the Puritan period, he was a hypochon-driac, and his pulpit usefulness at the Old Jewry was overshadowed with the strange gloom of a supernatural horror. He was accustomed to speak of himself as "a broken vessel, a dead man out of mind." His publications include a voluminous funeral sermon of some three hundred pages, which was preached in memory of Mrs. Dunton, wife of the London bookseller, who was a daughter of Dr. Annesley, and sister to the mother of the Wesleys. He also issued a work, entitled, "Fall Not Out by the Way; or a Persuasion to a Friendly Correspondence between the Conformists and Nonconformists," in which he says: "The way to agreement of all parties is not to bring men to be of one opinion, but of one mind; which we may be, not by thinking the same things, but by thinking well one of another, endeavouring to preserve charity as carefully as to preserve truth. Carnal zeal may put us on disputing, but true zeal will put us upon prayer. For my part, I had rather be a quiet ploughman than a fiery philosopher."

The Rev. Simon Broune, a native of Shepton Mallet, succeeded John Shower, and for seven years faithfully ministered to the congregation. He began to preach early in life, and had established his reputation as a forceful preacher of the Gospel while resident at Portsmouth. After the loss of his wife and son he suffered from a severe mental hallucination. He believed that Providence had gradually extracted his spirit from the body. "He supposed himself to be beholding creation with the gaze of an animal, and in speech to resemble a parrot." He retired from his pastorate, discontinued all religious exercises, and urged his friends not to pray on his behalf, as he was no longer a moral agent. According to the testimony of Dr. Ashworth, of Daventry, this extraordinary delusion was caused by a singular adventure which took place on the highway. As he was travelling in company with a friend, a roadside robber, who carried fire-arms, demanded "their money or their life." Mr. Broune in self-defence sprang upon the highwayman, and in the struggle both fell to the ground. Broune held the man in an iron-like grip until his companion fetched assistance. When Broune released his hand from the offender's throat, he discovered, to his great surprise, that the man was dead. This sudden shock unbalanced his mind and dethroned his reason.

Broune returned to his native town, where he devoted himself to a course of study, and accomplished several prodigious mental feats. He wrote a volume of hymns, made translations from the classical writers, and compiled a spelling-book, a grammar, and a lexicon. He wrote "A Defence of the Religion of Nature and Christian Revelation," in reply to Woolston and the Freethinkers of the day. Although this literary curiosity is dedicated to Queen Caroline in a most singular manner as being "written by a thing incapable of thought, that was once a man," it was gladly welcomed by the scholars of the period as one of the best contributions to the silencing of the controversy which the infidelity of the times had originated. His incessant literary labours, and his refusal to take necessary out-door exercise, shortened his life. He died in 1732, in the fifty-second year of his age, and was buried in the chapel at Shepton Mallet.

Dr. Samuel Chandler, a celebrated author and divine, and the personal friend of Archbishop Secker, and of Bishop Butler, of "Analogy" fame, was another of the distinguished men connected with the old sanctuary. His career at the Old Jewry has been described as "a forty years' story of prosperity." As a pastor he was greatly esteemed by his people, and as a scholar he was admired by a wide circle of friends. Chandler preached a series of sermons on the evidences of Christianity, which he published in 1725 under the title of, "A Vindication of the Christian Religion." This volume secured him the recognition of the authorities of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Universities, who conferred upon him the diploma of D.D. This distinction he valued but slightly, "because so many blockheads have been made Doctors of Divinity." In Church of England circles, much regret was expressed that the writer of such an able exposition should be a Nonconformist, and overtures were made for him to enter the Established Church, which he persistently refused. Dr. Chandler preached a course of sermons at Salter's Hall, in which he exposed the falsities of the Papal system, and at the same time dealt some heavy blows at Anglicanism by powerfully showing how "a blind subjection to priestcraft was the soul and essence of Popery." He also held a public dispute with a Roman Catholic priest at "The Pope's Head" in Cornhill, and took part in a debate at a tavern in Nicholas' Lane on "The Papal System." "An Authentic Account" of these disputations was published which greatly enhanced the fame of Dr. Chandler. He died in 1766, in the seventy-third year of his age. One of his study Bibles interleaved with comments in his own handwriting, is sacredly kept at Dr. Williams' Library, London.

For some years Dr. Henry Miles, of Tooting, was co-pastor with Dr. Chandler. Although he had neither a strong constitution nor a loud voice, yet for over thirty years he regularly preached twice on the Sabbath. He was a diligent student, and frequently rose as early as two o'clock in the morning to commence his studies. He was widely read in the different branches of literature, and was elected a member of the Royal Society. His sermons were written out in full, and Dr. Furneaux declared that no other divine had left behind so many manuscripts.

Dr. Richard Price was another of Dr. Chandler's co-pastors, and subsequently he became Chaplain at Stoke Newington. It is said that Dr. Chandler was jealous of his colleague, for he told him "to be less energetic and more modest." In his later years, he unfortunately departed from the Evangelical faith, and accepted the teachings of Arianism. Dr. Price's first published ethical treatise gained him the friendship of Hume; and his lecture on "Civil Liberty" secured him the patronage of Franklin and Dr. Priestley. Burke denounced Price as a traitor, while at the same time, the Corporation of London presented him with a casket of gold containing the Freedom of the City. The Congress offered him his choice of positions of responsibility and honour, and the English Premier of the Parliament of 1782 invited him to become his secretary.

A Sunday evening lectureship was commenced at the Old Jewry in 1728, and for over twenty years it was sustained by Dr. James Foster, who was the son of a Northamptonshire clergyman. His congregation comprised all ranks and conditions of men. It is said that "the clergy, wits, and free-thinkers" crowded the chapel to listen to the eminent dissenting divine, of whom Pope had written:—

"Let modest Foster, if he will, excel Ten Metropolitans in preaching well."

Dr. Foster was the author of several works, including "A Defence of Revelation," which was a reply to Tindal's attack upon the Christian religion, as set forth in his "Attacks on Heresy." As chaplain, Foster attended Lord Kilmarnock to the scaffold when he was executed on Tower Hill for high treason. The unfortunate Scots nobleman was one of the three Scottish lords who took a prominent part in the cause of the Pretender, and headed the unlucky rebellion of 1745. It is said that the melancholy scene made such a deep impression upon him that it partially dethroned his reason, and that he never fully recovered.

Dr. Abraham Rees was the last pastor of the Old Jewry Meeting-house. He was the son of a celebrated Welsh Nonconformist, whose family claimed connection with one of the martyrs of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The fame of Dr. Rees is centred in his Encyclopædia, which took him twenty years to compile, and which was published in forty-five quarto volumes. During his ministry the congregation developed into a wealthy and influential one. Twice during his long and eventful life he was privileged to approach the throne and present congratulatory addresses to Royalty on behalf of the loyal Nonconformists. Dr. Rees was tall of stature, and possessed a fine open countenance, and a good voice. His extraordinary attainments secured him the friendship of many distinguished members of the learned profession, several of whom attended his funeral at Bunhill Fields in June, 1825.

The lease of the historic chapel expired in 1808. After fruitless attempts to renew it, a new chapel was erected in Jewin Street. The foundation-stone was laid by Dr. Rees, who also opened the new chapel in December, 1809.

Scotland and its "Covenants."

EW countries made so long and so heroic a struggle for religious liberty as Scotland, first in casting off the yoke of Romanism, and then resolutely and persistently rejecting Anglican episcopacy, covering a period of 140 years, and only completed when the last of the hated Stuarts fled from England in 1688. This long and good fight was characterised by the novel feature of "Covenants;" it was pre-eminently the struggle of the Covenanters, though the term "Covenanters" is only applied to those who fought and finally conquered English episcopacy, from 1637 to 1688. But as we shall see, there were Covenants before the Covenanters. In fact, there were seven Covenants, though two of them were so local as only to merit enumeration.

The First Covenant was drawn up and signed in 1558. It will be remembered that, in past ages, it was no uncommon thing for nobles to confederate and combine, and by written pledge to bind themselves to act jointly in a given enterprise, whether within or outside the law. They had ever been a grasping and unscrupulous race, and if the truth must be told, in this epoch of Reform, some of them were only Reformers for what they could get. Mary of Guise was Regent, a typical Frenchwoman and a Romanist to her finger-tips. The good seed of New Testament doctrine sown by Wishart and others, but chiefly by that master-sower, John Knox, had fallen into good ground. But the harvest was not yet. Knox, perceiving that the time was not ripe, left Scotland for Geneva in 1557. Without its leader the movement hung fire, but a stirring, if not a stinging letter, such as Knox could write, roused the reforming barons into action; they drew together and commenced the struggle. These united nobles were known as "the lords of the congregation." When their preachers, Willock and others, were "put to the horn,"—proclaimed as rebels—and summoned to "compeare" before the Court at Stirling to answer for their "heretical preaching," the lords of the congregation went with them, accompanied by 5,000 men. This so alarmed the Regent that she stayed proceedings against the objugated preachers. This was the period and the occasion of the First Covenant; the "common Godlie band," "subscribed" by "A. Erle of Argyle, Glencairn, Archibald Lord Lorn, John Erskine, of Dun," and others. It was a joint and several undertaking,—“a promise to God to be trewe and faithful to His holy Evangel, and to apply their whole power, substance, and very lives to maintain and set forward and establish the most blessed Word of God and His congregation; also, to make the cause of one the cause of all.” This very document has been fortunately preserved, and is to be seen in the Antiquarian Museum, Princes Street, Edinburgh. Of all the pacts made by Scottish nobles, this was the one most worthy of their rank and patriotism. Nor did they rest until they had brought John Knox to Scotland, and when he passed up Leith Walk, the hour had come and the man.

Passing over the second and third Covenants as being local and unimportant, we come to the Fourth, which was drawn up in 1560, and signed by all the patriotic nobles, the gentry and people. Its occasion was the presence of a French army holding the port of Leith. This was the first overt step in the Guisean scheme to make Scotland an "appanage" of France; to fill all the offices of State with Frenchmen; to get possession of the chief strongholds, and then proceed to stamp out the Reformation. With the Queen-mother in power, and a French force in possession of the principal seaport, the prize was within grasp. In a crisis like this the Covenant not only appealed to them on religious grounds, it appealed to their patriotism—the existence of the country was at stake. This roused the whole nation; all ranks and sorts of people flocked to Edinburgh to "ad-hibit" their names, and to offer their services in defence of the cause of freedom and independence. It is to be regretted that the original document has disappeared, though its contents are preserved in the pages of Knox and Calderwood. So strongly were the French entrenched in Leith that Scots troops could not dislodge them. In their extremity they looked to England for help, nor did they look in vain. As we are forbidden to look a gift-horse in the mouth, so we refrain from examining Queen Elizabeth's motives in the expedition she sent by Lord Grey to help the Scots. Even the combined forces of England and Scotland failed to drive the French from their stronghold, but they saw the impracticability, if not impossibility, of carrying out their little plan of subjugation, so they took to their ships and sailed away.

The Fifth Covenant takes us onward twenty-five years. John Knox had been for eight years in his grave, and King James was a youth of eighteen. A reactionary movement, known as the Counter Reformation, was in active operation throughout Europe. The Papacy set itself to recover its lost ground, which was done in France, South Germany, and the Netherlands. No wonder then that Scotland was invaded by swarms of secret Roman agents, who worked in disguise and in the dark, seeking to overthrow the Reformation; no one knew who or where they were; your friend, so affable and amiable, might be one; a feeling of mistrust and dread was abroad. With the king's consent, if not by his order, John Craig, Knox's successor in Edinburgh, drew up a Covenant, which was meant to be a "touchstone to discern Papists from Protestants." In one of his fits of reforming zeal, King James signed it, as did his household, but not his favourite minister, Lennox. The MS. may be seen in the library of the Parliament House, Edinburgh. This Covenant was largely signed, though it must be admitted that it evoked little enthusiasm.

But the Sixth was the Covenant par excellence, and is known as "the National Covenant;" it moved the nation to its heart. Previous Covenants had been directed against Popery, this one dealt a mortal blow against Scottish Prelacy. The luckless King Charles I. determined to compel Scotland to have a bench of bishops of his own making, as well as a full-blown episcopal service. A "Book of Canons," a semi-Popish liturgy, was prepared by Archbishop Laud for Scottish use. The inauguration was to be in St. Giles, July 23, 1637. The great church was crowded, not with worshippers, but people of all ranks, who "gloured and gloomed." Public indignation had been accumulating for several years, now it burst forth in a furious storm. The Dean of Edinburgh, arrayed in hoods and surplice, began the service, but he had no sooner begun than the historic Jenny Geddes, seized the stool she had taken to sit upon, (it was no uncommon thing for people to take their seats with them to Church), and hurled it at the Dean, crying out, "Fause loon, dost thou say thy mass at my vera lug!" It is impossible to describe the uproar which followed; Archbishop, Dean and clergy barely escaped with their lives. In this critical time this National Covenant was drawn up. It focussed as it expressed the nation's indignation and determination, while it formed a bond of union and an incentive to exertion. Who does not know the ever memorable event of the signing of this Covenant in the Greyfriars Churchyard on that February morning in 1638. Nobles, gentry, common people, flocked from Tweed to Tay, from Merse to Galloway, till the churchyard was choke-full. From a tombstone Warriston read out with loud voice the terms of the document, and the eloquent Alexander Henderson enforced its obligations; as he spoke the vast mass of people were moved as by a Divine breath. The Earl of Sutherland's name stands first; then noble after noble signed it, as did laird after laird, and the people, for it was a national movement. Some opened a vein and wrote their names with their own blood. Among the names we see that of the gallant Montrose, who five years after died on the scaffold, an enemy of the Covenanting cause; there, too, is the name of James Maitland, who afterwards, as Duke of Lauderdale, was the cruellest and fiercest enemy the Covenanters ever had.

The Seventh and last Covenant was the most historic of them all, inasmuch as it included England, and was a "Solemn League and Covenant" with England. When the Civil War broke out it was seen in Scotland that if the king were victorious he would withdraw every concession he had unwillingly made during the late struggle, and reimpose his prelatial apparatus; and, as at the beginning of the war the Parliamentary forces were defeated, the Scots agreed upon this League and Covenant to make common cause with the English, which League the English Commons, with "uplifted hands," swore in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, to observe and carry out. In virtue of this "Godlie Band," an army of 20,000 Scots, under General Leslie, marched over the border and helped to turn the tide on the field of Marston Moor. Copies of this famous document may be seen in the museums and libraries of England and Scotland.

We have said that this seventh Covenant was the last, but there was another, a counter Covenant, after that. A set of intriguers entered into a bond or Covenant in favour of the king. They discarded the old name of Covenant, and used the term "Engagement." They had become bitter foes of the Covenant, and were ardent Royalists; fighting for the king they had five years before so stoutly resisted. The chief among these recreant nobles was the famous Marquis of Montrose; then came the Marquis of Hamilton, a rich and influential man, Loudon, a gifted orator, Lauderdale, a man without justice or mercy, and Middleton, who was eager to harry and destroy the people he formerly worshipped with. Montrose led a raiding expedition northward, while the other branch of "Engagers" (whilom Covenanters) marched into England, but were met and effectually routed by Cromwell at the battle of Preston.

OMEGA.

Christ's Exhortation Against a Troubled Heart.

JOHN xiv. 1.—"Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in Me."

HOW many have had to thank God that this 14th chapter of St. John's gospel was ever written! It has brought consolation to innumerable hearts oppressed with sorrow. It has lighted up the dark valley for many a pilgrim, being one of the portions of Scripture most frequently read by the bedside of the dying. Originally spoken by the Lord Jesus to His apostles in an upper room at Jerusalem, it has seemed to tried and troubled men, in all times and places, as if it had been addressed to them in particular.

The word heart fills a great place in the language of Scripture, and in that of religion: we may say, too, in the speech of daily life. Commonly, its meaning is figurative; it stands for the emotional part of our nature. But in the text, when Jesus says, "Let not your heart be troubled," it is something more than a figure of speech. For the heart is not only a grand vital centre, and the chief worker in the physical system, where it serves as a skillfully constructed self-acting engine distributing the blood to every part, but it is the main point where we are made conscious of feeling. The thoughts of the mind have power to suffuse it with a glow of pleasure, or to strike it through with pain. Its action is interfered with by emotion so that it beats faster or slower than its normal rate. It is goaded into an unnatural pace, or it lags behind time, and labours as under a burden. If in the case of one who has suffered a great deal of trouble, and been very anxious under it, we could have an accurate estimate of the difference thereby made in the number of pulsations, and in their strength from what ought to have been, we should see that it is as sensitive to emotion as the barometer to bad weather. In a very literal sense, then, it is true that the heart may be troubled; and, of course, behind the troubled heart is a troubled mind.

I. CHRIST EXHORTS HIS DISCIPLES AGAINST A TROUBLED HEART.

The Greek word for troubled, which is used here—tarassestho—is one that writers often employed to describe the sea in a storm when the billows rolled high and the water was lashed into foam by fierce winds. Let not your heart be like that, the Saviour seems to say; let it not be agitated with fears, but let it be the abode of peace and rest.

We may remark how closely the wisdom of the world and the advice of Christ in this place agree together. If you were to talk with men who have seen a good deal of life, and have brought their common-sense to bear on what they have seen, they would tell you it was a bad thing to brood over troubles, to dwell very much on the dark side of things, and to be quite disheartened by disappointment. They would advise you whatever the future was going to bring, to go forth to meet it in a hopeful spirit, and not to despair when things were at the worst. Some of them would add, We used to brood and mope under tribulation, but we have given up all that, for we found it did no good, but rather made bad worse. So now we take things as they come, and make the best of them, and the rest we leave. This is the way we hear shrewd, observant people talk, whether they are religious or not, when they have grown impatient of idle griefs and fears.

We are startled, perhaps, when we notice the similarity between the conclusion drawn by the secular mind as the result of ordinary experience, and the direction of Christ to His disciples in this passage, "Let not your heart be troubled." We infer that Christianity is sanctified common-sense, and that it agrees with every good and healthy instinct which is operating in the world. But while this is the case, we see the precepts of Christianity to be backed by considerations and supported by influences which the world does not supply. We are emboldened to carry out Christ's directions first of all, by the confidence which we have in Him. We say He knew more than other men; He saw farther than the philosophers; He knew the dangers we are exposed to, and likewise the helps that are available, and if He tells us not to let our heart be troubled, it must be quite safe to dismiss our fears. But it is not merely good advice that He gives us: He also supplies us with power to follow it, a secret power that disposes us to trust and hope, and inclines us towards a quenchless optimism: He breathes on us His own Spirit as the Spirit of peace. In a mystic yet mighty manner He is with us amidst the conflicts of life to ensure to us the victory. In the course of this chapter He repeats this exhortation as if the thought which it contains was one of the leading ideas of His teaching, and He speaks of Peace as His dying bequest to those whom He is leaving behind. In the 27th verse, He says, "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

When He appeared to His disciples on the evening of the day on which He rose from the dead, His salutation to them was, "Peace be unto you." This was the usual form of salutation among the Jewish people when friends and acquaintances met, and so there again we find Him adopting a familiar form of speech that was very good and very beautiful, and utilising it for the expression of His loving regard towards His disciples, and His wishes for their welfare, of which peace was the chief element. But how much more the words meant on His lips than they meant when uttered in common friendly greetings! They were now pronounced by One who had died for them an atoning death; One who was actually an inhabitant of the spiritual world and knew its solemn secrets so impenetrably hidden from all living.

The sources of trouble in this world are endless. The Apostles had theirs in their day; and we in our day have ours. Each house is said to have a skeleton in the cupboard, and some houses have two or three. Every man's cup has some drops of an infusion of wormwood distilled into it. And, certainly, looking at the case of many people who sincerely strive to do what is right, the outlook is so dark for them it is hard to tell how they could help being troubled if their hearts are fashioned like ours. Nor did the Lord anticipate that any of His disciples would be wholly free from trouble. On more than one occasion He confessed that He was troubled Himself. "Now is My soul troubled, and what shall I say? Shall I say, Father, save Me from this hour? Nay, rather I will say, Father, glorify Thy name." He did not yield to the influence of despair: He wrestled with it and overcame it, though in the Garden of Gethsemane it was with strong crying and tears. And it is the prevailing stream of thought and feeling within us which He will guide if we will let Him. It is the trouble that is unrelieved by faith and hope that He seeks to assuage. We must experience the trouble in some degree before we can prove the power of the faith by which it is to be controlled.

The trouble of the disciples had a very definite cause, as trouble usually has. It was that their Master, who was more than any one else to them, was about to leave them. In prospect of this sore bereavement, what had He to say to them that would justify His exhortation not to let their heart be troubled? This—that His going away would prepare for the coming of the Holy Spirit, whereas if He went not away the Comforter would not come to them. This, too, that in His absence He would be serving their interests, preparing a place for them in the Father's house of many mansions; that He would return and receive them to Himself; and that in a little while there would be a glad permanent re-union.

Confining our attention to a trouble which we may be called to share resembling in any degree that of the disciples, we might speak of the death of friends dearly beloved who are apparently necessary to us. Such deaths are happening every day in various circles throughout the world. Friends who were valued, admired, and loved for their personal excellences, and for the services they rendered; teachers, guides, and leaders on whom so much depended that without them success seemed impossible or vastly more difficult, are withdrawn, and those bereaved of them ask for light on their trouble that may stay their sinking hearts. Nor are they left utterly disconsolate if they are sincere followers of Christ. They thank God that they ever knew them, and that such benefits were conferred on them by their means; they remind themselves that the separation is only for a short season, and they encourage themselves with the hope of renewed intercourse with them under happier circumstances in a better land. Such considerations do not remove the survivor's sorrow, but they inspire him with patience and courage under it, and the deep peace of God within the soul is left undisturbed.

One beautiful Sunday morning in the month of August, some twenty-five years ago, I stood, after service, with the late David Thomas, of Bristol, at the head of Lake Derwentwater, Keswick. As we looked down the Lake to the farther end where stands a large hotel, he told of a minister once staying at that hotel and meeting there his future wife, and he spoke as if it were a happy circumstance. Then, starting off at a tangent, he added, "But he's had trouble!" It seemed odd to me that such a wise man should speak as if it were a strange thing for the minister to meet with trouble, though he was happily married; and looking up into his face, I said to him very earnestly, "Trouble finds us all out in one way or another." But how reproved I felt the next moment when with a sudden change of countenance, he replied, "Yes, I know that; it's come to me twice during the last four months. I've lost two of my daughters by death, one at the age of thirty, the other at thirty-two. That's the reason why we are here now; we want to be rather quiet." And glancing towards the group of his family standing at a little distance, I noticed they were all in mourning. In the autumn of that same year, the father joined his children who had gone before. He prepared his one discourse at the end of the week, and then died without delivering it. His funeral sermon was preached the week after from the text, which seemed to be a play upon his name, "David served his own generation by the will of God, and then fell on sleep."

In view of these withdrawals from earth of useful men and women, we seem to hear the Saviour say to those who sorrow over their departure, as if the sun for them had set in eternal night, "Let not your heart be troubled as though there were no more to live for and no more to hope. It is well with them, and as for you who are left behind, it is well with you, for the Father is still with you. There is service to be rendered to Him and to your fellows, and every day as you wait and work brings you nearer to the time when you will be re-united with them, to part no more."

We can conceive of worse troubles than the death of valued friends, but none where, as disciples of such a Master, we need despair, none where we ought either to sink down into apathy or resort to desperate measures for relief.

II. JESUS FOLLOWS UP HIS EXHORTATION AGAINST A TROUBLED HEART BY ONE TO FAITH IN HIM. "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me."

It is a singular instance in translation that these words may be rendered in four different ways without violating any grammatical rule. Many learned men have been inclined to render both clauses imperatively—"Believe in God, believe also in Me." Our authorised English version makes the first clause an assertion, "Ye believe in God," and the second an exhortation, "Believe also in Me." To this rendering the revised version adheres, and there is this strong point in its favour that it is true to fact. Before ever they met with Jesus, such men as Peter and James and John believed in God. They were pious men waiting for the Messiah, and now He had come and was with them, and claimed their confidence, not only now, but in the sorrowful time that was coming upon them immediately when He would be taken away from them.

1. Theism needs to blossom into Christianity. The belief in God is strengthened and consummated by the belief of His manifestation in humanity. To some minds there is great fascination in the simplicity of Theism, or Deism, as it used to be called. The idea of one Personality infinite in all His attributes, who is alone to be thought of as Divine, and worshipped, seems to them simpler and easier to grasp than the Christian Trinity. The same remark might be made of many things where yet the advantage is on the side of complexity. A tree with all its branches cut off, and nothing left but the bare bole, would be much simpler and easier to draw on paper than a complete tree with all its boughs and twigs and leaves and fruit. But it would neither be so pleasing nor so profitable; it would be reduced to bareness and barrenness. Simple theism is a cold and colourless creed compared with Christianity. The idea of God without Christ is a profound abstraction without any warmth for the emotions, and without any of that interest which appeals to us as human beings. Whereas in Christ He passes across the infinite distance that separates us from Him, and comes very near to us. He is found in fashion as a man, and in ways that we can understand and that touch our hearts, displays such love and power, such condescension and sympathy as encourage us to approach Him with confidence, and to think of Him as the very Friend we need. We can come boldly to a throne of grace because we have a High Priest that is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and that was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.

We might be content to let the claim of Christianity to acceptance be settled by a comparison of its results with those of the systems which have set forth the Deity under only one Personality. Judaism is one of these systems. How heavily weighted it is with ceremonies and traditions! and while there is much that is good in it, what a want there is of the joyous life and freedom which we find in Christianity! What a lack of the spirit which seeks to raise others to an equality of privilege with ourselves, and to put all nations into possession of the same blessings as we enjoy! After an experiment of near 2,000 years, if the question could be put to the people of Christian lands in all their ranks and stations, Will you go back to the law and religion of Moses, or will you stay with Christ? they would vote in their millions to stay with Christ.

The same thing might be said of the comparison with Mohammedanism. The grand article of the creed of Mohammedans is that there is one God, and they loathe the idea of His becoming incarnate, or having one who stood to Him in the relation of sonship. Well, they have tried their hand upon this simple creed of theirs for 1,200 years, and the results are not at all encouraging. The nations that are under its influence are simply blighted. They are great upholders of polygamy and slavery, which the Koran legalises. They lag behind the progress of Western nations, which they view with suspicion as somehow connected with Christianity, as indeed it is. Christendom occupies the van of progress, and leads the world. Judging from the influence of the Gospel on discovery, invention, and science; on freedom and on the condition of the people, we see that we who believe it are in the line of light; we see that we have no reason to envy any other system that has ever been propounded. We are persuaded that it is not enough to believe in God, but that we should also believe in Him whom He has sent into the world for our salvation.

2. The general principles of religion require to be definitely applied. The disciples believed in God the infinite, the invisible; so far so good; but the question was, How would they regard Him when disguised in a nature like their own? Would they believe in Him though His glory was dimmed by His likeness and His nearness to themselves? Would they continue to believe in Him when He had been rejected by the rulers in Church and State, and actually put to death upon a cross? If they could do that they would have power over their heart's trouble when He was taken away from them, and that so tragically; they would have power over every trial which befell them. The Messiahship of Christ was the testing question of the time, and by it men stood or fell. It is not ours, because we have been brought up in the belief of it; but in some other way our fidelity will be put to the proof.

There is always some work of God, some movement of life, some truth or duty, or Providential dispensation towards us which brings our inner feelings to the surface, and discloses us to ourselves, and it may be to others. It is comparatively easy to admit the general principles of religion, but often hard to apply them to the actual circumstances in which we are placed. Lowell, the American poet, speaks sarcastically of people who are all against war in the abstract, but so ready to fight as soon as ever a quarrel arises. We may praise friendship, but are we true to our friends? We may warmly agree with those who say that it is very wrong to lie and cheat, but are we ourselves truthful and honest in our daily life, in buying and selling and gossiping, and in all our varied intercourse with our fellows? We may honour the heroes who fought for God in past times, but do we side with Him in present struggles as the great war goes on between good and evil? We may hold quite correctly the doctrine that all men are brethren, but are we helping in any way to make the condition of some of them more tolerable, and to deliver them from the tyranny of habit, custom, and circumstance under which they groan.

Such questions as these are suggested by the Saviour's words, "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me." Were He addressing some of us He would surely say, Ye believe in God, and ye believe in Me too: believe also in the present truth, which is knocking for admission into your mind: believe in the work I have given you to do: believe in those who are My messengers and instruments, so as to pray for them and help them. Behold in the toil-worn, the poor, the afflicted, and the oppressed, My representatives! I will reckon what you do to them as having been done to Me.

But it may be taking too much for granted to assume that we really believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ, in the faith of which we were brought up. Under the strain of life's troubles and trials, the confidence of former days may have given way; and with the loss of it the power of faithfully serving and patiently suffering may have been seriously impaired. The allowance of practices inconsistent with discipleship may have estranged us from Him in heart and then in opinion. We may have turned the mystery of the incarnation into impossibility through presumptuous theorising. The text should be taken as enjoining a renewal of faith where it has faded, a restoration of the lines of the Christian creed that have grown faint and illegible. Very lofty is the claim that is made upon us: it is one that implies on the part of the Speaker an ineffable union with the Deity, and would have been unwarranted on any other lips than His. He asks for no ordinary trust from His followers, such as they would be willing to put in the wisest and best of their fellows. In effect He says, Have the same confidence in Me as you have in God: repose in Me the trust that you repose in Him. For, indeed, I and the Father are one, and he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father.

WALTHAM CROSS.

Queen Eleanor's Crosses.

THE beautiful monuments known as Queen Eleanor's Crosses, which were erected to the memory of Eleanor, the beloved consort of Edward I., are among the most interesting relics of a bygone age that we now possess. Erected 600 years ago, some of them yet remain; and the beauty and variety of their design, their great age, and the pathetic story connected with their erection, render them the objects of interest and instruction.

Queen Eleanor was espoused to Edward I. when she was quite a child, and was afterwards married to him in Spain. She came to England when in her twentieth year, and appears to have been most loyally and enthusiastically received by the English people. The whole of their married life, extending over a period of thirty-six years, was spent as much as possible in each other's company. Eleanor was devoted to her husband, and accompanied him on most of his expeditions. It was on one of these that she performed an act of heroism which proved her great affection for the king. At the risk of losing her own life, she drew the poison from the wound which Edward had received in Palestine cordance with the instructions in her will, is not a matter of very great moment.

Queen Eleanor died at Harby, or Hardeby, in Nottinghamshire, on the 28th November, 1291, from a fever contracted by her while she was on her way, some say to join her husband, but more probably with her husband on his expedition to Scotland. The expedition was stopped, and the king accompanied the melancholy procession to London. At every place where the body rested a cross was afterwards erected to her memory. There are many conflicting opinions as to the exact number of the crosses, which, however, may be stated to have been twelve, namely, those at Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Geddington, Northampton, Stoney-Stratford, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, West Cheap (Cheapside), and Charing (Charing Cross). Of these, only three now remain: at Geddington, Northampton and Waltham. Some doubt has been entertained as to whether the cross at Geddington be a genuine "Eleanor," and, although it is not mentioned in the "Roll of the Accounts of Queen Eleanor," the beauty of its construction, and its similarity to those at Northampton and Waltham, leave but little room for question as to its genuineness.

John Abel, who devoted considerable time to the study of these beautiful structures, thus graphically describes the cross at Geddington, in his "Memoirs of Queen Eleanor" published in 1864.

"The cross is triangular in form, and stands in the centre of the village where the principal streets meet. It has been less restored than the others, but the Duke of Buccleuch, whose seat is near the place, has replaced the steps. It is 42 feet in height, and consists of three stories, the first of which is solid, each face being divided into four panels entirely covered with roses carved with exceeding delicacy. From the next story it is separated by a moulding and battlement. In each of the upper panels is a shield with the arms of England, Castile, Leon and Ponthieu. The second story is also triangular in form, and from each angle rises an elegant pillar supporting a canopy under which a statue of the queen is placed. The third or upper story, is an assemblage of graceful pinnacles and finials rising one above another, whilst the shaft is again subdivided into a cluster of angular pillars, terminating in points, ornamented at the hands of Azazim, a Saracen of the murderous sect of Assassini.

If the monument at Westminster by Pietro Cavallino is a faithful likeness of the queen, she must have been a most beautiful woman and, after the act of devotion which she had performed, it is only natural to conclude that Edward was passionately attached to his wife, and whether the crosses were erected at his own instigation or whether they were constructed, as some authorities affirm, in pursuance of the wishes of the queen herself and in ac-like all the others, with oak leaves and a large flower at the top. At the foot of the steps a spring of clear water takes its rise."

The cross at Northampton stands on an eminence (supposed to be the site of a Roman encampment), overlooking the town on the London Road, about a mile from Northampton. It is octagonal in form, and consists of three stories surmounted by a broken cross, and although six centuries old, is still beautiful, and in a fine state of preservation.

Waltham Cross, which, on account of its proximity to London, is best known to the inhabitants of the Metropolis, stands at the junction of the Great London Road with the road which leads to the Abbey. At this place the body of the queen was met by the monks and conveyed in solemn state to the Abbey. It is, perhaps, the finest of the Eleanor Crosses, but has been restored at various periods ranging from 1721 to 1892. In 1721 Sir G. Prescott suggested its removal to Theobald's Park, in the neighbourhood, where it was thought it would be better protected. The cross is hexagonal in shape, and there is some record of its cost. The three statues of the queen cost £3 6s. 8d. each, and the labour for masonry cost £95. The cost of the terminal is uncertain, but presuming it to have been similar to the one at Northampton, the cost would be about £30. The present terminal is not the original one. The cross is situated so near to London that it should be visited by all lovers of the beautiful in art, and the little trouble involved is quite repaid.

The cross erected at West Cheap, or Cheapside, as it is now called, stood in the middle of the street, and cost £300. It was rebuilt in 1441 by John Hetherley, Mayor of London, who obtained permission from Henry VI. In 1522 it was elaborately decorated in honour of the visit of the Emperor Charles V., and again at the coronation of Henry and Anne Boleyn in 1533, and later on, in honour of Edward VI. It was repaired in 1595 and 1600, but was finally demolished in 1643 by order of Parliament.

Of the remaining crosses but little is known. That at Charing appears to have been octagonal in form, and was removed in 1647. The cross which stands in front of the Charing Cross Hotel is, of course, only a reproduction of the original one. Grantham Cross stood on St. Peter's Hill, and that at Dunstable in front of the present Town Hall.

It may, perhaps, be mentioned that the High Cross at Tottenham is not in any way connected with the Eleanor Crosses, but is a wayside cross of modern construction, and cannot be compared to the beautiful structures erected to the memory of Edward's affectionate queen.

With regard to the designers of the crosses, a few words may be added in conclusion. Waltham Cross was constructed by Dymenge de Legeri, assisted by Englishmen; West Cheap by Michael de Cantaria; Charing, partly by Richard de Crandale, who received £360 for the labour alone, and on his death the work was completed by Roger de Crandale, who was paid £90 17s. 5d. Richard de Stow was responsible for the cross at Lincoln, while those at Northampton, Stony-Stratford, St. Albans and Dunstable, were the work of one architect.

ALBERT F. SMITH,

Number Two.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE, AUTHOR OF "ON GOD'S LINES."

WITHOUT doubt, Rosehill was fortunate in its care-taker. As a custodian his fidelity was an astonishment. He was oftener "on" the place than "off." By six o'clock on the week-evening he was there with his brush and duster, and the whole of the Saturday afternoon was spent within the precincts. When the members met for the class-meetings they found the vestries in order, and the hymn-books arranged on the tables. Nothing had ever been known to be amiss on the Sabbath Day. Never a speck of dust was found. The hat-racks beneath the seats were scrupulously clean. In the pulpit the Bible was in the centre of the board, and the hymnal in its place above it. Fresh water was in the bottle, and the glass was free from stain. Even the clock, (miracle of miracles!) registered the correct time.

In reality, not merely in name, he was the care-taker of Rosehill. The whole property was in his charge. Fully he realised the responsibility, and faithfully he discharged the duty. He took care of the keys. It was useless applying for the loan of them. Admission to the chapel was out of the question, unless he was able to grant the privilege personally. There were many who thought he carried things with a high hand. Some even declared he assumed proprietary rights. A rash youth once hinted as much, but regretted the speech the moment after.

"Ye young jackanapes!" exclaimed the outraged official, "an' would ye dare to cricketise me? Ye'll understand that bein' a trustee, I'm part owner o' Rosehill, an' bein' the chapel-keeper, I'm the boss o' the place."

Having once seen Thomas Hunt, his identity was known for ever. It was said he was like nobody else but himself. His face was red, and round, and clean-shaven. There was hair on the back of his head, but the front half, perfectly bald, gave his forehead the appearance of unusual length. An irregular mouth was his, with thin lips commonly protruding. His head so strongly inclined to the side, that to regain the perpendicular quite an exertion was needed. But it was the eyes which made his physiognomy distinctive. Small they were, but bright and flashing, the more so as they peered from beneath lowering brows. Usually there was the unpleasantest look on his face. There was something cunning about it, something quizzical, something cynical. His eyes seemed to steal round the corner, and his face seemed to say that he knew what you were after. And then he had a stiff knee, which gave him height when standing, but made his gait most awkward when he walked. He never forgot the accident which impaired the limb, and never forgave the knee for refusing to bend. Occasionally it drove him frantic, and he would shake his leg in a paroxysm of malice. It was galling to him that the stiff knee had reduced him in the ranks of the toilers. He had done well as a bricklayer, but was now employed as a Corporation labourer. The sight of buildings in course of erection was a grievous trial to Thomas Hunt.

Tommy was a "funniosity" in every sense. People said "there was something up in his inside," when his moods were under discussion. What Tommy would be like could never be safely predicted. Sometimes he was most astonishingly pleasant. More often he was utterly disagreeable. He could be as bright and gay and humorous and generous as could be wished. Then his face would lighten and people were led to wonder whether all was right with Tommy. But how glum he could be and sullen and sarcastic and suspicious! This was his normal mood.

Strange to say, Thomas Hunt was a leader; stranger still, he had numerous names on his book, and the best weekly attendance of any class in the society. His sincerity was his sheet-anchor.

Bobby Turner was his apologist. "It's just this way, ye see, friends!" Bobby would say, "Tommy's father was a man with a queer make-up, an' his mother was the melancholyest woman as ever was. If either o' them had been kind o' natural, Tommy wouldn't hev been see bad, but they were both funny, an' Tommy's the mixture o' their funninesses. Sometimes I can see his father in him, but oftener his mother. . . . Consequently Tommy can no more alter his temper than he can bend his bad knee. It's no use gettin' vexed wi' Tommy. He didn't ask to enter the Hunt family. He just came, an' when he came, he found he was in their line, an' he has to put up with it. . . . It's a good job he has no idee what an awkward piece o' goods he is. He'd lay hands on hisself if he suspected it. . . . An' so, when ye take all these things into account, really, the wonder is that he's just what he is. I'll grant he might be better, but then he might be worse, an' it's lucky he isn't. . . . Now, take my advice! Take nee notice o' Tommy's peculiarities! Never let-on! When he's blithe, let him have his fling, an' keep it up as long as ye can; an' when he's down-in-the-mouth, an' nasty in the temper, it's best not to speak to him. . . . Do I think Thomas Hunt's a Christian? Where's the man that knows his bringin's-up that doubts it? He's sound in the heart, which is the main thing, an' as for qualifications, he has good knowledge an' a deal o' grace."

There were times when the care-taker needed a defender. It was in the business meetings where his contrariness came out. If affairs were proceeding pleasantly, Tommy would be cantankerous; if, on the other hand, as occasionally happened, members differed and mischief seemed imminent, Tommy would sharply call them to order, reminding them that unity was strength, and that peace was essential to prosperity. Grim smiles would cover the faces of the disputants when Tommy played this role.

But, however efficient Tommy might be as a chapel-keeper, and whatever allowance was made at Rosehill for the oddities of his disposition, he was unpopular with the general public. No surprise was expressed when Joe Hunt fought shy of the chapel on the mount. His mother's irregular attendance gave license to the youth. The father stormed and fumed. His son was defiant. Eventually the care-taker was forced to acknowledge that his son was "running with the giddy multitude." He had joined the cricket club and bought a bicycle. He had found companions after his own heart.

Games and sports to Thomas Hunt were machinations of the Evil One, and a bicycle was the latest and swiftest vehicle to the gates of Hell. Tommy's misery accentuated his eccentricities. His wretchedness was abject. In the meetings he uttered diatribes at the national sports, and prayed that God would save all sinners, especially those who sinned with bat and ball, and were chasing each other to the Devil on wheels.

The business of the December Quarterly Meeting was finished. The Reverend Caleb Kent was on his feet to pronounce the Benediction.

"I want to move a motion, Mister Super!"

"BUT THERE'S A LEAK IN THE SHIP."

Thomas Hunt interposed, "so settle ye down, an' listen to me."

The meeting was manifestly impatient. A jemiad from Tommy was an anti-climax thoroughly unacceptable. The stiff leg was at the stiffest, Tommy's head at the angle, his eyes alternately peeping slyly and glaring fixedly. He noted the signs of uneasiness with secret satisfaction.

"Isn't it a rule o' the Connexion, Mister Chairman, that the Quarterly Meeting should spend some time in considerin' the spiritual affairs o' the Circuit, an' to try to devise means to hurry the savin' work on?"

"Well, it is not exactly a rule, Brother Hunt, but a recommendation!" Mr. Kent replied.

"An' a very wise recommend it is, Mister Super, an' I'll just take the liberty of adoptin' the Conference's hint. Now, I'm not one of them that's always complainin'. Things is goin' on nicely, an' has done for a number o' years. Congregations keep up; we have money to meet demands; an' every year we report an increase o' members. We've been well served in the way o' ministers. You, Mister Super, are as good as any we've had, an' a long sight better than some."

Tommy spoke without interruption. Interest was already awakened. The brethren were eyeing one another wondering what object "the cantankerous one" could have behind this laudatory introduction.

"But there's a leak in the ship!" Tommy affirmed, his head bounding erect. Then changing the metaphor of failure, he went on: "We're losin', an' in some cases hev lost, the grip o' the reins o' the young 'uns. The lads hev got the bit between their teeth, an' away they are on velocipedes fairly fleein' in sin, an' leavin' the chapel for the cricket-field. Brethren, it's a serious state o' things, an' the worst on't is, they see nee harm in't, an' there's that long-legged curate as keen for the sports as they be, an' ticin' the lads to the church."

More woeful his face became as he described the affairs of the church; his head had fallen to the side; he was resting on the other leg.

Again his head was up and he was at his full stature.

"Now, I've been thinkin' o' this, as was likely, me havin' a lad o' me own. An' I'll tell ye what I propose. That curate's at the bottom o' the mischief. We could knock his wind out if we had a curate of our own, a young preacher, a bran'-new probationer, an' a college-bred 'un. The lads is always glad when the students come fra the college. Well, wouldn't it be a fine thing to call one out, an' keep him permanent? The Super has his hands full wi' the old 'uns. Number Two could manage the young 'uns. He could get them converted, an' start a class. For the matter o' that, he could conduct an Improvement Society, though religion's more necessary than book-larnin'. As for his keep, it wouldn't be much, an' the money would come. . . I've looked at this business every way up, an' when I've been dustin' the seats I've just looked at the pulpit an' thought what a fine thing it would be if we had a minister for the young folks. It's the only way out o' the difficulty, an' so I beg to make a motion that we write to Dr. Atkeson, an' tell him to send us the best lad he's got at the college. Explain the case to the Principal. Tell him that cricketin's stopped the prayin', an' velocipedin's put an end to the singin', an' that we want a student to mission the cricket-field an' the bicycle-track."

The meeting was taken by surprise. The notion was new. David Dale acknowledged that the idea of calling out an additional minister had never been present to his mind. He was quite in favour, but thought that time should be given for exhaustive thought before committing themselves to the change. At his suggestion, Thomas Hunt gave formal notice to propose the resolution at the Quarter Day in March.

From the day when his motion carried, to the middle of July, the chapel-keeper was insufferable. The airs he assumed on the subject of Number Two incensed the people of Rosehill. He created the impression by his pride, that Number Two would be his man, and, when in June, the third draft of stations appeared, and Paul Prosser was put down next to Caleb Kent, he would talk of the said Paul Prosser, and of no one else.

"The Connexion 'll be jealous o' the men we've gotten. Think o' their names! Caleb and Paul! It's Providence, proper Providence! It's happened just as we wanted. Number One, Caleb, ye understand, havin' a name from the old economy, will deal wi' the folks o' that class; an' Number Two, christened after the great Saint Paul of the new dispensation, will look after the young an' risin' generation. He'll be a good 'un, will Number Two, not as good as the 'postle, but gettin' on that way. That long-legged curate 'll feel funny when he finds that Paul Prosser's in residence on the place. . . . It'll be my business to let him into the secrets of the business, an' ye can take my word for it that before very long there'll be signs and wonders among the wheelers an' the cricketers."

The praises of Number Two were sounded abroad. He had visited every member, preached nigh twenty sermons, and old and young were agreed that he would make his mark. He was good to look at, of medium height and shapely made, with a healthy face, well-cut features, brown hair and grey eyes. He was well attired, his linen, the women observed, being equal to the popular organist's. It was a pleasure to hear him speak. He had perfect command of voice, clear articulation, and a vocabulary uncommon to most. Some fear there had been that the College might have spoiled him. All doubts vanished in the freedom and friendliness of his manner. With unflinching instinct he addressed all classes of the Rosehill community. There was a chorus of approbation. General praise was accorded to the chapel-keeper for suggesting the engagement of Number Two.

The commendations were bitterness to Thomas Hunt. Number Two had disappointed him. Paul Prosser was absolutely unlike all that he had preconceived. It seemed to the caretaker that Dr. Atkinson must have taken leave of his senses to send such a student to Rosehill. Instead of making the best selection, he had made the worst. Tommy was wretched, and wished he had never mentioned Number Two.

For the first few weeks he kept silence, then his chagrin forced vent, and Rosehill knew that Tommy was at daggers-drawn with the new minister. The situation was piquant and farcical, and the course of events was anticipated with mirthful curiosity.

"What's the matter wi' the lad, Brother Hunt?" Ralph Jackson pointedly queried, when the care-taker had raved at some length at the close of the class meeting. "It was you that wanted him; in fact, he wouldn't have been here but for you. I'm bound to say, Thomas, ye're inconsistent, so to speak!"

"Inconsistent!" Tommy repeated with sharp anger. "Ye charge me, me, a leader o' the church an' the chapel-keeper, a member o' many years' standin', wi' inconsistency! That's nice language to be flung at me. No! Brother Jackson!" and Tommy peeped fiercely from beneath the heavy eyebrows. "It's Number Two that's inconsistent. Here was me expectin' a minister, an' lo an' behold, he's a mountebank, a masher, a high-town swell, an' a reg'lar sportsman. When I went to meet him at the station, I missed him. An' no wonder! I should hev known him by his silk hat or his white tie! As sure as life, he came in knickerbockers, an' a cricketin'-shirt, an' a red tie, an' a cap, a holiday-cap, o' the colour to match his suit. Yes! I went up to his lodgin's to tell his 'landlady he hadn't come, an' Mistress Ainslie says, 'Come in, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Prosser's just goin' to hev his tea!' An' sure enough, there he was wi' a fine story o' havin' come straight fra' the Isle o' Man. That was bad, Brother Jackson! The great Apostle never went to the Isle o' Man. We never read that a holiday was necessary when he was setten' out on a mission. Fancy the 'postle Paul in knickerbockers an' sportin' a red tie! No, no! thinks I, this looks badly. If he'd been like his New Testament namesake, he would have spent his holidays on his knees. . . . But there he was makin' hisself at home at Mistress Ainslie's. When he finished his tea, I gave him an account as to how he happened to be there, but he didn't seem to be grateful to me for makin' the motion. Then I told him about the curate an' the velocipedes an' the cricket matches, an' what we expected him to do. Round he turns, an' says he, 'Don't alarm yourself, Mr. Hunt, I had got rusty at cricket, but I've used the vacation to get my hand in again, an' I'll raise a team to match the curate's. As for cyclin', says he, 'I had only an old machine, but I expect one o' the latest style in a day or two.' . . . Yes, Brother Jackson, if it's inconsistency ye want, ye'll find more than enough in Number Two."

The Rosehill folks were first amused, and then indignant at the care-taker. Paul Prosser was as great a favourite as Caleb Kent. There was something in his sermons quite new in their experience. They were unable to define the distinctive quality. He was true to the Evangelical truths, but he reached them on fresh lines, and applied them in unexpected directions. Illustrations he found in Art and Science, in Poetry and Fiction. He interpreted familiar Scriptures in novel, yet convincing ways. People listened with such attention that the lapse of time was never noticed.

The care-taker was locking up one Sabbath night; Ralph Jackson was waiting for him.

"My! an' wasn't he fine the night, Brother Hunt?" Ralph began, as they proceeded up the street. "The Super was good this mornin', but I think I never did hear anythin' equal to the night's. Ye would just think he'd been havin' a confab wi' that young man, an' that he had found out exactly what the 'one thing' was he lacked. Looks tha', I could just see Jesus an' the young squire, an' when the Master told him to be off an' sell out, an' do the generous, I could see him scratchin' his hair an' shakin' his head. It's fine preachin', an' should do a power o' good to the young 'uns o' the congregation."

"Ye're no judge o' sarmons, Ralph Jackson!" the irate chapel-keeper maliciously retorted. "They're all grand to you, an' the last is always the best. An' as for the one to-night, it would be better if Number Two practised what he preached. He should sell out hisself. Let him part wi' his bicycle, an' give the money to the poor!"

"Well, it would be a pity," Ralph rejoined. "He's just gotten the club fairly started. It was a sight to see him yesterday, an' the Rosehill wheelers settin' off for Appledene. Hooray! I says, for the Primitive cyclers!"

"An' ye call yerself a loyal Primitive, Ralph Jackson!" Tommy sarcastically said. "Can ye find the mention o' a bicycle in the consolidated minutes?"

Jackson was no "argufyer," as he often confessed, and felt that speech was useless with Brother Hunt. He contented himself by saying that he was proud of the way Mr. Prosser was interesting himself in the youths and maidens of Rosehill.

There it was in print, in the local newspaper, in the very issue that contained a report of his last Sabbath's sermon—the announcement that the Reverend Paul Prosser had become an honorary member of the District Cricket Club. The care-taker was considering his relation to the Church. He was minded to reduce his class-money as a protest against the action of Number Two. Joe Hunt added fuel to the fire. With great gusto he told of Mr. Prosser's skill at the wickets, how that he had bowled the curate, and exhausted the fielders with his splendid batting.

"If the President o' the Conference only knew," Tommy bitterly murmured, "he would soon send Paul Prosser about his business!"

It was no satisfaction to the chapel-keeper that the gallery was filled with cyclists and cricketers. He was in the lobby when his son entered Rosehill, and the latter saw the sneer on his father's face.

"Mister Dale!" said Tommy, "this is serious,

The cricket club's in the gallery in a body, an' the wheelers took eleven o' the hymn-books for the use o' visitors!"

"Thank God!" the engineer replied.

Tommy was confounded.

"Did ye hear what I said, Mister Dale?"

"Every word, and I know why you said it, and I know what you think, and I say, Thank God! With all my heart I say it!"

At the March Quarterly Meeting, when the "Historical Account of the Travelling Preachers" was being filled in, Tommy complained of the "official conduct" of Number Two. In his opinion, Mr. Prosser should have been a professional sportsman. He was "grieved to the heart" that he had been the blind advocate of his engagement. When the complaint was silently ignored, Tommy declared that if the Conference knew all the facts, the Circuit would be reckoned as insubordinate.

The crisis came in the month of August. Thomas Hunt officially and specifically charged Number Two with conduct unworthy of a minister. Number One had the charge in writing. Paul Prosser had played in a test-match, had been seen in flannels, and had thrown his cap in the air when the side he was on had won. His conduct was unbecoming of his profession, had destroyed his Christian influence, and brought religion into contempt. The Circuit Committee was summoned to meet at three o'clock on a Saturday afternoon.

The day of the trial was the day of the triumph. Never in the history of the Connexion was an official meeting so singularly disturbed. Caleb Kent was in the chair, and had opened the meeting with the usual religious exercises. There was a full attendance of officials. The prospect of the farce was an inducement irresistible. The President had explained why the Committee had been called, and had read the formal charge presented by Brother Thomas Hunt. With difficulty the members restrained their mirth when the complainant rose to prove his accusation. He was standing on the stiff leg, his head was struggling to get upright.

"Ye'll remember," he began, "that it was me that moved for a Number Two. If I'd ever thought that a man like Paul Prosser would have been that Number Two, I would have moved an amendment. My notion was that a religious young minister would have been able to have cleared the bicycle-track, an' emptied the cricket-field; but instead o' that, he's induced more nor ever to buy machines, an' since he came, cricketin's all the go. . . . On the fifth o' this month, he captained a team against the curate. Of course, he licked the curate, as was likely, but that doesn't alter the fact. He was there, standin' in the way o' sinners, walkin' in the counsel o' the ungodly, sittin' in the seats o' the scornful. An' he calls hisself a Primitive Methodist minister, an' there's his name in the almanack. What'll the public think o' Methodism when they see him dressed in flannel? D'ye think that's the way to spread Scriptural holiness throughout the land? Did anybody ever hear o' Hugh Bourne playin' at cricket, or William Clowes runnin' on wheels? Then, think o' the effect on the young men o' the neighbourhood! He's just givin' them license for worldliness. It's Mister Prosser says this, an' Mister Prosser does that, an' it's therefore law and gospel. . . . If he'd only listened to me he might have succeeded, but he's that high-minded he won't take a word, an' he's just leadin' the young dear knows where."

At that moment the beat of a drum was heard in the chapel-yard. One, two, three, and the brass band began to play the inspiring march, "See the Conquering Hero Comes!"

The officials were on their feet. The door was opened, and there, stretching beyond the yard, right to the further side of the street, was an excited crowd of wheelmen and cricketers keeping time to the music of the band. In response to David Dale, who inquired the reason of their visit, they explained that they were there "to back the parson." When Number Two appeared in sight, he was greeted with rounds of cheering.

No record of this Committee Meeting is to be found in the Circuit Minute Book, for no resolution was submitted.

Tommy acknowledged that it was "no use speakin'," but asserted that if ever he was sent to Conference he would renew the charge against Number Two.

YOU would not suspect it, to see Delia quietly darn ing socks, that she takes a keen interest in politics. And why should she not?

Surely a woman suffers even more—when “something is rotten in the state of Denmark”—than a man, because she has to suffer passively, while the man, having a vote, and being, therefore, the five-millionth part of King Demos, can be “up and doing” in securing the desired reform.

Every social evil falls heaviest on the woman and the children. If there is unjust taxation of the poor, in order that the pockets of the rich may be spared, the poor man's wife has less money thereby with which to go marketing. It is a never-ceasing marvel to me how some women, with almost as large families as that of the Little Old Woman who Lived in a Shoe, contrive to get out of a pound or twenty-five shillings a week, what it would puzzle me to get out of twice the amount. Their children are wholesomely fed, are neatly clothed and shod, and always look nice and respectable. What is their secret? God bless the cottage-homes of England, and may they always be queened over by these wonderful chancellors of the exchequer in petticoats, whose budget never shows a deficit!

It is the woman, of course, who is the chief sufferer from the overcrowding caused by the exorbitant rents in this unwieldy London. The man is away all the day, but the woman in her doll's-house-like three or four rooms, in which she can scarcely turn herself, must do all her cooking and cleaning and making and mending, and have everything bright and natty for the lord and master when he comes home.

And it is the woman, too, alas, who has to suffer when the man is tempted into those gaudy and glittering public-houses, where his pockets are emptied, his brain is bemuddled, and his whole character is deteriorated.

Last of all, apart from the taxation, it is the woman who is the sufferer by war. It is a fine thing to read of some gallant charge up a mountain side in Tirah, of some steadfast stand against a swarming and savage enemy in the African desert, or of the calm advance of redcoats in the face of bullets pinging from the rifles of a hidden foe on the South African veldt, and it is fine to behold the victors' return, through shouting crowds in the London streets, everyone rushing forward to press the hands, the banners flying and the bands playing. That is fine, but what of those who do not return—those who have paid the price of victory, and who lie thousands of miles away in the sleep that knows no waking here on earth, while in some quiet village a mother's heart is leaden at the thought of the dead son, a widow's eyes are red and her cheeks are thin and wan at the thought of the dead husband, and the baby lips pierce her heart as they ask, “Mamma, when will dada come home? He is so long time away.” If governments and the people who clamour for war, thought of these poor victims, every resource of statesmanship would be exhausted before the signal was given to mow down human flesh, and the yells of the war-mongers would die upon their lips. If war is ever a necessity, it is the most hateful of necessities, and should never be entered upon without feelings of deep humiliation and a burdened heart. It is a reversion to primitive savagery, and the existence of war shows how near, in spite of all our vaunted progress, humanity still is to the brute.

Delia is one of those who do think of these things, and there is never a war but what her tender heart goes out to the women and children who are left weeping after the most glorious victory, and her lips never fail to utter a petition that Christ's own consolation shall be their's in their desolation.

Her ideal statesman is Mr. John Morley, partly because of his fearless honesty, but largely because he would give women an equal Parliamentary vote with men.

On this particular October evening, having finished darned the stockings, and rolled them up into balls, she had lain back in the easy-chair in front of the library fire, and read Mr. Morley's speech at Carnarvon in favour of the Government keeping wide open the door of peace with the Transvaal, in spite of all the aggravating tactics of the Boers.

"I believe," she said, "they ought to behave better to the Outlanders, and give them a share of power in their Parliament, but what will be the good of British and Boers shooting each other down over the matter? I don't see where the patriotism comes in of 'smashing the Boers,' and 'remembering Majuba Hill,' and all that sort of thing. Mr. Morley is quite right in calling that kind of talk 'Bedlamite.' I'm sure I'm as good a patriot as anybody, but it seems to me the patriotism is much more genuine that applies itself to furthering peace and prosperity than that which rants and raves for war, and takes a fiendish delight in counting the number of killed and wounded foes."

I stopped cutting open the pages of the new volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography," and noticed that militant glitter in Delia's eyes which you will always see in the eyes of enthusiastic missionaries of peace when they are fairly roused. She was now sitting upright, with the paper in her lap, evidently "spoiling for a fight," and looking as if she would dearly relish a battle-royal with a Jingo. Now, I am not a Jingo, so I did not g at fy her. I simply remarked:

"Why, what a treasure you would be on a Peace platform in Hyde Park or in Trafalgar Square!"

"Yes; and the Jingoës would forget that I was a woman, and pelt and hustle me in the sacred name of patriotism. Patriotism!" she ejaculated, with infinite disgust. "A nice patriotism that makes men act like a ribald rout of ruffians."

"Quietly, Delia. What has excited you so much all at once?"

"Why, this. Let me read it!" And she read from Mr. Morley's speech: "When we were insisting upon, urging upon, speaking upon, writing upon, and passing Resolutions such as the one which we passed the other day at Manchester, affirming and declaring the independency of the Transvaal Republic, they called us disloyal, and traitors, and I know not what else. Well, after all, nicknames and abusive names are pleasanter than the old political weapons of brickbats and rotten eggs. I, for one, repudiate entirely the notion of disloyalty, or treachery, or want of patriotism, or want of love of my country or sympathy for those who suffer wrongs in foreign lands."

"Let me," said Delia, "be disloyal with John Morley, rather than loyal with the patriots. The patriots!"

Could those flashing eyes, and those lips so scornfully curved, belong to the Delia whom I had caught smiling to herself half-an-hour before over the darning of the stockings? I sought to soothe her.

"Take no notice of such taunts. True patriots are never popular at the time they resist false patriotism, but they can afford to wait for the swing of the pendulum, when the bill comes in, and the shouters make the wryest faces. The glories of England are not her famous slaughterings, but her fair humanities, her 'victories of peace,' her soldiers of the Cross, who go forth not to compel, but to enlist the heathen under the banner of Christ; her great poets and thinkers. Why, look round these shelves. There are a hundred books each of which outshines a victory on the battlefield. Shakespeare, Milton, Bunyan, Wordsworth, Defoe, Coleridge, De Quincey, Tennyson, Browning—who would exchange their laurels for the general's gold braid or the admiral's cocked hat? The general's and the admiral's work may be necessary at times, but it is a temporary and passing necessity, which will cease when the race ascends to a higher platform, and looks down with disgust at its scufflings in the bone-bestrewn valley. But the glory of the thinker and the soldier of Christ will shine with ever brighter effulgence, as the spirit gains the mastery of the body. Even now, is it not true that the false glamour of the tinselled glories of war are losing their power over the minds of intelligent men and women? What is the Peace Conference but a proof that the great military Powers themselves are getting heartily ashamed of war, though they have not the courage to begin disbanding their armies? Cheer up, Delia, there's a good time coming, and by the year 2000 we may hope that war will be but an ugly dream of the past."

"Indeed, I hope so, but I fear it will be long before. But what book is that you are cutting?"

"It is the new volume of the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' and I think it has a bearing on this question of patriotism. This is the sixtieth volume of a work that will contain notices of upwards of 25,000 men and women who, from the earliest dawn of English history till our own time, have been famous—or infamous—in various ways. We may leave the infamous ones out of the question, but considering the famous, what a bed-roll is here of men and women who have helped to make England—materially, socially, and spiritually!"

"But how has such a big work been produced?"

"It was projected, I believe, by Mr. Smith, of the firm of Smith, Elder and Co. Mr. Leslie Stephen was appointed the first editor, and when he found the work too heavy, Mr. Sidney Lee succeeded him. These two gentlemen have personally contributed many of the most interesting notices—those of poets, philosophers, etc., of the first rank—but about fifty literary men and women have been engaged—during the last fifteen years in hunting up material in the British Museum and other places, and boiling down the facts into the smallest compass. The 'Dictionary' will be one of the noblest contributions the nineteenth century has made to our national literature."

Delia was called downstairs by a friend who had come to discuss the absorbing topic of hats and frocks for the winter, but a few evenings later she was again in the book-room, and observing me engaged with the "Dictionary," said:

"I should like you to tell me something about that volume. The idea of the 'Dictionary' has interested me a good deal."

"Very well, then. I have scampered through it. The new volume includes nearly 500 names, from Watson (Anthony), a Bishop of Chichester, who died in 1605, to Whewell (William), the very able Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, who died in 1866. No fewer than fifty Watsons are noted as having been, in Browning's phrase, more or less 'Persons of Importance in their day.' But it is farther on in the volume that, to a Nonconformist and a Methodist, the most interesting names occur. There is, for instance, Isaac Watts."

Delia murmured, "How doth the little busy bee!"

"How few of those who have found in his hymns the most perfect expression of their religious feeling know anything about the great little author—for the large-souled Isaac, who wrote that 'The mind's the measure of the man,' was a Zachæus in stature? His grandfather was commander of a man-of-war under the Commonwealth, and was blown up by an explosion. His father was a Southampton clothier, but so far from being only the 'ninth part of a man,' he was a valorous Independent deacon, who, in the dark days of Charles II., went to gaol for his fidelity, and was actually in gaol when Isaac was born in 1674. The lad loved scribbling verses at school, and he was only twenty when he began composing hymns. Intense study weakened his constitution, and after a few years of London ministry, Isaac accepted the invitation of Sir Thomas and Lady Abney to reside in their house at Stoke Newington, and he remained with them for thirty-seven years. His Church, however, proud of its connection with him, insisted on keeping and paying him as nominal minister, though he preached only very occasionally. Abney Park Cemetery, the favourite burial-ground for Nonconformists in North London, is on part of what was the Abney estate, and one of the walks is called Dr. Watts' Walk.

"Who can estimate the impulse given by Watts to Evangelical hymnology! Canon Leigh Bennett, in this biography, says, 'At the beginning of the eighteenth century the stern embargo which Calvinism had laid on the use in the music of sacred worship of everything except metrical psalms and canticles had been broken by the obscure hymns of Mason, Reach, Barton, and others; and hymns were freely used in the Baptist and Independent congregations. The poetry of Watts took the religious world of Dissent by storm. It gave an utterance, till then unheard in England, to the spiritual emotions, in their contemplation of God's glory in nature and His revelation in Christ, and made hymn-singing a fervid devotional force."

"That is very interesting," said Delia. "I am afraid I don't note who are the authors of the hymns we sing, but I shall look out for Watts's in future."

"There are about 600 of his hymns in various collections, but, of course, they are not all good. But what would any collection be that did not include 'When I survey the wondrous Cross,' 'Jesus shall reign where'er the sun,' 'Come, let us join our cheerful songs,' and 'O God, our help in ages past? The last is the favourite hymn of the Church of England at its great public demonstrations."

"But don't the Wesleys come in the volume?" Delia asked.

"Of course they do. How could it be a 'Dictionary of National Biography' without them? Samuel Wesley, the father of John and Charles, gets four tightly-packed pages. You know he was rector of Epworth, in Lincolnshire. He was always in financial difficulties, and no wonder, considering that his income was £200 a year, and his family numbered nineteen. It is fortunate there were so many, for Charles, the hymn-writer, was the eighteenth, and what would Methodism have been without Charles Wesley's hymns? Charles is also given four pages. He is credited with having written the almost inconceivable total of 6,500 hymns, of which about 500 are still in common use.

"Says Rev. Alexander Gordon, who contributes the notice: 'Dealing with every topic from the point of view of spiritual experience, they rarely subside into the meditative mood. Rich in melody, they invite to singing, and in the best of them there is a lyrical swing and an undertone of mystical fervour which both vitalise and mellow the substratum of doctrine.' As to John, Mr. Gordon gives him eleven pages, and it is none too much. Every Methodist should be fairly familiar with the life of the Abraham of Methodism, the 'father of the faithful.' This is a word-likeness of John Wesley: 'Like all the Wesleys, he was of short stature; his person was slim, and his countenance was fresh-coloured. His eye was, on the testimony of a friend, the brightest and most piercing that can be conceived. From early life he wore his (originally auburn) hair in long locks reaching to his shoulders. There is, unfortunately, no doubt that Wesley and his wife did not get on well together, but Mr. Gordon considers there were faults on both sides. 'She was tart of temper, and Wesley's ways were trying.' Neither understood the other, and Wesley, unintentionally, often aroused her jealousy. It is pretty clear, from extracts given in this notice, that John Wesley was much less of a 'Wesleyan,' theologically and ecclesiastically, than many who name themselves after him."

"Of course he wasn't a Wesleyan," said Delia. "He was a Primitive. If he was not a Primitive, we are not."

It was not for me to argue out this point with her in her present militant Peace mood.

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

VIII.—THE UNION QUESTION YET AGAIN.

O see ourselves as others see us is interesting and sometimes helpful. We have several times been reminded that the eyes of the Christian world are upon us in regard to this question of union with the Bible Christians. Perhaps, if we could see ourselves from that point of view it might help us to act wisely. Not that the outside world necessarily knows our business better than we know it ourselves; but lookers-on often see most of the game. Detachment gives a certain largeness of view which is often impossible to those who are in the thick of the business. We believe the general Christian public are deeply interested in the issue of this movement. It comes after years of talk among the Churches about union, and may be looked upon therefore as a kind of test case which will afford some indication as to how much the talk has meant. Has it been real or mere platform gush? If two Churches with much in common as to their origin and general character fail to find a satisfactory basis of union, it will be assumed that the latter supposition is correct. If it is a mystery to an outsider why the Methodist Churches cannot all unite, it will be more mysterious still when he discovers that the difficulties in the way of union between the Bible Christians and ourselves have proved insuperable.

But to many of us a more vital question is as to how this movement is regarded by the Bible Christians. It should be remembered that they are more thoroughly committed to the principle of union than we are. Their Conference, at any rate, is committed to the principle, and some of the lower courts as well, although the question has not, of course, been submitted to the Quarterly Meetings of the Circuits. So far as we can judge, the leading ministers and laymen are for the most part strongly in favour of union. The resolution adopted by their last Conference, by a very large majority, was as follows: "That the information asked for by the Primitive Methodists respecting the financial condition of our denomination, and such other general information, be completed as far as possible and supplied to them with the least possible delay, on the single condition that similar information be supplied respecting the Primitive Methodist denomination for the use of our committee and people generally; that in the meantime, the proposed amended constitution be printed in the Minutes of the Conference, and further, as our friends have, so far as they have been consulted, already affirmed the principle of union, if it can be effected on terms mutually satisfactory to both communities, it shall be left to the Connexional Committee to determine when the information contemplated in the resolution shall be laid before the Quarterly Meetings, preparatory to their decision on the whole question being obtained."

The position taken up in that resolution is a perfectly reasonable one, and is in advance of anything we ourselves have done. It would seem, indeed, that their disposition in favour of union is more pronounced than our own. Whether that applies only to the Conference, or is shared by the circuits, has yet to be shown; but if the tone of the higher courts may be taken as indicative of that of the Stations, there can be no doubt that when the verdict of the people is taken it will be overwhelmingly on the side of union. The leaders of the denomination believe heartily that union would be of advantage to themselves, and advance the interests of the Church of Christ. They favour union from no narrow denominational standpoint, but because they are convinced it would make for the progress of the Kingdom of God. They are willing to make all reasonable concessions in order to effect this object, but since it is a question of union and not absorption, it cannot be expected that they will be willing to concede everything. This, so far as we can gather, is the attitude of the leaders of the denomination, and they may be expected to reflect, in the main, the feelings of the members and officials.

Coming now to the point of view from which this question has been regarded by our own Church, and the general feeling which obtains in regard to it, one is struck with the fact that attention has been largely fixed on matters of minor consideration. The question as to why these two Churches with so much in common should remain apart has been too much ignored. And the desirability of union on account of its bearing on the advancement of the Kingdom of God has been very little heard of. That should surely be the supreme consideration with men who profess loyalty to the will of Jesus Christ. It need not be assumed that that Will seeks the organic union of all the Churches; but there can be no question that it seeks the advancement of His Kingdom, and that should be the point of view from which the whole question should be regarded.

Unfortunately, attention has been directed to mere questions of Church government, which, though undoubtedly of great importance, are only a means to an end. The wonderful thing is that some people are so attached to their own Shibboleth in these matters, that they would rather leave the Church of their choice than submit to union on any terms but their own. This, of course, is an extreme position, and taken up, so far as we know, by very few. Still, in its milder forms, the same spirit has been a good deal more manifested in the course of the discussions on this question than is at all desirable. That the leading ministers and laymen are in favour of union, with some notable exceptions, is evident. They have stood manfully by the principle all through, and having set their hands to the plough nothing will induce them to look back. Within the next few months the whole question will come before our Church courts. How should they approach its consideration? To say they ought to do so unbiassed, were a counsel of perfection. It is so difficult to divest the mind of prejudice in such matters. And yet this is one of those questions that call, above all things, for a calm unbiassed judgment. It will vitally affect the future of our Church, and will in all likelihood have an important bearing on the progress of the Kingdom of God. Then, the fact that for the most part the two communities are remote from each other should prevent the influence of any ancient jealousies creeping in. The question which we have first of all to consider is this: Will this union tend to the growth of Christian unity in the Church of Christ? Secondly, will it enable the two Churches concerned to carry on their work more effectively? Then the question of a Constitution may come in for consideration, if, that is, these queries have already been answered in the affirmative. Negative replies will practically dispose of the whole subject. The question of the proposed Constitution of the united Church will with many be the main point unfortunately. It is important, but not of primary importance. If the Bible Christians and Primitive Methodists have got along comfortably under their respective systems of Church government, surely neither can be very vicious in principle, and it ought not to be difficult to devise one that shall serve as a via media for both. There must, however, be a spirit of compromise, or failure is bound to be the result. Our own Constitution, with all its excel-lences, is by no means perfect, and the occasion of union would furnish a favourable opportunity for removing some of its anomalies, and bringing it more thoroughly into harmony with the Democratic ideal.

Whatever the result of this movement may be, one cannot help wondering how it will be regarded in 1950. The point of view from which ecclesiastical questions are regarded has been modified enormously during the last half century. That was the period of the great Wesleyan disruption. It goes without saying that if the attitude of the Wesleyan Conference had at all resembled that of the Conference of to-day, there would have been no disruption at all. Vastly less than what has been conceded to the Wesleyan laity to-day would have been accepted by the secessionists of fifty years ago as a complete redress of all their grievances. But apart from that altogether, the tone of the Churches is now far less ecclesiastical than it was at the middle of the century. This is partly due to the fact that so much has been conceded in some quarters to the laymen, but still more to the growing spirit of unity among all the Free Churches. One could wish sometimes that people cared more for forms of government; but it is undeniable that they are more influenced by the life of Churches than their ecclesiastical arrangements. We hear sometimes, that the influence of the pulpit is waning; but never did so much depend upon the character of the man in the pulpit. Where people have no strong Denominational attachments they settle down where they can hear preaching that suits their tastes and meets their needs. They rarely ask any questions as to Church polity, or as to what share they will have in the government of the Church. This is especially the case in large towns, and even in the villages people are far less concerned about matters of Church government than they were fifty or even twenty years ago. How will it be fifty years hence? It may be that the struggle over Sacerdotalism which threatens us in the near future may revive interest in these questions; but it will concern the Anglican Church rather than the Free Churches. It may be inferred, therefore, that the minor considerations which agitate us in connection with this question of union will have been relegated still further into the background by the year 1950; while the larger questions affecting directly the unity of the Church and the advancement of the Kingdom of God, will have come still more to the front. If, then, we allow ourselves to be influenced by minor considerations in deciding the issue placed before us, our children will marvel at the narrowness of our view, and congratulate themselves on living in an age of greater enlightenment and broader views. Let us hope that our decision will be one that will excite their gratitude and admiration, and foreshadow the approach of a nobler and a better time.

Prison Life in the Soudan.

WHAT MAHDISM MEANT FOR CHRISTIAN CAPTIVES.

HERE are three men living to-day to whom the bare mention of the name of the Soudan will conjure up memories of the most agonising experiences human beings ever endured. They are Slatin Pasha, Father Ohrwalder, and Charles Neufeld. These three men were made prisoners by the dervishes soon after the rising of the false Mahdi, and spent many years in close and bitter captivity. Slatin and Ohrwalder managed to escape—the former after something like fifteen years' captivity, and Ohrwalder after ten. Neufeld was not so lucky. He spent twelve years in chains, and the joys of freedom only came to him when the Sirdar's forces reached Omdurman last year and shelled the place to pieces. Then his shackles were knocked off, and for the first time for twelve years the poor man felt the unfettered use of his limbs. In one respect, the three captives are alike—they have each published a book dealing with their experiences in those dread years of confinement. Slatin and Ohrwalder got theirs out soon after their escape; Neufeld's has only just appeared. The three together will live and have historical value. They make up a trilogy on prison life in the Soudan of absorbing interest, and no right appreciation of the rise and growth of Mahdism, and its devastating effects upon the Soudan, is possible unless the experiences of these eye-witnesses are read.

The three books are very much unlike. This is because the men themselves are also unlike. Slatin Pasha is a military man. He was an officer in the Egyptian army under General Gordon. He was governor of an interior province to the south of Khartoum, Darfur by name, and his last parting with Gordon was when he left that Christian hero to take up his duties just when Mahdism was bursting into flame. They never met again. Gordon remained at Khartoum to fall at his post. Slatin went to his head-quarters to be confronted by the Mahdist revolt, and to spend weary months in trying to quell it. That portion of the story does not now concern us. Suffice it to say, that Slatin had bad luck. His forces met with reverses. Many of his men—even his officers—were in open sympathy with the dervishes, and desertions and conspiracies were common. In the end he decided to capitulate. He yielded to the Dervishes and was taken, before the Mahdi, to remain a prisoner for fifteen years. In comparing the book describing those experiences with the two other books, one or two essential facts must be borne in mind. In the first place Slatin was not treated as a Christian. He had nominally embraced Mohammedanism some time before his surrender. His officers were Egyptians and followers of Islam; so also were his men; and he felt that as a member of another faith he had not that influence over them which he ought to possess, and which he might possess, if he followed their own faith. For that reason he nominally became a Mohammedan. This, of course, was known to his captors, and it made a great difference in their treatment of him. Moreover, he was their first important prisoner. He was an officer and administrator of high rank, and so long as he was not allowed to escape, it added much to the prestige of the Mahdist forces to have him in their custody. Consequently, Slatin was not at all badly treated when compared with the experiences of Ohrwalder and Neufeld. He had his liberty much of the time. The Mahdi, and the Khalifa after him, treated him with a certain amount of distinction. He had a house given him, servants, and a wife, a mount, and so on. He was frequently in the

AT OMDURMAN.

Mahdi's presence, and in later years the Khalifa used to treat him in quite a friendly manner, calling him in to assist him in his correspondence, and gravely describing to him the blessings awaiting the faithful in paradise! The cruellest blow Slatin must have had during his captivity was the terrible incident which followed the fall of Khartoum. It was an anxious time. Slatin was just then in chains. The Dervishes were intoxicated with religious delirium and the wild joy of victory. Khartoum had fallen, and the brave heart which had defied them so long was still in death. In their savage glee the Mahdists hastened to Slatin bearing a package wrapped in cloth. They opened it, and Slatin's gaze fell upon the severed head of his old chief. The reader may try and fancy what his feelings would be. He did not know how soon the clemency extended towards him would be withdrawn, and his own head be similarly dealt with.

These facts account for much in Slatin's book which is not found in the other two. At the same time, he agrees with them on many points. His picture of the Mahdi and the Khalifa is the same. The Mahdi was a voluptuary, who may have been sincere at first, but degenerated into tyrannous excesses after his early victories. The Khalifa was even worse. His heart was black. He had no vestige of mercy and kindness in his nature. He was cruel and blood-thirsty, relentless to a degree, thirsting only for power and dominion, and willing to crush whatever stood in the way of his attainment of them. He literally carried fire and sword over the Soudan. It became a waste. Whole tribes were exterminated. Villages and towns disappeared in smoking ruins. Commerce and agriculture were abandoned. Law and religion were virtually dead, for Mahdism could hardly be called a religion, since it meant nothing more than relentless war upon all who came in its way, and the building up of a new empire with the Khalifa as its Sultan. Slatin Pasha paints these phases of Mahdism in blackest colours. One statement of his alone will serve as an illustration of how he regarded it—namely, that it had involved the deaths of a third of the entire population of the Soudan, and that the country would not recover from its terrible wounds for more than one generation.

Let us now look at the second figure in our trio of authors. Father Ohrwalder was an Austrian and a priest in a Roman Catholic mission. The Roman Catholics, by the way, have ever been industrious in the Soudan. In most parts of Africa English Protestant missionaries are in the majority, but it is a fact that in the Soudan the Catholics were making strong their ground when the Mahdi rose and put an end to missionary work for the time. At the present moment the Sirdar has not withdrawn his prohibition, and the country is still closed to missionaries. When the veto is removed, it is to be hoped that Protestant effort will not lag behind that of the Catholics. Father Ohrwalder was stationed at Dar Nuba, in Darfur, with other missionaries, and four Catholic Sisters. They were taken prisoners soon after they arrived there, and when the mission was looking hopeful. This was in 1882. They had a foretaste of what was in store for them when they saw their little church demolished, and left a heap of ruins on the very day of their capture. They were robbed of all they possessed, and threatened by thousands of shrieking fanatics. Then they were taken to El Obeid, where the Mahdi was stationed, and before whom they were taken. He treated them kindly, and then passed them on to his Khalifa Abdullah, who was dealing with all the prisoners. Abdullah, as the whole world has learnt since, was a different kind of man. He at once impressed Ohrwalder as being cruel and ignorant. He invited them to become Moslems, and brusquely told them that if they refused they had only death to expect. That was their first taste of the power of their captors; they were destined to have many more. Repeatedly they were taken before the Mahdi. He pressed them to embrace Mahdism. When they refused, he at first said, "May God lead you into the way of truth," but when they continued to refuse, he grew angry. They were asked if they preferred death. With Christian heroism they answered that they did. Then a council of war was held to consider what steps should be taken with them. The general verdict was in favour of death, and this fate—which all of the prisoners would have welcomed—was only averted by one of the council remembering an old statute of Mohammed's. According to Moslem law it is not lawful to kill priests who have not offered armed resistance. It was this which saved the life of Father Ohrwalder, and accounts for his presence in civilisation to-day.

We cannot follow the prisoners through their years of weary captivity. Death soon claimed some of their number. The indignities they were subjected to crushed the spirit out of them; and miserable food, abominably filthy surroundings, and disease did the rest. For a long time they were confined in a prison—infested with vermin and lacking all sanitary conveniences. Before a month, three of them had passed away—the mission-carpenter and two of the sisters. The survivors were three men and three women. They themselves had to sew the corpses of their comrades in mats and drag them to the door. Then they had to pay, or bribe, slaves to carry them away. But they never had the satisfaction of knowing that the remains of their friends were decently interred. Father Ohrwalder always suspected that they were merely dragged away to rot upon the surface of the ground. It is difficult for the reader to realise in his mind even a faint picture of those terrible days. He must remember that the Mahdists had lost all trace of the better tenets of Islamism. They were developing into mere savages, dreaming of a day when they would drive Turk and Christian into the sea and overrun the world under the banner of the Mahdi. Their conceit and ignorance knew no bounds. They called themselves the elect of God. They sent letters to the British at Cairo to accept Mahdism or prepare to perish. They even went so far as to talk of the probable "conversion" of the Sovereigns of Europe. Frenzy ran wild. They shouted and shrieked every day, and invoked curses upon the British, calling them "dogs" and "infidels." They made no distinction between Austrians and British. The Austrian captives were white, they were Christians, and that was enough. As a consequence they were subjected to every form of violence and insult. One extract out of scores in Ohrwalder's book, will give an idea of their bitter lot. Two or three of the party were at this moment lying sick. The Dervishes broke in upon them. "The crosses which the sisters wore round their necks were wrenched off and broken to pieces with axes. Sister Consetti Consi, who was then one of the strongest, flew at these cruel intruders, and made them wonder at the boldness of a poor weak woman. Some of them entered with drawn swords, and, pointing their lances at her bosom, threatened her with instant death if she made the slightest resistance; but she answered, 'You are dogs, and not men!' whereupon one of those standing near her gave her a blow on the face, which broke several of her teeth and made her mouth pour with blood."

Instances of this brutal treatment could be multiplied. Yet through it all these noble souls remained Christians. They could have purchased a nominal kind of freedom by a simple acceptance of Mahdism. Here, again, it is necessary to point out that Mahdism was not necessarily Mohammedanism. The celebration of the Prophet's birthday was forbidden by the Mahdi. The pilgrimage to Mecca was abandoned. A Mahdist soldier was even put in prison for saying that "God was higher than the Mahdi." But whatever the creed they were asked to accept the captives declined it. They put their trust in One higher than Mahdi or Mohammed, and were willing to face even death rather than recant and give their enemies chance to gloat over the surrender of a Christian's faith in his God. What the sisters had to face was even worse than death. At last they were parted, and this is how Father Ohrwalder tells the touching story:—

"That evening (it was after they had definitely refused again to become followers of the Mahdi), some thirty men, mounted upon horses, broke into our humble abode, and said they had orders to remove the sisters, assuring us with mock modesty that no harm should happen to them. We, however, well knew what would happen, and absolutely refused to be separated, saying that if they wished they could kill us, and cut off our heads, but that it would be a cruel shame for the Mahdi to ill-treat these poor women after all his solemn promises and assurances. But of what avail could our protests be against brutal violence! They forced their way in, seized the sisters, and took them before the Khalifa Abdullah. He and Khalifa Sherif used every means of cruel barbarity to shake the faith of these poor sisters, and Sherif,* seizing a pair of scissors which one of the sisters was carrying, cut the partition between her nostrils. The Khalifa's wives also howled and insulted them in every base way, and then they were distributed amongst the Emirs."

That was the terrible break-up of their little party. Henceforth, they went their own way, each man and each woman a slave or servant in some powerful man's household. It is best to draw a veil over what happened during those weary years, until death came and claimed all but two. They accompanied the Dervishes as they removed from town to town, and were finally taken to Omdurman, which from a collection of huts grew into the biggest city in the Soudan, and, perhaps, the vilest and most iniquitous spot upon earth. When Khartoum fell, and Gordon was killed, it was to Omdurman the captives were taken. Many of them were women from the harems of the Egyptian officers, and for days and days afterwards the city was sunk in the most abominable profligacy which the sun was ever doomed to gaze upon.

* Sherif is from a word meaning "noble," "aristocratic," "respected"!

However, all things come to an end. The captives longed for death, and not unnaturally. Ohrwalder says: "How fortunate we thought those who had been killed in battle, or had died of starvation or disease! We even envied the lot of those who had been massacred in Khartoum. The anguish of death had been but momentary, and now all suffering and pain were over, while we seemed to have passed through a hundred deaths. We had witnessed the destruction of cities, the annihilation of armies, the slaughter of thousands, and the ruthless massacre and bloodshed of innocent people; man's dignity trodden underfoot, and human life valued far below that of a goat. And after all this, we must live and die forgotten and unknown, our last resting-place a strange land, and our bodies, in all likelihood, food for hyenas. Thus we longed for death to remove us from these scenes of perpetual cruelty and oppression. Our nerves had become so strained that the slightest knock at the door would make us start, the sound of the great onbeia* made us positively tremble." After twelve years there was an end to it. All were dead but Ohrwalder and a sister. Through a friendly Arab they opened communication with Cairo. A huge reward was offered the Arab if he could provide them with camels and smuggle them out of the city. Slatin Pasha had already escaped by precisely the same method. The Arab consented, camels were procured, and late one night, when Omdurman was wrapped in slumber, Ohrwalder and the lady crept out beneath the shadows and took their flight. For days and days they hurried on. They avoided the trade route, and kept to the rocks. They rested and watched by day, and pushed on by night. They rode from Omdurman to Murat, five hundred miles, in seven days. At Murat they were at an Egyptian outpost and were safe. Then they were passed on, and eventually reached Cairo, three weeks after their midnight flight from the dread city of the Khalifa.

Charles Neufeld is the last of the prisoners we shall consider. He is a Prussian by birth, and a trader. He fought with the British in Egypt, and had the confidence of the Government. Finally, after the rise of the Mahdi, and when the far Soudan was rapidly falling into his hands, Neufeld left Egypt on a trading expedition. He had a caravan, and he was the only European with it. There is little doubt now that someone in his party was a traitor. The caravan was taken off the ordinary route, ostensibly to avoid the Dervishes. As a matter of fact, it ran right into the track of the Dervishes. The little party were surprised. There was a fight and they were captured. The man who led the caravan was killed. If he was a traitor he paid for it with his life. Neufeld was taken to Omdurman, and spent twelve years in captivity.

His experiences were simply awful. Reading them, one marvels that he lived through them. He must have had a frame of iron, and nerves of steel. Certainly, he was a brave man. He held the Dervishes in deepest contempt, and seemed to delight in showing it. The usual question was put to him, and he was offered the choice of Mahdism or death. He chose the latter, and gave the Mahdists a piece of his mind. He was carried out to be hanged. The populace assembled in thousands to gloat over his agony. He was lifted up to the gallows, and the rope was put round his neck. His arms were bound. All that was necessary now was to pull the stool from beneath his feet and he would be left hanging. For hours the Dervishes did not do this. They kept him there, standing with the rope round his neck, cursing and jeering at him. For his part he defied them. A fluent Arabic speaker, he answered all their insults, and lashed them into a frenzy of hate and passion. His bravery must have struck his captors. Any way, he was granted a reprieve, and was then taken before learned men to be instructed in Mahdism. He refused time after time. As a consequence he led a terrible life. He was heavily chained, both hands and ankles. He was thrown upon the ground and flogged to within an ace of death. He was struck upon the head, spat upon, pushed and shoved about, persecuted as few mortals in this world were ever before persecuted. But nothing broke his spirit. The chains broke into his flesh, and then the wounds swelled over, with the iron beneath. Not even prison-life crushed him—and the prison at Omdurman was worse than the famous Black Hole at Calcutta. It was crowded to suffocation with masses of fighting brutes. There was no ventilation, no sanitary arrangements, and little air. If a man fell down he was trampled to death. If the noise became too great the gaolers appeared, and with great whips beat the crowd into silence. When morning came, and the door was opened, everybody rushed out panting for a breath of air. Neufeld suffered years of this terrible agony. Then he was permitted to have a small hut for himself. But his chains were never removed. For twelve long years he wore them, and when at last they were taken off he had grown so accustomed to them that he hardly knew how to walk without them.

Slatin Pasha and the Austrian missionaries were, of course, captives about this time. For Slatin, Neufeld seems to have no love. He contrasts their respective lots bitterly, and says he might also have had his sufferings mitigated if he had become a follower of the new religion. Slatin, doubtless, did all he could for his less fortunate companions in exile, but it must be remembered that he had no power of his own. He was himself a prisoner, and though he was not bound, and had a certain amount of liberty, the Khalifa was very suspicious of him, and on several occasions threw him in chains. On the other hand, Ohrwalder was on pretty much the same level as Neufeld, and had many opportunities of seeing him. He did what he could for him, and Neufeld remembers it to-day with gratitude. He used to go to the prison and take him food, and if he obtained any money he always had a kindly thought for the prisoner against whom every Dervish hand seemed to be raised. This was the one gleam of brightness in poor Neufeld's dark days of suffering.

The story of his rescue is deeply romantic. He had not the luck to escape as the others had. He was too heavily chained, and too keenly watched. He had to abide to the end. It was an anxious time when it was known in Omdurman that the Sirdar, with a powerful force, was marching upon the city. The old-time fanaticism of the Mahdists was leaving them. At Firket, at the Atbara, and at other places, they had seen that their star was no longer in the ascendant. They talked a great deal of driving the British into the Nile, but in their hearts they were conscious that the day of retribution was at hand. Poor Neufeld must have prayed for the Dervishes to be defeated. At times, too, he must have been haunted by the fear that they would kill all their prisoners first, as a final act of revenge, and on the principle that "dead men tell no tales." Even yet, it is a source of wonder to those acquainted with them that this was not done. It is only explained on the ground that in the confusion the captives were overlooked.

At last the Sirdar was opposite Omdurman. The Dervishes were defeated. Ten thousand of their dead were left upon the brown sand. Then the victors marched into the city. A rush was made for the "saier," or prison. Neufeld was found alive, heavily shackled, too full of emotion to speak, too weak and faint to stand. The officers crowded round him. The Sirdar gripped him by the hand. Then he was carried to a gunboat, and the irons he had worn for twelve years were knocked off by a blacksmith. At first he could hardly realise that he was free, but kind hands and sympathetic hearts, in the place of callous brutality, speedily made him realise that it was no dream, but a blessed reality.

Thus did he turn his back upon the Soudan. To him, at any rate, as well as to Slatin and the Austrian missionaries, it is a land of bitter and dread memories. The Soudan will always live in history as the scene of one of the greatest religious impositions of all time. To those who wasted years of precious life in it as captives, its very name will be synonymous with all that is brutal, savage, and degrading.

It is surely some consolation to them, as well as to us, to reflect that those awful days have passed for ever. Omdurman has fallen. The Khalifa is a refugee, fighting no longer for power and dominion, but flying to escape the penalty of his rebellion against the Government. Mahdism is dead. Khartoum is rising from its ashes. Trade and commerce are reviving, and when the Soudan is once again opened up to missionary enterprise the glad tidings of the Gospel will fall upon the wounded country like balm upon open sores. May the day soon come!

The Nile.

It flows through old hushed Egypt and its sands, Like some grave, mighty thought threading a dream,

And times and things, as in that vision, seem Keeping along it their eternal stands,—
Caves, pillars, pyramids, the shepherd bands
That roamed through the young world, the glory extreme

Of high Sesostris, and that southern beam,

The laughing queen that caught the world's great hands.

Then comes a mightier silence, stern and strong,
As of a world left empty of its throng,

And the void weighs on us; and then we wake,
And hear the fruitful stream lapsing along 'Twixt villages, and think how we shall take
Our own calm journey on for human sake.

LEIGH HUNT.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

XI.—NATURE AND IMMORTALITY.

WE are, perhaps, too apt to think of Wordsworth's life as too calm, retired and equable to leave much room for the influence of the ministries of sorrow, but it would be a great mistake to suppose that he had no real share in that inevitable heritage of human experience. On February 6th, 1805, his noble and beloved brother John perished by shipwreck on the Shambles of Portland Head, and Wordsworth learned, with a deep personal pang, that Nature has a message for the heart of man of sternness and rigour, as well as of love and joy. "I feel," he writes, "that there is something cut out of my life which cannot be restored."

His Elegiac Stanzas, suggested by a picture of Peele Castle in a time of storm, are but the poet's setting of the same thought. After speaking of the picture as he would have painted it, when he had seen the castle, many years before, the centre of a smiling and peaceful scene, he continues:

"So once it would have been—'tis so no more,
I have submitted to a new control,
A power is gone which nothing can restore,
A deep distress hath humanised my soul.
Not for a moment could I now behold
A smiling sea, and be what I have been;
The feeling of my loss will ne'er be old:
This which I know, I speak with mind serene."

The poem, however, does not end on this pessimistic note.

But welcome fortitude, and patient cheer,
And frequent sights of what is to be borne!
Such sights, or worse, as are before me here—
Not without hope we suffer and we mourn."

Or, as the same thought of "cheer" is put in the prose of one of the letters: "A thousand times have I asked myself, 'Why was he taken away?' . . . Why have we sympathies that make the best of us so afraid of inflicting pain and sorrow, which yet we see dealt about so lavishly by the Supreme Governor? Why should our notions of right towards each other, and to all sentient beings within our influence, differ so widely from what appears to be His notion and rule, if everything were to end here? Would it not be blasphemy to say that, upon the supposition of the thinking principle being destroyed by death, however inferior we may be to the great Cause and Ruler of things, we have more of love in our nature than He has? The thought is monstrous; and yet how to get rid of it, except upon the supposition of another and a better world, I do not see."

I propose in this paper to leap away, however, from Wordsworth for a space, though I will return to him before closing. Since his day much has happened to give a new complexion to the problem of death and immortality. Science has been busy; the thought and the fact of evolution have taken possession of the human mind never to relax their hold, and it is forced upon us to inquire how far the new science warrants the old faith of the poet. Does its "tuition" support his intuition? Wordsworth owed no little to Butler, but undoubtedly the question of the survival of the soul has passed into a new phase since Butler wrote and laid down his argument for immortality from what he calls the soul's indiscerptibility—that is, a man's incapability of being destroyed by the dissolution or separation of parts. "We see by experience," he says, "that men may lose their limbs, their organs of sense, and even the greatest part of their bodies, and yet remain the same living agents." True, so far, but touch the brain, or take out the heart, and what then? The close correspondence traced since Butler's day between body and soul, between mind-movements and molecular processes, has largely made that argument obsolete. Any apologetic for immortality to-day must abandon such a style of proof, and go deeper.

What, then, has our very latest science—our most serious exploration of Nature—to say about Death? It seems clearly to tell us that—

1. Death has not always been. There was once, for an indefinite period in this world, life without death. It is well known that the evolution of living forms begins with the one-celled organism, called indifferently, Protozoon, or Amœba. These are not structureless as was once supposed. The microscope, with its continually growing powers, has discovered traces of a most subtle, delicate, intricate, and infinitesimal structure within the smallest and simplest living cells. Within the nucleus, or nucleolus—the innermost portion, (answering to the yolk of the egg as distinguished from the white)—organisation, albeit of the faintest sort, has been detected. Now, as long as they continue one-celled these organisms do not die. As Newman Smyth writes, in a suggestive little book on, “The Place of Death in Evolution,” from which I mainly borrow these considerations: “The first one-celled organism, does not exist for a season, produce another, like itself, and then decay and die and totally disappear. It lives on. It divides itself into two cells, each like itself, living thus a double life. This process of simple division and multiplication is carried on for a number of successive generations without the appearance of any dead ancestor, or anything like a dead body. The simplest forms do not die, they bud and divide, increase and multiply.” Weismann ridicules the idea that there is any natural necessity for death. He regards “the power of living on indefinitely, when the vital processes have once begun, as the fundamental peculiarity of living matter.”

2. When Death comes in Nature, it is as the invariable concomitant, or condition of some larger and fuller life. Death appears first in the interest of complexity—that is when one-celled organisms became multi-cellular, or many-celled. Then you have what are called germinal, or soul-cells, as distinguished from somatic, or body cells. Death is therefore the price paid by the organism for a body. The somatic, or body cells, lost the power of indefinite multiplication, and so acquired mortality for the benefit of the other cells. They died that the others might live on. So was mortality acquired as an advantageous adaptation to the great ends of life. But death appears, secondly, in the interests of the fuller life of sexuality. It occurs naturally, so science shows, in the course of a change from a non-sexual method of cell-division to the method which involves sex. “With the rudiments of sex appear also the beginnings of death; or to put it in another way—with the entrance of this new method for the enrichment and diversification of life through sex, enters also the law of decay and death for that remainder of life which is not caught up into this higher potency of Nature’s fertilisation. By its timely coming, death completes Nature’s first work of keeping in the field the forms capable of the better life, and its further development.” Death is thus associated with service. It comes not as enemy to life, but as friend and helper.

3. If Death has had a beginning, Death may have an end. It is not an eternal necessity or expedient. And if it has come in for service, it may go out when, and if, that service is done. As Smyth well suggests: Nature does not keep too long in her economy any useless servant—so that “Dying, I may escape from death,

And life eternal gain.”

There seems to be a distinct tendency towards perfection in organic evolution—“a dramatic tendency” as Fiske calls it. Does not Evolution seem to have done with the body and to have fairly begun with the soul? There seems little or no reason to expect the appearance on earth of any physical organisation superior to man. The evolutionary energy must therefore branch off in another direction. It has always sought the higher, so why should it stop now?—and the elimination of death in the region of spirit appears to be one of the directions in which the great Impulse moves. “The moment biology lifts up its eye from its experiments and begins to philosophise, it perceives that life has a larger spiritual background,” and even Weismann, while stoutly maintaining the necessity of a purely mechanical conception of the processes of Nature as alone justifiable, writes: “I, nevertheless, believe that there is no occasion for this reason to renounce the existence of a directive power, or to disown it; only we must not imagine this to interfere directly in the mechanism of the universe, but to be rather behind the latter as the final cause of the mechanism.” Or to quote Fiske—(my purpose is to mass the evidence of leading scientific thinkers)—“According to Mr. Spencer, the divine energy which is manifested throughout the knowable universe is the same energy that wells up in consciousness. Speaking for myself, I can see no insuperable difficulty in the notion that at some period in the evolution of Humanity this divine spark may have acquired sufficient concentration and steadiness to survive the wreck of material forms and endure for ever. Such a crowning wonder seems to me no more than the fit climax to a creative work that has been ineffably beautiful and marvellous in all its myriad stages.”

I am aware that all this is but dim, conjectural, at best, probable. I am aware, also, that the true cruz of the problem is the survival of the individual life. May there not be more in the fundamental principle of what we call conditionalism, or “Life in Christ,” than we have allowed or imagined? Is Immortality the right of all, or only of those who have “survival value?” I but throw out the question—I dare not dogmatise in any measure. Does the spiritual worth and content of life determine its chances of future continuance? Is the life endless because it is worthy of being perpetuated? In this connection I come back to Wordsworth. Most pathetically he wrote, towards the close of life here: “It is indeed a deep satisfaction to hope and believe that my poetry will be, while it lasts, a help to the cause of virtue and truth, especially among the young. As for myself, it seems now of little moment how long I may be remembered. When a man pushes off in his little boat into the great seas of Infinity and Eternity, it surely signifies little how long he is kept in sight by watchers from the shore.” But had not Wordsworth that energy of spiritual personality which should secure for him not merely posthumous, but also personal immortality? The concluding words of Mr. Myers’ fine monograph are to the point: “Surely of him, if of any one, we may think as of a man who was so in accord with Nature, so at one with the very soul of things, that there can be no Mansion of the Universe which shall not be to him a home, no Governor who will not accept him among His servants, and satisfy him with love and peace.” His own words, in the same strain, are the best with which to close this twilight meditation. They are from a poem composed at Grasmere during an evening walk after a stormy day, and when the poet had just read in a newspaper that the death of Mr. Fox (Pitt’s great rival) was hourly expected.

“A Power is passing from the earth
To breathless Nature’s dark abyss;
But when the great and good depart,
What is it more than this—

That man, who is from God sent forth,
Doth yet again to God return?—
Such ebb and flow must ever be,
Then wherefore should we mourn?”

There can be no demonstration of the life to come. The sum of science and of poetry on this insistent question is not more—but not less—than this, that it is ours simply to trust the great Purpose, and to leave ourselves in the hands of the all-wise Purposer whether for life or for death.

Literature that is Helpful to the Cultivation of the Devout Life.

THE title at the head of this article opens into a very wide, various, and fascinating field of inquiry. What is that subject? Let us look at it more clearly. “Literature that is helpful to the cultivation of the devout life.” Now, though the title does not lay down any very clear and distinct proposition, it does imply a good deal; and to my mind the most significant and practical part of the subject consists in what it implies or presupposes, and it will be well to linger a little on these implications. It would seem that by the very title of our subject we are committed, first of all, to the position that

I. We are called to live The Devout Life; it is something to live for. Saintliness is the goal, and growth in saintliness the daily requirement. Saintliness, both word and thing, may, in certain quarters, perhaps, be somewhat at a discount, and want rehabilitating. To grow saints should be the chief pre-occupation and solicitude of the Church. Saintliness is the most real part of the man who possesses it—more real and vital to him than his muscular strength or mental grasp, his stores of knowledge or social distinction. Though unconscious of itself, as “Moses wist not that his face did shine,” it will stand confessed and make its presence felt. If there is one thing we should be jealous of, it is, that other Churches should produce more saints, and saints of a higher type than our own. Here there may well be a holy rivalry. We are thankful for our succession of legislators, administrators, scholars, able preachers; let us be even more thankful and solicitous for the uninterrupted succession of our saints. A Church which yields them in abundance is neither dead nor dying. To it belongs the future.

“The healing of the world
Is in its nameless saints. Each separate star Seems nothing, but a myriad scattered stars Break up the night and make it beautiful.”

BAYARD TAYLOR.

We Nonconformists do not make half enough of our saints. After Dr. Reynolds’ death one wrote, “If Congregationalism had its saints he would be one of them.” One is ready to ask, and why should not Congregationalism have its roll of saints, and the name of Dr. Reynolds be inscribed thereon? Let us have our Hagiography—our Connexional saint-roll. We do not want saints canonised by Conferential authority or universal church-suffrage, but if our judgment and heart tell us that such a one really walked with God, and lived the Christly life, let us cherish the memory of the departed; and even, if to ourselves and for ourselves, we commemorate the day of his translation by studying his character and praying for grace to follow him even as he followed Christ, what harm can come of it—or, rather, what but good can come of it?

II. The Devout Life needs to be cultivated. The Christian life must not be left to grow of itself like a plant by the hedge-side, or make its own way like a foundling. Something more is required than to leave the religious side of our nature to take the impress of the chances and contingencies of daily life, or than even passively to receive the shape and stamp of our Church ordinances. Shall a man intelligently busy himself with the secular business of his life, and leave what is, after all, the chief business, to get itself done as best it can by mere rule-of-thumb procedure? Here, surely, if anywhere, there should be some reasonable correspondence between means and ends. In striving to become men and women patterned after Christ, there is room—yea, urgent need for—plan and purpose; for thought, strenuous endeavour and perseverance. In perseverance, said Christ, shall ye win your souls. Exercise thyself unto godliness, says Paul, i.e., Do the work of a gymnast in order to acquire a practical, operative, cultive piety. Longfellow's youth carried a banner with the strange device, "Excelsior." So all Christians should be excelsiorists. Or, to change the figures, there must be a daily putting off—even if the putting off be infirmities and ignorances—and a daily putting on—a daily climbing the ladder Jacob saw. And here let me say that no theory of Christian perfection is either Scripturally or psychologically defensible which checks the desire to mount higher, much less which leaves a man to congratulate himself that he is at the top.

Nowhere have I found these first-truths of the practical Christian life more clearly and finely expressed than in this sonnet of George Macdonald:

"Go thou into thy closet; shut thy door
And pray to Him in secret; He will hear,
But think not thou, by one wild bound to clear
The numberless ascensions, more and more,
Of starry stairs that must be climbed, before
Thou comest to the Father's likeness near,
And bendest down to kiss the feet so dear
That, step by step, their mounting flights passed o'er.
Be thou content if on thy weary need
There falls a sense of showers and of the spring;
A hope that makes it possible to fling
Sickness aside, and go and do the deed;
For highest aspiration will not lead
Unto the calm beyond all questioning."

Yes, "Enter thou thy closet," and take with you your Bible and some other good helpful book—for

III. Books may help you in the Cultivation of the Devout Life,—will help you to climb the ladder Jacob saw. Due provision, and at stated times, should be made for the deepening of the spiritual life. What you read then and there will not be for the sake of information, much less for amusement, but for casting light on the upward path, and gaining mounting power. The "closet"—whether it be a place, or the act of retirement within the farthest sacred recesses—the penetralia—of a man's own spirit, is above all, the place and means for generating force and gaining motive-power. Nor would we interpret the word "closet" too literally. While elbowing his way through the crowd on London Bridge, a man may commune with the unseen. Still, a Christian man should have a place where "prayer is wont to be made," and as far as possible have his stated seasons for retirement. But here again, we allow a good deal of liberty to the individual as to time and method. We would not post ourselves at the closet-door, watch in hand, to see how long a time is spent within. What shall go on at the other and inner side of the closed door I know not. What particular methods of soul-cultivation you may practise, it is not for me to conjecture, much less to enjoin. The retirement is too sacred for a stranger to penetrate, and by penetrating violate. If you should take with you a Book of Devotion, and use it to set the key to your own prayers and meditations, who—if you find help therefrom—shall condemn you? Certainly not I. In reading the life of Dale of Birmingham, I find him at one time comparing notes with Rev. P. T. Forsyth, the writer of that intensely spiritual and helpful little book, "The Holy Father and the Living Christ,"—comparing notes, I say, about some prized volume of ancient devotions. To me this passage was significant of much. I have a volume recently published, of much merit on various grounds, entitled, "Great Souls at Prayer; Fourteen Centuries of Prayer, Praise and Aspiration. From St. Augustine to Christina Rossetti and Robert Louis Stevenson." If for the 24th of the month you were to use the prayer of Thomas Becon, 1511-1567, or this short one composed as early as 700, "Help us, O Lord, to flourish like pure lilies in the courts of Thine house, and to show forth to the faithful the fragrance of good works, and the example of a godly life, through Thy mercy and grace, Amen," you might not be disadvantaged thereby, or your own prayers hindered. I have seen a Phillips Brooks' Calendar for the present year, designed to be helpful to the Christian by profitably leading his meditations. No writer of modern times has said wiser, truer, or more helpful things than Phillips Brooks. This is what is culled from him under date of 24th Jan.: "It is while you are patiently toiling at the little tasks of life that the meaning and shape of the great whole of life dawns upon you. It is while you are resisting little temptations that you are growing strong." This seems to me eminently a word in season, and one thinks the Phillips Brooks' Calendar would not be out of place if it were hung up in the place where prayer is wont to be made.

Surely there are few who will at this time of day maintain that we must be "men of one book," in the sense that all other books are superfluous. If there are any still left who shall say that our fathers did their work with the Bible and the Hymn Book, and why should not we? we would remark that by including the Hymn Book they give themselves away, for the Hymn Book, at any rate, the one we have now, embodies a considerable body of the best Hymnal literature selected on the most catholic principles. Let us not be narrower than the Bible itself. Paul wrote to Timothy, "Quench not the Spirit; despise not prophesyings; prove all things, hold fast that which is good." These are not the disconnected aphorisms they are sometimes taken to be. They may be liberally rendered: "Do not extinguish the spiritual nature within you, by suffering that part of your powers to be atrophied. Despise not the men who live in the invisible world, and bear testimony to the things which they have seen and known. Yet take not all utterances of all prophets as of equal authority; test them; and such as prove in the trial beneficent by animating human life, and making it nobler and better, to these hold fast; that is the test—by their fruits ye shall know them." Perhaps we may not have seen quite as much as this in these precepts of Paul, as often as we have read them, but minted afresh for us by Lyman Abbott (for I have been quoting from his recent little book, "The Soul's Quest") and through his hand, the practical truths they teach stand out fresh and sharply-cut. This particular instance may suffice to show the kind of service good books are continually doing for us—the seers make us see,—they remind and retranslate the old truths for us. "The Lord hath yet more light and truth to break forth from His written word," said John Robinson, in his address to the Pilgrim Fathers, and even if we were to believe that God's Spirit has no absolutely fresh light to give, (which were an almost inconceivable supposition) yet good books can help to liberate the light from the letter which so often enshrines and enshrouds it.

And here I am going to quote from a precious letter of John Pulsford, which was published for the first time in the March Number of this Magazine. But first let me say, that Pulsford was a true prophet and seer if ever there was one. A ministerial friend of mine was once present when Pulsford was in the pulpit, and Dr. Guinness Rogers was one of the congregation. My friend said to himself, as he looked from one to the other: Ah, Rogers, you are a man of war! You can give a rousing fighting speech, but you can't make us see as yon Mystic in the pulpit can do. Pulsford's "Quiet Hours" has become, and deservedly so, a classic among those books which are true aids to the Devout life. When this man of deep spiritual insight awaited, in physical feebleness, the Master's call, a relative asked him whether he ever preached now, and his answer was, "Oh no; I wish I could. There was a time when I was unfit to preach—too carnal; but now there is absolutely nothing between me and Christ; but I cannot preach now." It is almost incredible that a man like Pulsford, so gentle, so spiritual, such a teacher of the deep things of God, should, nevertheless, have met with the usual prophet's reward. As the article before referred to tells us, when he was minister in Hull, a sort of Association of ministers waited upon him in a season of deep trial, and the chief of the group solemnly read a document signed by all, cutting him off from their communion.

Similar was the experience of Thomas T. Lynch, another man who, taught of God, saw into the heart of things. When we sing his "Dismiss me not Thy service, Lord," or read his volume of sacred verse, called the "Rivulet," or his "Sermons for my Curates," or his "Letters to the Scattered," who would think that for writing that "Rivulet" he had, so to speak, to pass through deep waters. But it was so. Dr. Campbell, the arch-heresy hunter, was on his track, and James Grant, author of the now forgotten "Heaven My Home," said of it: "There is not, from beginning to end, one particle of vital religion or evangelical piety in it." But the "Rivulet" will flow on when the works of both Grant and Campbell are dried up and forgotten. How time sifts the gold from the dross, and how it makes the wheel of man's reputation go round full circle!

But after this digression let us give the quotation from John Pulsford's unpublished letter we promised.

"I feel sure that there are for every age special centres of revelation and channels of inspiration. . . . In my judgment of books my rule is not to inquire about the writer, but what is written? Does it quicken and enlarge my soul? Does it elevate my mind, kindle my sympathies, and heighten my aspirations?"

Yes, these are the questions. Does, in short, the writer help us to climb, not merely to luxuriate in sentiment and merely dream about climbing? Or, to put it in another way: In the landscape of every Christian life, as in the life of Elijah, there should be the Mount Carmel of achievement—the Mount Horeb of revelation and, too inevitably, there will be the Wilderness of Depression, with its gloomy fateful Juniper tree. Are the books we read such as help us in each experience? Do they urge us to look to the only source of permanent success? To wait for, and secure, the consecration and crown of all our work in the descending fire? Do they help us to be attent to catch the accents of the "still small voice," and see "the land of far distances," (Is. xxxiii.). And, when the blood creeps, and the nerves prick and tingle; and the heart is sick and "all the wheels of Being slow," are they our good angels to revive and hearten us? If so, then God, who fulfils Himself in many ways, is helping us by means of good books.

And now I am reminded by the only other unnoticed word in the title of our subject—the word “literature”—that the field historically widens. Literature is the best that has been thought and written, says Matthew Arnold. But all books designed for edification are not literature. Book after book of a religious kind, as I know full well, issues from the press—well-intentioned, no doubt—but utterly commonplace in thought, and entirely without style and any salt of life. What other fate awaits them than speedily to sink like lead in the waters of oblivion? Other books of the same class that promised and achieved better things, “have had their day, and ceased to be.” We can remember the time when “Heaven our Home,” before mentioned, was all the rage. The books of John Angell James, Dr. Jas. Hamilton, Dr. Vaughan, to mention two or three out of scores that might be instanced, were circulated by thousands. They did much good, too—they served their generation and—fell on sleep. They did not succeed in winning their way into the ranks of the immortals, like Thomas a’Kempis’ “Imitation of Christ,” or they were not admitted into the literature of devotion composed of those select works that, as if by common consent, men recognise as belonging to all time, and as having a message for each generation. The writers of these books may have belonged to divergent schools of thought, but they dealt with the primal needs of man, and the essentials of Christianity, and so, while the fickle and the frail have dropped from the memory of the writers, their books, because they dealt with the things that cannot be shaken, have their reward in being amongst the books that abide.

And now we ought, at this point, to survey the field, and notice one or two of these outstanding, perennially interesting and helpful books. But this pleasant survey must be left to a second paper.

Permit, however, a closing word or two on some recent books which will be found helpful to the devout life. I will make no mention of Dr. Miller, who writes so much that it is impossible to keep up with his output, or of Dr. Gordon, or Andrew Murray. Dr. Denny’s “Gospel Questions and Answers;” Mr. Forsyth’s “Holy Father and the Living Christ,” (before mentioned), and Mr. Jowett’s “From Strength to Strength,” all three belonging to the series named, “Little Books on Religion,” may be unreservedly and strongly recommended. So may a little book by a cultured Congregational minister called, “Christ Come and Coming,” which Rev. R. G. Graham noticed at full length in the Aldersgate Magazine for March. Dr. Walsham How, late Bishop of Wakefield, has left behind him a book called, “The Closed Door,” which the Spectator rightly praises as “above criticism.” Of Bishop How, the Editor of the British Weekly, in a leader, asked the strange question, whether Bishop Walsham How was not a perfect man? and proceeded to canvass his life and character so full of labour, and yet so calm, his humility, his utter unselfishness. The conclusion arrived at was that he must be enrolled amongst the saints of God. He was an Anglican Bishop, but, thank God! saintliness knows no limitations. It is Christ’s, and we are Christ’s, and therefore Christ’s saints belong to us. There is one passage from the “Closed Door” which I will venture to give, because my brethren, like myself, will feel that, with our hands and minds constantly so full of business and care, there is great danger lest we should be ecclesiastically busy and spiritually slothful.

“Scantiness of Devotion.” Prayer (in the wider sense of all acts of devotion) is the great spiritual act of our lives. It is spirit communing with spirit. It is entering behind the veil and being face to face with God. It is the voice of the spiritual life, “the spirit’s vital breath,” the very life of the life. Spiritual life can no more grow without devotion than the bodily life without breathing. But how much time do we give to devotion? One who had no sins to confess, no weakness to deplore, no perplexities to lay before God for solution, spent whole nights in prayers. We cannot. I have known one woman who for many years spent two hours in the morning and three at night daily in devotion. Mr. Congreve, at the Plymouth Church Congress, told of a Wesleyan whose life grew into wonderful sanctity, and who was able to spend six hours a day, and sometimes a whole night, in devotion. Which of us could do that even for once? But is it not sadly often true, when the spiritual life is not thriving, that our cause is to be sought here? There is little prayer. Of course, there are forms of prayer, but of real, earnest supplication, how scant a measure! Oh! we sigh over our deadness and coldness, and lack of life in religion, when all the time it is easy enough to point to the cause. A short, hurried prayer in the morning—a longer, perhaps, but dull and weary, or even sleepy, prayer at night—is not this cause enough? Such may not be the actual habit, but how often sloth steps in and drags the soul down to this meagre measure. Prayer is a poor thing unless there is at least time enough to realise calmly God’s presence, and to wait upon Him. Public prayer is very blessed; but public prayer can never make amends for scantiness of private prayer. Oh! how humbling it is to find we can read a light book for hours without weariness—talk with an earthly friend for hours without weariness—yet half an hour with God! oh! how long it seems! Can we really love One we care so little to be with?”

EDITOR.

The Duty of Living Joyously.

By REV. J. PEARCE.

N one of his little books, Dr. Miller writes, "They are in the habit of saying in the East, that in India the flowers yield no fragrance, the birds do not sing, and the women never smile. In a sense it is almost literally true. Flowers, even of the richest hues, give out but little perfume, birds of brightest plumage utter only piercing notes instead of sweet songs; and the faces of the women are sad as they go about enduring their sorrowful lot." All this is more than sad. Scentless flowers, songless birds, smileless women are phenomena with which we prefer to be unfamiliar; and yet, when we come to look out on life, we find too many of our fellows with drooped heads, sorrowful faces, songless lips. No sunshine seems to fall athwart their path, no flowers spring up in their life-garden, no angels issue from the Eternal World to give them cheer. It is all too plain that they have misread life's significance, misapprehended God's will concerning them, yielded to the tyranny of circumstances, and come to believe that a sorrowful lot is their portion here. It is a pity that so many Christian lives should thus be robbed of their brightness, for the flowers of God ought never to be scentless, the birds of God ought never to be without songs, the children of God ought always to have a shining face. Christianity inculcates joy as a duty, sets it before us as a something for which we ought earnestly to strive. In His valedictory address, Jesus bequeathed joy to His followers as a priceless heirloom that ought never to pass out of the family, and as He spoke thus of joy when only a stone's throw from Calvary, He has taught us that our joy is altogether independent of circumstances. That joy is not worth having which is blown away by the winds of adversity. "It is like the summer birds that visit our clime while the flowers bloom and the skies are warm and the earth wears her robes of green. They pour out their songs amid universal gladness, singing while all voices sing. But when the first chill autumn days come, they are gone, and when all is bare and bleak and the storms beat, they are no here to be seen. Anyone can rejoice when all things go well. We want the birds that will stay and sing in our bosom in the depth of winter. We want a joy that will live under the heaviest snows of trial, like those flowers which do not perish even under the heaviest drifts, and which appear in sweet bloom when the snow melts away in the spring." This is the joy Jesus has bequeathed to us—a light that shines resplendently in the blackest night, a peace the world's worst hubbub need not disturb, a gladness no man can take from us, except by our own consent, a secret heaven which may still be ours when all hell's myrmidons have fought their best against us. When the crown of thorns is on our head we can be wearing underneath it a crown of purest bliss. When the sackcloth covers our body, our heart can wear the garment of praise. No excuse can be framed for our failure to win joy. Gloom is not a necessity of our nature, nor a sanction of our religion. We are nowhere commanded to live sorrowfully. Our temperament does not exempt us from the duty of living joyously. There are some who are of a melancholy build. Thomas-like they never see the bright side of things. Tell them it is summer, and they will croak about the coming of winter. They have dwelt so long in the shadows that they have missed the sunshine. Unfortunately, these people imagine that they can never be other than down in the dumps, and they envy the sunny, the hopeful, the buoyant. Now, no one is doomed to a lugubrious life. Our temperament can be corrected, disciplined, and out of the most unpromising soil we can get a precious harvest. Many who have been naturally morbid have triumphed over their nature, and yielding themselves to God's grace, have entered upon a bright and blessed life. There are crowds of angels pressing about every heart-door who only want an invitation to enter, who, admitted, awake a minstrelsy, which is fatal to all phases of melancholy. Past failure does not exempt us from the duty of living joyously. To many, past follies and failures are like ghosts, which ever and anon step out of the darkness and hiss at them to their discomfort and disquietude. And, certainly, the memory of mis-spent days, and of missed chances, is not unlikely to be a kill-joy.

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these—'It might have been.'"

In this matter of misapplying life, we are all more or less guilty. What visions we might have sighted. What dishes we might have tasted. What music we might have heard. What prizes we might have gained. But is there any wisdom in thus dwelling on our failures? Is it not to sin against the present to be always uselessly lamenting the past? Is it not our plain duty to give oblivion to whatever evils we have seriously abjured? Ought we not to look at our old sins in the light of the grace of God? In any case, is it not to add sin to sin, folly to folly, loss to loss, to allow our past failures to deprive us of present blessing? The Apostle never forgave himself for the errors of his life as a Pharisee, but he did not suffer them to keep him back from an abounding life, an abounding love, an abounding joy. He reached forth unto the things which were before. So ought we, if we claim to know the love of God, to resolutely give interment to whatever would keep us from climbing the serene and sunny heights to which our Saviour summons us. It is our duty to live blithely and beautifully, in spite of our sorrows past or present. Archbishop Whately used to say to his friends: "Don't shiver over last year's snow." Some are never more in their element than when exposing old wounds, raking up the sorrows of long ago, calling dead experiences, like ghastly skeletons, back to life. Nothing good can come of these perpetual recitals, these painful shiverings. They are only evidence too obvious that sorrow has not disciplined its subject as it ought, while they also perpetuate misery and keep the soul from the paths of peace. Sorrow, past and present, has not had legitimate treatment from us if it hinders instead of accentuating our joy. Sorrow ought evermore to be a Pisgah summit whence God's Canaan can best be sighted, a golden key opening a door into a fresh apartment of our Father's dwelling, a gracious instructress leading our footsteps out of earth's mazes into Heaven's splendour. Happy they who have learnt the secret of perpetual joy in the school of Christ. Uninterrupted communion with Him means uninterrupted gladness.

Connexional Biography.

REV. WILLIAM EVANS, (1).

THE county of Salop has the honour of a magnificent roll of men given to the history of our beloved Connexion. At one period it was discovered that sixty preachers were in the full ministry who came from among the "proud Salopians." The fine honour of their county gave a first basis of local patriotism which the Christ of Nazareth sanctified by the humble service of His love throughout both rural and urban England.

William Evans, of blessed memory, was among the early names of this roll. He was born at Muckleton, in the parish of Shawbury, July 24, 1828. At the early age of three he was left motherless; his grandparents taking charge of him, while the limited education possible to him was supplied by a godly aunt at the "Dame School." His father was among the first members of the Buttler's Bank Society, in Prees Green Circuit. In his fifteenth year, when attending a week-night prayer meeting, William made the great decision, and led by the Holy Spirit, ultimately entered into the enjoyment of forgiveness of sins and fellowship with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. A life thus commenced in the atmosphere of prayer, simple wrestling, and communings with God, continued its course in the same spirit.

"How he prayed!" was the note of esteem and admiration all through his lengthened ministry. Because he could pray he was quickly sent to preach; he was a supply for both preachers and class-leaders. Before he was raised to full plan he was called into the ministry by his own circuit, and from Dec. 1851, to July 1854, he was the "prophet of honour" to his own country people. The simple qualification that swept the path and secured him hosts of friends, many converts, and marvellous victories, was his power in prayer: "How he prayed!" In this spirit of prayer he realised all other needs, and became a hard student, an industrious preacher, and a brave painstaking superintendent. In succession he was stationed at Lichfield, Bishops Castle, Church Stretton, Leominster, and Weobley, West Bromwich, Brierley Hill, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Stafford, at Macclesfield (twice), Sandbach, Hanley, Tunstall, Lichfield, Ludlow, Darlaston, Tipton, and Crewe. Thus for more than forty-five years as a minister of the Lord Jesus he served his nation and humanity by the will of God. The mere table of his successes as scheduled for Connexional reference appears marvellous in view of all the disadvantages and difficulties he knew, and the distances he must have covered to reach his work, or realise his purpose, but then—"How he prayed!"

I find the following among the quiet notes of his few brief days of rest before his final triumph:—Number of new chapels built, 22; improved, enlarged and altered, 21; new schoolrooms, 12; ministers' houses, 2. Towards these several objects raised £16,200, exclusive of all smaller efforts in cleaning, painting, etc., of properties; 28 fresh places were missioned, and in most instances permanent positions secured for our Connexion. While there were clear additions to our membership after filling up all vacancies, and recovering all losses—decreases by removals, etc., of over 1,100 members. The secret is told in another of his quiet notes, a review of his blessed life: "Revivals were then not the exception, but the rule." He was in that holy triumph of faith that brought increases to God and His people everywhere; always revivals; in some instances, as in the Lye Waste Society, Brierley Hill Circuit, and Lichfield Circuit, there were truly "wonderful works of God." In the latter circuit, as fruit of glorious revival and gracious ingathering, were twenty-two young men, intelligent, earnest and adapted, all placed on the preachers' plan.

In the ranks of our ministry our friend was a progressive preacher, always faithful to the Word of Truth, and preaching plain truth for practical results. He was never stagnant or dull; the influential circuits to which he ministered in his later years testify to both freshness and fruitfulness. He rejoiced in all the advances that were truly Connexional; it was a delight with him to support our institutions, and to sustain and strengthen every position of progress realised; in this all his family participated; his dear wife, now left to mourn her loss, and to whom he was lovingly joined in matrimony in 1859, also his children, entered into all the phases of our Connexional life, and heartily shared in the Sabbath School, Endeavour movement, and all that related to Christ and His Church. While his eldest surviving son is now entering the approved list of our ministers; his youngest son is just on the threshold of his life-work, and is prayerfully and industriously preparing for our ministry. God greatly blessed William Evans. His fine erect form, and agreeable presence, his consecrated spirit overflowing with love to God and men, his lengthened comradeship and holy service gave to him a charm and helpfulness truly apostolic. He did not rest long. Coming to "Our Evangelists' Home Missionary Centre" two years ago, ultimately taking up his residence in the New Manse, Yardley Road, Small Heath, which is the residence of his family, he gradually and peacefully anticipated the rest of God in glory. It was inspiring to hear him whisper that old word of triumph, "Glory! Glory! Glory!" He told us again and again what we all felt and knew, "My confidence is unshaken in my God." In this high tone his life went out to God, May 26, 1899, while spirits sang around him, "Rest, warrior, rest," and on their wings conveyed him to the bowers of bliss and the bosom of his God.

Good and eminent ministers came to his interment. Our Birmingham city ministers carried his remains to the grave. Deputations attended from the District Committee, Crewe, Lichfield, Conference Hall, and other circuits and churches. Many loving and eulogistic letters came from old comrades and brother ministers; wreaths of love and flowers of hope profusely adorned his casket and his tomb. "He rests from his labour, but his works do follow him."

JOSEPH ODELL.

MR. BENJAMIN CREIGH.

BENJAMIN CREIGH, who died at Heaton in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Third Circuit, and whose loss was deeply felt throughout the station and by a wide circle of friends in the district, was born at Whitley, Northumberland, on July 20th, 1827, and finished his course on Sunday, October 25th, 1896, after a long and useful connection with our Church.

It was early in life that our brother first became the subject of religious impressions. Going to hear Benjamin Newton preach, while still a boy, he was convinced of sin and at once began to take an active part in Christian service. From this youthful discipleship he seems, however, to have declined. This may have been in consequence of the removal of his family to Seaton Delaval and the consequent change of associations. Be that as it may, he was at this period for some time outside the Church.

But in the year 1849 came a solemn and awful time to the colliery villages of Northumberland. The cholera broke out and scores of people were suddenly called into eternity. A deep spiritual concern in the neighbourhood was one result of this visitation. On one Sunday evening while Mr. William Bell, a good man, was preaching with exceptional power from the words:—"All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come," Brother Creigh, with twenty-one others, sought and found the Lord. This service is remembered still by old Primitives in the Seaton Delaval Circuit. Some few of the converts are yet with us, but the majority have fallen on sleep.

From this time to his death Benjamin Creigh maintained an unbroken and consistent membership with the Connexion, and for upwards of forty-one years was an able, honoured and successful local preacher. In North Shields, Seaton Delaval and Newcastle Circuits he rendered yeoman service. Three years he spent in Australia and there he sought out our people. The writer has conversed with one who, entering a remote gold digging settlement in that distant land, heard to his surprise as he drew near the sound of a familiar voice. Coming within view of the speaker he found to his delight that it was his old friend Benjamin Creigh preaching the gospel in the open air.

Respecting this open-air preaching, it may be said that Mr. Creigh excelled in this Primitive form of ministry. He was exceedingly useful too in evangelistic services and was successful in winning many to Christ.

An unfinished manuscript, possibly the last he wrote, was found after his death and has about it a pathetic interest. It may be given as illustrating, to some small extent, his pulpit method. The text is Acts xxi. 16, "An Old Disciple."

"I. He is one who has entered upon a Religious course of life.

II. He is one of long standing in Religion.

III. He is one of deep experience in the things of God.

IV. He is one of firm standing in the Church of God.

V. He is one who reflects a distinguished honour upon Christianity.

VI. He is in a state of actual preparation for Heaven."

He was a workman needing not to be ashamed.

As to his private character Brother Creigh was unostentatious, kindly, upright and straightforward in his dealings. The Rev. J. Tweddle, who has known him for many years, in a letter to the writer says:—"There was a deep sincerity manifested in all he did and a rich spiritual tone pervaded all his exercises. He was in close contact with the Divine and breathed the atmosphere of Heaven." Again, "I frequently came into contact with him in his home and was always impressed with his kindly disposition, genial conduct, hearty greeting. To know Brother Creigh in his home was to have a high estimate of him."

The end came suddenly. On one Sabbath he prayed with great unction in the evening prayer meeting. The next Sabbath he praised God before the throne.

The funeral was conducted by the Rev. J. Dodd Jackson, assisted by the Revs. Ralph Fenwick and J. Tweddle, the first named delivering a short address on the life and character of the deceased. A large number of friends assembled and all returned home feeling the poorer that Benjamin Creigh had joined the Church Invisible.

MRS. LINGARD.

SARAH LINGARD, the subject of this memoir, was the daughter of Charles and Mary Ann Rowson, of Panton. She had a thoroughly religious training. Her parents being members of the Free Methodist Church, sought to bring up their children in the right way. When sixteen years of age she was brought into the happy possession of a Saviour's love, and at once went to class, and ever when bodily health and circumstances would allow, she found one of her chief pleasures in attending the house of the Lord.

In 1864 she became the wife of William Lingard, of Tetney, and for thirty-one years was a truly devoted and worthy helpmeet. Mrs. Lingard was a woman of high quality and of sterling worth. So far as strength would allow she manifested fine business capacities. Very often she suffered severely from affliction; but under it all there was a cheerful spirit, and her lot was borne with patience, bowing submissively to the will of God.

It was always a pleasure to be in her company. Though deprived of getting to the sanctuary, and joining in fellowship with the people of God, yet she ever rejoiced to hear of the good meetings that were being held, and of the success of God's cause. Her earnest inquiries about various matters in relation to our own Church was an evidence of the deep interest she took in the Connexion's welfare. Any appeal made in behalf of any religious or philanthropic movement always met with a generous response. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Lingard has been for years a favourite place of the ministers, who at all times have been welcome to share their hospitality and kindness; and a large number of these ministers who have travelled in the circuit, and others, have borne testimony to her noble Christian character and womanly virtues. As the time of her departure drew near she became richer in experience, and her prospects for the land that lies beyond became brighter. There was the clearest conception of her being received into the immediate presence of her Saviour. On October 28, 1895, at the age of fifty-eight, she peacefully passed away to the land where there shall be no more pain.

A husband, an aged mother, and several brothers and sisters are left to mourn her loss. May the prospect of a re-union ever be to them a source of comfort.

W. HAYTON.

MR. THOMAS HORNLEY.

THE Pocklington Circuit has suffered great loss through the death of Mr. T. Hornley, of Melbourne. For many years he has been one of the leading officials and truest friends of the circuit. He was converted in 1857, and at once joined our Society at Melbourne, where he has spent the whole of his life, and from the first his aim was to sustain a good reputation and build up a high Christian character, which he succeeded in doing. A short time before he died he said: "I have tried to live a pure life." Although one of the most loyal Primitive Methodists, his sympathies were broad, and he could at any time give the right hand of fellowship to any Church and rejoice at its success. His geniality and upright conduct won for him the respect and high opinion of all classes.

As a local preacher for over thirty-eight years, his services have been highly appreciated, and made a blessing to those who have listened to him. For more than thirty years he was a class-leader, and tended and watched over his flock with great care, and his wise and timely counsel has helped to strengthen and guide the life of those who have been beneath his charge. He was sober, thoughtful, and retiring, never seeking office, and yet he has been honoured in holding the highest offices of the circuit, and on several occasions has been sent to the District Meeting, and once to the Conference. Not only did the Society and the circuit of which he formed a part share his sympathies and support, but the whole Connexion. The ministry had no truer friend, and one of the joys of his life was to be in the presence of a minister of Jesus Christ. For many years both he and his devoted wife have found their highest pleasure in entertaining both itinerant and local preachers, and numbers of letters have been received from ministers who have travelled in the circuit, and others who have known him, also from officials, bearing testimony to his Christian character and real worth. His life was one of evenness and steady perseverance, and his death calm and trustful. The end came unexpectedly. Having caught a chill, other symptoms followed, and after nine days' illness on May 23 he fell asleep. The funeral was largely attended, and the services were conducted by Revs. S. Stubbings and T. Tanfield. The vicar of the parish showed very great kindness in allowing them to go into the church; thus the solemn rites were conducted in the church and at the grave-side without any restriction whatever. Having sat with him as a member of the School Board, and known him as a respectable member of society, the vicar showed his respect further by preaching a memorial sermon, and making reference to his useful life.

On Sunday, May 30, a large audience met to take part in a memorial service, conducted by Rev. S. Stubbings, which was of an impressive and beneficial character.

Since his death, an aged mother of ninety-three years has passed away. A widow, a son, a sister, and several friends are left to sorrow, but also to rejoice in hope of meeting again.

W. HAYTON.

MR. ALEXANDER BARLOW, J.P.

MR. A. BARLOW entered into rest on Thursday, July 8th, 1897. He had spent an enjoyable day with the Ramsbottom District Council at Llanudno on their annual excursion, and had just taken his seat on the boat for the return journey, when he was taken ill, and had to be carried on to the pier. Death took place immediately. His remains were interred in the Congregational Burial Grounds, Stubbins, on the following Monday, in the presence of a large concourse of people. A Memorial Service was held in the Edenfield Chapel on Sunday evening, July 18th. The chapel was filled to its utmost capacity, and the service was deeply solemn and impressive throughout. Mr. Barlow was born near to Edenfield in 1824, and was a resident in the locality all his life. He was born in humble circumstances and obtained the beginnings of his education chiefly in Sunday and evening schools. In the face of many difficulties and disadvantages, Mr. Barlow was enabled, by dint of hard work and severe economy, to commence the manufacture of cotton in 1860, at Twine Mill, Shuttleworth. In 1879 he purchased Bridge End Mills, Edenfield, which he greatly extended and improved. In the year 1893 he made a further extension, and introduced the electric light. In February, 1897, he acquired the Church Bank Mills, Church, near Accrington, which contain over 1,000 looms. At this time he took his four sons into partnership.

When only eight years of age he attended the services of the Primitive Methodists, conducted at that time in a smithy. A gracious revival was in progress, and he gave himself to Christ. His conversion was the turning-point of all his life: in that act he laid the foundation of the noble character which, through all the subsequent years he built up. He was soon actively engaged in the work of the little Church. At the age of seventeen his name was put on the plan as a local preacher, where it continued for fifty-five years. For this work he was eminently fitted. He had a fine presence; a clear, flexible, forcible voice, and a depth of conviction and earnestness of manner which always made his message impressive and powerful. For fifty years he was the leader of one of the most prosperous classes in all the locality; and by his rare and ripe experience, his deep sympathy and his faithful counsel, he was a constant source of edification and encouragement to his members. His ministry at the bedside of the sick and dying, and in the homes of the sorrowing and poor, was fraught with blessed results. And he was as liberal in giving as he was tireless in working. He always took a deep interest in Sunday School and Temperance work, and laboured diligently to promote it. His presence at the week-evening service was always a source of inspiration to the preachers. For eight years he was circuit steward, and during that time had the entire confidence and hearty co-operation of all his brethren. And in other spheres he has rendered valuable service to the community. As a member of the School Board, of the Local Board, recently the District Council, and as a Magistrate of the County, he discharged the duties of citizenship with the greatest credit to himself and the entire satisfaction of his neighbours. He was a good master. It was a pleasure to see with what fatherly pride he moved among his work-people. His relations with them were most cordial, and his counsel and care for them invaluable. During the later years of his life he received many tokens of the esteem in which he was held by the Bury Circuit, by his neighbours in the village, and by those in authority in the State. But these expressions of confidence never robbed him of that sweet simplicity of character which distinguished him all through life. With more means and leisure at his disposal, the later years of his long life were devoted to Christ and His Church. The beautiful chapel and school at Edenfield are a monument of his faith and enterprise and devotion. And he had the pleasure before he died of seeing them out of debt. Mr. Barlow was a man of sterling integrity. He was governed and determined in all his activities and conduct by the great law of righteousness as revealed in Christ. He was marked, too, by decision and perseverance. Once he made up his mind a thing ought to be done he went steadfastly forward, heedless of consequences. He had in his blood the iron of the Puritan. He gave constant and careful attention to the culture of his spiritual life. He acquainted himself with Methodist theology, Christian biography, and other books of a similar kind likely to aid him in his pulpit ministrations and other religious and public work. With increased leisure he went further afield, and read on a more extensive scale. He sought the companionship of those whom he deemed better and wiser than himself. While a young man in lodgings, he insisted on entertaining the preachers in his turn, that he might have their fellowship, and profit by their counsel. He formed habits of devotion which he maintained to the end of his life. He was essentially a man of prayer; he held constant communion with God. He read his Bible systematically and devoutly. From first to last religion was the chief business of his life, and leavened every other. He was never absent from his class unless compelled by distance or sickness. He was sensible of humour, and could enjoy fun with all the zest of youth, but he was no trifler. Life was too sacred and hours too precious to be wasted in idle, foolish jesting. He was careful to establish the family altar, and thereby brought into his home elements of incalculable blessing and peace. His home life was specially helpful. For forty-five years he was blessed with the companionship and counsel of a sensible, godly, and devoted wife. She sympathised with his aims, and by her wise forethought he was able to see many of them realised. Without a doubt, we owe much of what Mr. Barlow was and did to his dear wife. Brother Barlow was essentially a God-made man. His conversion exercised a powerful formative influence over all his after life. The love of Christ constrained him. With Paul he could say, "I live, and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me; and that life which I now live in the flesh, I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself up for me." The indwelling of Christ was a perpetual fountain of joy in his heart, and kept him young and fresh and pure as a little child. He was greatly beloved by all who knew him, and his memory will long be enshrined in many a heart in his own village and beyond. As we contemplate the life that has passed beyond our ken, we are reminded that the sovereign power in man, that which links him to God, that which gives him influence over his fellow-men, is holy character, and the secret of holy character is communion with Christ.

MR. JOHN DRIFFIELD.

MR. JOHN DRIFFIELD, of Bury, was suddenly called to the higher service on Tuesday evening, May 11, 1897. He was at business in the early part of the day, but as it was half-holiday he went home for dinner. During the afternoon he attended a tea meeting in the Walmersley Road School, and afterwards visited an old friend. Apparently he was then in his usual health, and conversed quite freely and pleasantly with his friends on various topics of interest. On reaching home he spoke quite cheerfully to Mrs. and Miss Driffield, but soon after he remarked that his head was bad. The words had scarcely escaped his lips when he sank back in his chair and died. His decease was instantaneous. He was interred in the Bury Cemetery on Friday, May 14. On the Sunday morning following, a memorial service was held in the Walmersley Road Chapel, and a large number of his fellow-townsmen were present as a token of their respect for the character and memory of the deceased.

Mr. Driffield was the son of the Rev. W. Driffield, a Primitive Methodist minister who travelled chiefly in what was known as the Brinkworth District. He was born at St. Ives, in Cornwall, and at the time of his decease was sixty-four years of age. Thirty-eight years ago he came to Bury, and in partnership with his brother, the late Mr. W. Driffield, commenced business in Bolton Street. Fourteen years later the Brothers Driffield built the handsome suite of premises which have since been occupied by the firm, and which cover what is regarded as the best site in the town. A few years later, Mr. W. Driffield died, and since that time his brother has had the entire charge of the business, which, from the first, has been exceptionally prosperous.

On coming to Bury, Mr. Driffield at once identified himself with our feeble cause in William Street, and soon was actively engaged as a local preacher and Sunday School worker. When, in 1865, it was proposed to build the present chapel in Walmersley Road, he gave the scheme his hearty support, and in many ways helped to bring it to a successful issue. He was appointed treasurer of the Trust Fund, and retained the office until the time of his death. He was a liberal supporter of all our work and institutions, not only at Walmersley Road, but throughout the circuit. At different times Mr. Driffield was superintendent of the Sunday School, class-leader, and circuit steward. He also represented the Walmersley Road Church on the Nonconformist Council.

In politics he was a staunch Liberal, and never hesitated, in clear and uncompromising terms, to state his convictions. He was a true Nonconformist, and while he revered the names of many of the great preachers and leaders in the Episcopal Church, and fully appreciated the spiritual service it renders to the nation, he regarded her connection with the State as her greatest bane, and an injustice to those without her fold. He delighted to read of the Puritans and the early history of Nonconformity, and found in them a constant source of inspiration. He was a zealous temperance reformer. His creed was clear, and he never wearied in proclaiming it. He advocated total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State, and had scant sympathy with recent proposals of compromise. Through all his life Mr. Driffield cultivated the most abstemious habits. He was as temperate in eating as in drinking, and was an ardent but not offensive anti-tobacconist. His generosity to the poor and his readiness to help in Christian work of many kinds beyond the claims of his own Church, though always bestowed quietly and unostentatiously, are known to many. He was a true son of the manse. Through all the years of his married life his house has been a welcome home, not only for the ministers of the circuit, but also for those who have visited it for special services, and frequently for those of other Churches; and the pleasure of this hospitality has been shared by every member of his family. Being of a retiring disposition, Mr. Driffield had little liking for strangers, and did not make many friends, but those he made he "grappled to his soul as with hooks of steel." He was essentially a religious man; he had a deeply religious nature. Religion touched and tempered his whole life. He cultivated assiduously the devotional spirit, yet he was not a recluse. On the contrary, his faith was eminently fruitful, and his life full of practical proofs of his love and loyalty to Christ. He has rendered many services to the cause of Christianity, and in particular to his own Church. But the highest service of all was the attainment of a lofty Christian character. For nearly forty years he went in and out among the people of his adopted town and circuit, and to-day his integrity is unimpeached and unimpeachable. Though manly in his bearing, and always dignified, he had the heart of a little child. He would sit and converse in the humblest home, with the poorest people, of the old times and preachers, with manifest delight and interest. Such a life cannot be in vain. He is dead, but for long years to come he will speak, and his lofty character, his pure life, and his quiet, unassuming spirit will supply impulse and inspiration to those who knew him.

Taking into account what he did, and what he was, the loss of the Walmersley Road Church and of the Bury Circuit is incalculable. But there are loved ones to whom the decease of our dear friend brings even a deeper loss and a darker shadow. He has left behind him the wife of his youth, the companion of his life, the joy of his home, who shared his struggles and rejoiced in his successes, and with her he has also left two sons and a daughter, who are thus suddenly called to pass through a deep, deep sorrow. But it is only for a "little while." His loved ones are comforted and cheered in this dark hour by the blessed assurance of a happy reunion in that land where sorrow and death never enter.

Literary Notices.

A Preacher's Life. An Autobiography and an Album. By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D. (6s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C. HE was a knowing and far-seeing Editor who pressed upon Dr. Parker the advisability of giving his autobiographical recollections to the world. It is well that Dr. Parker has yielded to the gentle pressure of the "experienced editor," (whose identity we think it would not be difficult to establish) for there is a large public who are keenly interested in all that relates to the minister of the City Temple who will welcome this charming volume with avidity. The general outlines of Dr. Parker's life are tolerably familiar to most Free Churchmen. They know that ancient Hexham-on-Tyne claims him as one of her sons, and they know that, like another famous Northumbrian—Thomas Binney, the stone-mason's son, without any collegiate training became assistant to the redoubtable Dr. Campbell of Whitefield's Tabernacle; how he subsequently became the pastor of the Congregational Church at Banbury, then of Cavendish Street, Manchester, afterwards of the Poultry, London, which was superseded by the noble building on Holborn Viaduct, in which for so many years Dr. Parker has carried on his most effective ministry. All this is told in the frankest and freshest style, and with many added details, which will be new to many readers and add piquancy to the narrative. Some stories of Dr. Parker, which have gained a certain currency, are not found in this book; and from a hint given by the doctor himself, it is evident that some of these stories are apocryphal. A mythical element soon begins to attach itself to conspicuous and striking personalities. In that part of the book which tells of the early life of the Hexham youth, there are descriptions and sketches of character drawn with much humour and graphic skill. Take the following scene, quite in the manner of Barry or Ian Maclaren, which describes a symposium at his father's house:—

"A significant circumstance occurred at this time which will further show the atmosphere in which I was reared. A very self-contained and mysterious old man died, and on his florid tombstone, at the close of the usual facts, were engraved the cabalistic letters,

R. I. P.

What did they mean? This was the question nightly raised at my father's supper-parliament. What could they mean? Dixon (to assume a few names) suggested that they meant that the deceased was esoterically known by his friends to be an old Rip. Thomson scouted this idea, and suggested, "Rest in Paradise;" whereupon Robson wanted to know if Thomson regarded the deceased as the penitent thief. Williams had no doubt in his "own mind," (a favourite, but really uncalled-for, expression of his) that R.I.P. meant "Resurrection is Possible," a suggestion which met with no favour. Richard Watson had not spoken, but his gloomy aspect was significant. Richard's was a morose piety, due rather to a sulky liver than to any hostile view of Providence. At length, and in a tone which such a liver in its sulkiest moods alone could either explain or justify, he said, "Blank atheism." "What do you mean?" was the instantaneous inquiry. He said, "The unholy meaning of the unholy letters is only too clear." "What is it, Richard?" "It is 'Resurrection Im Possible.'" We were silent, but unconvinced. When from my corner of the sofa I said, on the authority of a schoolboy, that R.I.P. meant Requiescat in pace, it was decided unanimously that this was veiled, or clandestine Popery, and that the "little horn in Daniel" might now fairly take its place amongst the fulfilled prophecies. The remainder of that night's coffee was drunk in the silence of angry sorrow, but it was drunk.

When we read the fine chapter headed, "Inner Life," we seem to be let into the secret of Dr. Parker's successful ministry. Every now and again in that chapter, like a refrain, the words recur:—"The Evangelical conception answers more questions, satisfies more aspirations, responds to more necessities, and supplies better motives for service than any other faith that aspires to rule the human mind." Is it not indeed significant that the preachers who at the present day have the firmest grip of their hearers, and are listened to with the greatest eagerness, are just the preachers who would most heartily subscribe to Dr. Parker's statement?

Our space is exhausted, or we would have liked to quote from the chapter on "Heresies and Heretics," in which is a deeply interesting reference to T. T. Lynch and the "Rivulet Controversy," which is alluded to in another part of this Magazine. Passed over too must be the chapter in which the character and accomplishments of Mrs. Parker are so tenderly and feelingly described. Not the least interesting part of this Autobiography is the latter part, in which the author gives his recollections of Mr. Gladstone, Henry Ward Beecher, Thomas Binney, and the many other eminent men he has known.

Life and its Phenomena. A Demonstration of the Existence of God. By JOHN MAYNARD. (1s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THOSE who are interested in the question of the origin of life and language, and especially those who are disposed to rest in materialistic explanations of the phenomena of life, should read Mr. Maynard's clear and vigorous argument for Creationism. He shows, we think, in a cogent manner, that life is not a property of matter, and that the Darwinian theory of the origin of language is untenable, inasmuch as children learn to speak by hearing others speak. So true is this that all persons who are born deaf are also dumb.

The Gospel in Baptism. By REV. F. AUGUSTUS JONES. Thos. H. Hopkins, 16, Gray's Inn Road, Holborn, W.C.

THE author quotes Dr. Dale as calling baptism "a glorious gospel expressed in an expressive rite." For ourselves, we confess to no liking for the title of this book, "The Gospel in Baptism." Mr. Jones writes as a convinced and earnest believer in adult baptism, and he writes temperately and ably, making his appeal to the Scriptures. Whether he convinces others or not, his book may be taken as a fair statement of the views he regards as so important.

Affinity: An Inquiry into a Great Question. By WILLIAM PILLING. James Bowden, 10, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

The Ways of God with Man as Revealed in the Scriptures, from Creation to the End of Time. By W. M. SIBTHORPE. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

WE have placed these two books together because of the remarkable similarity between them in purpose and plan. In each an attempt is made to give a Theodicy; to survey God and the world in their ideal, and also in their historical relations, from the beginning to the end of time.

Prayer and Faith: Addresses by READER HARRIS, Q.C. S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

WE have here some seven Addresses delivered by Mr. Reader Harris to Exeter Hall audiences at the close of busy days. The last address deals with the aims and methods of the Pentecostal League; the rest, as the title shows, with the ever-important subjects of Prayer and Faith.

A Popular Exposition of Methodist Theology. By REV. CHARLES OVERY ELDRIDGE, B.A. (2s.) C. H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road.

IF any one knows the requirements of Methodist Local Preachers in order to fit them for their important work, it is the author of this book, whose previous works, "The Lay Preachers' Handbook," and "Local Preachers and Village Methodism," we have had the pleasure of favourably noticing and recommending to our readers. Mr. Eldridge's latest production must be regarded as his most important contribution for the benefit of the class he is so deeply interested in. The plan pursued is good, and by its freedom from technicalities and the clearness of its style, the work makes good its claim to be a "Popular Exposition of Methodist Theology."

Ministering Children. By MARIA LOUISA CHARLES-WORTH. (1s.) Ward, Lock and Co., Warwick House, Salisbury Square, E.C.

THIS book is dedicated to childhood, and has been written to show—as in a picture—how children can minister. Its exquisite English, the purity of its tone, and its high literary merits, render it almost more suitable for older people, though again, its simplicity is such that it is within the range of any child's intellect. The author lays so much more stress on the motives that prompt a deed than on the deed itself—"the end of the commandment is charity, out of a pure heart and a good conscience." Take as a specimen one of the many pictures. Little Lady Gertrude pays a visit to her old nurse; in the same house lives a poor motherless, friendless child. When Lady Gertrude entered the room, "one glance round the apartment was sufficient to show that no mother's care, no mother's presence was known there; and a rush of almost sisterly feeling passed through the heart of the motherless child of rank and fortune as she looked on the motherless child of want and sorrow. Patience was standing with her usual expression of dull and hopeless wretchedness. The young Lady Gertrude went up to her and said, in a low tone of tenderness, 'Dear little girl, I am sure you are not happy.' . . . Then despairing to comfort her, and feeling only at that moment the sorrow she could not bear away, the child of rank put her arm around the child of poverty, pressed a kiss of tenderness upon her forehead. 'Oh, do be kind to her!' said the Lady Gertrude, as she took leave of her nurse. . . . Poor little Patience, when left alone, had ceased her tears for a minute in bewildered surprise; then raised her hand to feel where the kiss had been—to see if her forehead still felt the same; it felt the same, but she did not—she no longer felt alone in the world. She had met the first gleam of human tenderness, and to that her shrinking spirit turned."

In contrast to this we have the ministrations of Nurse Brame, who, from a material standpoint, did a great deal more than Lady Gertrude for little Patience, but—"Nurse Brame had never learned the pure and simple joy of doing good; she had shown many a little kindness to poor Patience, but it was, as she herself expressed it, because she could not bear to see so miserable a thing—not because she could not bear that silent suffering should be, if unseen. She thought that such things must be, and that it was only her call to relieve them when forced upon her notice; therefore a gift from her was nothing more to the receiver than the same gift picked up on the highway-side—it came as no living witness, it left no living glow. She knew not charity's indwelling influence, which, far from consisting in this or that act, is the very atmosphere in which the spirit that possesses it, lives and moves, and has its being!" We have series of such pictures, chiefly of children, "who are happy traffickers in the blessed merchandise of purest charity." This book has also been published in a paper cover for Sixpence.

Natural and Artificial Methods of Ventilation.

Robert Boyle and Son, 64, Holborn Viaduct, London.

A LOVER of books on glancing at the above title will naturally pass over it as having no special interest for him; but if not a particularly interesting subject to the general reader, it is one of vital importance to all human beings, for "air is the prime supporter of life; health, even life itself is dependent upon its purity." Ventilation is a science; and we have in this book the opinions and methods of practical men who have devoted their whole lives to the study of this science. A copy of this book might be invaluable to any one who has charge of chapels, schoolrooms, or, in fact, any public buildings.

Kenooshao. A Red Indian Tragedy. By GEORGE BARNLEY. (1s. 6d.) Charles H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

A WELL-WRITTEN story, dealing with the outbreak and suppression of a tribe of Indians near the Moose River, in the Hudson Bay Territory, about the year 1820. The early settlers there had much to contend with, not from the climate alone, but also from the treachery and jealousy of these Indians. This narrative is true in its leading incidents, and has been written out of the fulness of knowledge by the Rev. G. Barnley, who was the first missionary to the Cree Indians of the Southern Department of the Hudson Bay Territory.

BOOKS FOR THE BOYS AND GIRLS.

WE are reminded by the parcel of beautifully got-up children's books, which we have received, that the Christmas season is drawing near. Few firms cater so well for the children as Messrs. S. W. Partridge and Co. All tastes are consulted; there is everything, from the stirring book of adventures for the boys to the picture-book for the little tots. The prices also will fit anyone's pocket. The books marked One Shilling are remarkably cheap, well-told stories, prettily bound in cloth and well illustrated.

Roy's Sister; or, "His Ways and Hers." By M. B. MANWELL. Illustrated by J. Ley Pethybridge. (1s.)

A PRETTY story, relating how a selfish little girl was transformed into an unselfish one. Elsie was a source of great anxiety to her grandfather, the rector of the village of Hedingham, and to her gentle Aunt Alice. Great was their joy when her own good sense showed Elsie the errors of her ways. There are many clever touches in the book, revealing the life of the village, and some of the prominent characters therein.

Bessie Drew. By AMY MANIFOLD. Illustrated by H. K. Robinson. (1s.)

THE story of an odd little girl. Bessie Drew, a quiet, dreamy child, one of a family of six children, whose father is a struggling doctor, proves, by her quiet self-devotion, that it is sometimes well to be odd. This book would be a very suitable present for a little girl, for Bessie is no saint, but a very human little girl, who tried hard to do her duty and succeeded.

Lost in the Back Woods. By E. C. KENYON. Illustrated by W. Rainey, R.I. (1s.)

A BOOK for the boys, full of thrilling adventures, —brigands, train-robbers, kidnapping, bear-hunting, prairie fires; in fact, more adventures than we have ever before heard or read of one small boy crowding into his short life, and coming through without a scratch as well.

Cripple George. By J. W. KNEESHAW. (9d.) A PATHETIC story of a little cripple lad. A good temperance tale.

Four Young Musicians. By KATE THOMPSON SIZER. (6d.)

AN interesting story dealing with the fortunes of a musician's four children. Their parents' death and financial losses obliged them to separate. This book deals with their individual adventures until they met again.

Two Little Girls. By T. S. ARTHUR. (6d.)
Two pretty little books of short stories.

A Threefold Promise. By M. I. HURRELL. (6d.) THE threefold promise given by Gerald Weston to his mother was, "Never to forget your prayers; to speak the truth always, and to remember that whatever may happen, God loves you, and is watching over you.

Messrs. S. W. Partridge and Co. have also issued six pretty little books, bound in bright-coloured cloth, and with a coloured frontispiece, for the small sum of Fourpence each. Their names are:—

From Shadow to Sunshine. By M. B. MANWELL.
A Bright Idea. By JEANIE CHAPPELL.

Ronald's Reason. By MRS. S. C. HALL.

Little Dan, the Orange Boy.

Jacko, and Tales from Bird and Beast Land, and
The Little Woodman and his Dog Cæsar.

The Connexional Outlook.

By PROXY.

THE GENERAL CHAPEL FUND AND THE CHAPEL LOAN FUND.

—At the last meeting of the General Chapel and the Chapel Loan Fund Committee, a large amount of business was transacted. Some of the cases submitted to the Committee for consideration were of an interesting character, and the proceedings as a whole afforded ground for reflection. Grants were made to several village chapels. These were all small amounts in themselves, although in the aggregate they constituted a considerable sum. What was clear to every member of the Committee was that all were needy and deserving cases, and if a larger amount had been available, the grants would have been on a more liberal scale. Probably the very best use was made of the money to be disposed of that was possible. North Cave might be taken as a typical instance of this somewhat numerous class. Ten pounds was granted, an additional ninety pounds had to be raised locally to claim this small grant, thus securing a reduction of the debt by one hundred pounds. This was the principle on which all the grants were made. It is clear that even a little help of this kind does an incalculable amount of good, both by getting a considerable reduction of the liabilities, and by putting fresh heart and hope into the trustees and the societies. Another class of cases were large chapels in towns which had cost a large sum of money, but, by reason of unforeseen circumstances, had been burdened with a much larger debt than was anticipated at the commencement of the scheme. Possibly, in some of these cases a little more prudence, or a little more energy at the time, might have prevented difficulties later. When all is said, there is no time for raising money comparable to the period during which the building is being erected, and it is a pity when the most is not made of the opportunity. Still events occur sometimes which mortals cannot anticipate, the removal of friends from whom substantial help was expected, or some trade dispute or depression. Such events have in some instances seriously hampered the trustees of town chapels for years, and when it is possible, it is certainly most desirable to relieve them of at least a part of their burden. Well Street Chapel, Rotherham, is a case of this class, and the Committee promised help to the extent of twelve-and-a-half per cent. on any sum that may be paid off up to £400. It may be hoped that these cases of actual distress will become fewer. Greater care is now exercised in chapel building, and the churches are stronger, and our people on the whole wealthier. If less of the money were disposed of to help these causes, more could be given to new ventures, and in this way really aggressive work could be done. Schemes like the Haringay Chapel, London, where a few people are building excellent premises, would then have larger grants than £50 made to them. The Committee have acted wisely in ceasing to make grants merely for the payment of current expenses. Where this has been done in the past the effect has been the opposite of healthy, indeed, it has paralysed rather than stimulated local effort. The Committee have discovered this and have resolved to do nothing further in this direction. It should be stated that a large proportion of the money from which these grants are made is placed at the disposal of the Committee by the Connexional Insurance Company.

SELF-HELP ON THE MISSION STATIONS.

—A month ago attention was called to the gift of seventy guineas sent by the hands of the Rev. R. Fairley to some of the Home Funds by the native Christians of Fernando Po. Other evidences of the independence and liberality of these coloured people are coming before the attention of the Home Churches. There are less than 200 members on the island, but at their missionary anniversaries alone last year they raised £252, and for all purposes during the year, £1,456. We know of no Church in England whose liberality will bear comparison with these figures. A fine illustration of their independence is to be found in the fact that since the erection of the church at Santa Isabel, in which the Society there worships, they have been constantly making efforts to repay the Missionary Committee the grant made to them at the time, and they have now accomplished this object. This is gratifying in many ways, the help thereby afforded to the funds of the Society being by no means the chief cause of pleasure. When people have made sacrifices for such a purpose, the place is of far greater value to them than if it had cost them nothing. Cheering reports are coming to hand from other parts of the foreign mission field. In many respects the Rev. Nathaniel Boocock is one of the best agents our Missionary Society ever had. Strong in his physical constitution, and blessed with a quiet dogged determination and a fine optimistic spirit, with a strain of humour in his make up that leads him to make little or nothing of difficulties that would overwhelm a man less courageous, he is labouring with zeal and some success, amidst serious difficulties, at Archibongville. His communications are models of what missionary letters should be, a plain, simple statement of facts, without any attempt at rhetorical colouring. Slowly, but surely, he is civilising and Christianising the people among whom he lives, and is specially glad to record that a larger number of children are attending his day school. His chief difficulty arises from slavery. The owners of the slaves are not willing for the children to be educated, fearing that with education will come independence. And yet the evil thing is permitted there, in a land that is an English Protectorate. And at the same time, with light hearts we go to war with the Boers to secure an extension of the franchise!

THE WINTER CAMPAIGN.

—The winter campaign has been started in many circuits, and it is satisfactory to note that in some respects the work is to be prosecuted on lines rather different from those which were wont to be adopted in the past. The Liverpool District Committee have addressed a circular to all the circuits in the District, offering the services of a deputation wherever it is intended to hold a circuit convention on the work of God. This programme will do good in many ways. It may be expected that a keener and more wide-spread interest will be manifested in these gatherings than would be shown were the circuits left altogether to their own resources in providing speakers. And it is reasonable to suppose that many circuits may be induced to hold conventions, and as the result, make some special efforts to obtain greater success in the religious work of their churches, who, but for the wise offer of the District Committee, would have been content to perform the ordinary round of duties in what too often is the ordinary half-hearted manner. The meetings themselves, by the introduction of speakers from other spheres of work, will be more fruitful of suggestion as well as of stimulus. But the idea is an excellent one for another reason. Anything that helps to keep alive and strengthen the District feeling is a decided advantage, and the more our churches can be made to feel that there is more than a nominal connection between them and the rest of the District the better. The circuits in the town of Hull have arranged for a great united mission in the early part of November. Each circuit will have a centre for its own mission, and the preachers will be the ministers of the Hull Circuits. As these missions will all be held at the same time, there should be created a very considerable religious atmosphere among the members. There are sixteen ministers in active work in the great Yorkshire seaport, and over 4,000 members. Large and beautiful chapels are standing in some of the most commanding positions in the town, and all the conditions are favourable for their causing the people of Hull to realise that there is a religious community among them that is actually alive. These, and other plans adopted in other circuits, are all commendable in themselves, but of themselves they cannot ensure success. Not long ago a minister of some experience, who has been singularly successful in getting on the work of God, stated boldly in a meeting that, whether or not it was given to mortals to command success in their secular callings, he had never known hard, earnest toil fail in connection with religious work, and on the other hand, he had never known real success in religious work apart from hard toil, whatever other quality the worker might have. If the members of the churches are whole-hearted in this matter; have a single eye; be persistent; cherish a simple faith, believing the promise of God is true—true in the plain, ordinary meaning of the word; then they may be as sure that conversions will take place as that the seasons will come in their order.

LIVERPOOL PRIMITIVE METHODISM.

—Considering that there is such a large population in Liverpool, Primitive Methodism there has never been quite so vigorous and aggressive as might have been expected. Probably, in this respect, it is neither better nor worse than other Nonconformist Churches. For some reason, not easy to explain, Nonconformity has never found Liverpool to be a fruitful soil. Here and there, in all parts of the city, there are fairly strong churches, carrying on the work with zeal and success, but such centres of religious activity are sadly too few. Our own Prince's Avenue Church is one of the best. Many of the other places, however, are only feeble. For this reason, therefore, we hail with all the greater satisfaction any sign of progress that appears. A month ago the opening ceremony of a new church in the Walton District of the city was performed, Miss Hartley taking the leading part. Mr. Hartley has taken a great practical interest in the scheme, and has promised to give fifty per cent. on all that is raised up to April next. We should be glad if friends in all parts of the Connexion would note this and send a subscription to the Rev. S. Johnson, the superintendent minister. The membership is small, and even with the liberal help of Mr. Hartley, the undertaking, which has been carried out at a cost of £3,000, is a serious matter.

THE WHITECHAPEL MISSION.

—The work of the Rev. Thomas Jackson has always been characterised by boldness and enterprise. In slum-work he has been the pioneer among Primitive Methodists, and his missions have from the first commanded the attention of our people in all parts of the Connexion. In the Whitechapel Mission he has been brought into contact with other classes of character and life than those he knew in Clapton. Perhaps, on the whole, the field is as promising, as far as ultimate results are concerned, but in the meantime their opposition is more active and pronounced. Those who traffic in the drink, and those who have become its victims, are not likely to be pleased with the temperance propaganda of the mission workers. There appears also, to be in Whitechapel a large socialistic element of a distinctly low and degraded type. It is a socialism that is anti-religious and anti-Christian, and is active and aggressive. Mr. Jackson describes it as a disreputable and unclean thing, to be shunned by all who desire to retain their self-respect. Its leaders lately held a meeting on a Sunday evening on the space near the Working Lads' Institute, usually occupied by Mr. Jackson and his people for an open-air meeting. As the hour was the same as that in which the religious service had generally been held, the proceeding looked rather like a deliberate attempt to prevent the work of the mission. But Mr. Jackson did not meekly yield to the enemy. Boldly taking his stand close to the crowd that had gathered around the socialistic orators, he began his service, and had the satisfaction of seeing the organisers of the other meeting beat a retreat, leaving behind them the greater part of their congregation to hear Mr. Jackson's sermon.

A WOMEN'S MISSIONARY TRAINING HOME.

—The London Primitive Methodists are sufficiently energetic, and not the least active of their institutions is their Women's Foreign Missionary Society. Before this issue of the Magazine is in the hands of its readers, it will have discussed a subject of considerable importance. The meeting, held on October 23, in Surrey Chapel, occurred too late to allow the discussion of the subject as it was presented by Mrs. E. C. Rawlings, in this chronicle. The object is in all respects worthy and desirable, and but for one circumstance, we should have been inclined to do nothing but bless the movement. But prudent Primitive Methodists do not forget that recently quite a large number of new departures have been made, all of which will cost money for their maintenance. No one need suppose that the resources of the Connexion are about to be exhausted. At the same time it is well to remember that we are at present on the crest of a great wave of commercial prosperity which will not last for ever, and it would be wise to wait another ten years before starting such a scheme as is contemplated by the writer of the paper. Very large responsibilities have been undertaken which will need all we can do to discharge them for some time to come, and before anything further is done in this direction, the new institutions that have been started should have the chance of becoming consolidated and established. Should other counsels prevail, however, and a scheme be actually launched, no one will doubt that it will serve a useful purpose. The foreign mission field of our Church by this time has become extensive, and will need a considerable number of men and women to keep up the supply of workers. Some provision is already made for training men, especially those destined for Central Africa. But not less, perhaps, even more, is a training needed for women. They have an important part to play on the mission field, and a college for their special education would enable them to do their work with greater ease and effectiveness.

PRIMITIVE METHODISM AND THE NATIONAL FREE CHURCH COUNCIL.

It was inevitable that a new organisation of the huge proportions of the National Council of Free Churches should make mistakes, and, in some instances, receive criticism where, perhaps, it was not much to blame. Of one thing we are certain, if it is to be really representative of the Free Churches of England, it will not have to act on the assumption that the minor Methodist bodies are sufficiently recognised and honoured if a Wesleyan is occasionally appointed to the Presidency. A word to the wise is sufficient, and perhaps nothing further need be said on this point. In other respects Primitive Methodism will be well represented at the meetings which will be held in Sheffield in March next. The President of the Conference will take part in the meetings. A Paper on "Interdenominational Possibilities in relation to Ministerial Theological Training" will be read by Professor Peake. The Rev. A. T. Guttery will address one of the great public meetings, and the Rev. J. Tolefree Parr will read a Paper on the "Proposed Simultaneous Mission in 1901." The appointments are eminently suitable to the men, and we shall await with especial interest Professor Peake's deliverance on the important subject that has been allotted to him.

The Wider Outlook.

METHODIST UNION IN AUSTRALIA.

—The union of two or more Churches, even where opinion in its favour is practically unanimous, is not the work of a day. The Australian Methodists have been discussing and arranging for union for several years. At the present time the consummation of the work is close at hand. The last covenant of union that was signed and sealed was that of South Australia, and the union will take effect on January 1, 1900. Judging from the reports of the meeting that have reached this country, the ceremony seems to have been exceedingly interesting. The utmost harmony and good-will prevailed, and yet all present appear to have been impressed with the gravity of the work that was being done. The meeting was held on August 14, in the Pirie Street Wesleyan Church, Adelaide. The Rev. J. D. Langsford, President of the Wesleyan Conference, occupied the chair, and on his right and left respectively were the Rev. H. J. Pope, President of the Primitive Methodist Conference, and the Rev. J. Thorne, President of the Bible Christian Conference. The gathering was large and influential, each of the three denominations being well represented, both by ministers and laity. The speeches were those of men with a profound sense of responsibility, and an appreciation of the momentous character of the movement in which they were taking part. Sir Samuel Way, a Bible Christian, and one of the most accomplished orators in Australia, who will be long remembered by those who heard his fine address at the Manchester Conference in 1897, was one of the speakers. And the Rev. J. G. Wright, a Primitive Methodist veteran, also spoke. What will impress careful readers of the report is that the chief representative of the Primitive Methodists, the Rev. H. J. Pope, revealed in his speech, as no other speaker did, that he had been no enthusiastic advocate of union. He was careful to state that he had the unanimous vote of his Conference in favour of the union, and that the English Conference had given its consent. Still, running through the speech was the idea that he had been converted to the movement, and that he had not yielded easily. But he had from the first kept an open mind, and had desired to do what would be right and best for the kingdom of God, whether it was in accordance with his own wishes or not. And the result was that at that meeting, with a clear conscience and a firm conviction that it was right, he signed the document securing union. Perhaps this spirit of "aloofness" is characteristic of many Primitive Methodists in England. If they were as anxious to subordinate personal wishes to the interests of the Kingdom of God, one might have greater confidence in the result of the movement for union here.

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOURERS.

—The Committee who have the arrangements to make for the Great World's Convention of Christian Endeavourers in July, 1900, with a courage that at least deserves success, have resolved, on the suggestion of the American Committee, to make a new departure. For a week there will be an Encampment in some open space just outside London, where the Endeavourers can have fellowship in the open-air and under tents. The park has already been selected. It is within twenty minutes by train of the city, and a regular service of trains, at almost nominal charges, will be run between the city and the encampment. For meeting places there are two buildings in the park already, capable of seating between them some 6,000 persons. In addition, two large tents, capable of accommodating audiences respectively of 10,000 and 8,000, will be put up, and several smaller tents, providing accommodation for from 1,000 to 2,000 persons. Then there will be a thousand small tents erected for what may be called residential purposes. Granting favourable weather, this arrangement should prove a source of great enjoyment, and doubtless will be eagerly taken advantage of by the people attending the Convention. Indeed, it will make the great gathering ideal as a means of free fellowship. For it must promote the feeling of equality, and cherish an intimacy in the intercourse that could not be obtained by any other arrangement.

AMERICAN METHODISM.

—The Rev. Thomas Champness has just returned from a tour which has embraced the United States of America, Japan, and part of China. In some accounts he has given of his travels, he reveals that he is a keen observer of men and things, and that he is able to penetrate beneath appearances to root causes. He tells many interesting stories about the Japanese and the Chinese, and whilst recognising the energy and enterprise of the people of Japan, indicates that in his view the Chinese are a decidedly more likeable people. But his account of American Methodism, perhaps, more than anything else he has to tell, will afford most food for thought, to Methodists at least. Evidently he is afraid for the Methodist Church in America, and doubts greatly if it will retain its old power, unless, indeed, one radical change be made. As this change is not likely to occur, the outlook, both for America and for Methodism, if his view be correct, is not too hopeful. The weakness of American Methodism, according to Mr. Champness, lies in its bishops. They are autocratic to a degree, and are possessed by reason of their office, with far too much power. Mr. Champness fears that their influence will not help to promote the simple religion of Jesus Christ, that they will cripple the life of the churches, and that they will damage Methodism because their position and influence are opposed to the democratic spirit of the American nation. Regarding the last of these conclusions, it may be said that the correctness of one of the premises on which it is based is somewhat doubtful. It does not follow that because America has a republican form of government that the people are democratic. Indeed, in many respects they are much more conservative and aristocratic in temper than the people of the old country. Their bearing towards the negroes, the amount of caste feeling exhibited by the descendants of the first settlers, the amount of power they place in the hands of their President—vastly greater than that exercised by the British Sovereign,—the vast influence of wealth, and, it may be added, the existence of Methodist bishops, to name only a few out of many things that could be cited, all show that whilst their institutions in form are democratic, in actual life the American people have a large strain of aristocratic feeling in them. Still, if not chiefly for this reason, it is probable that the conclusion at which Mr. Champness has arrived is substantially correct. It is a mistake to invest any office with the powers that belong to the American bishop. It breeds the autocratic temper in the man who holds the office. And the autocratic temper is out of place, and exercises an unhealthy influence in any department of civilised life. It may do, and, granted the autocrat is wise and benevolent, confer benefits, where the people are either uncivilised or semi-civilised. But among an advanced people it hinders progress. Especially will it prove detrimental to the welfare of the people if the autocrat is in the Church. In England the ecclesiastical autocrat, especially in country parishes, has wrought incalculable mischief to the cause of religion and to the national life as a whole. These are considerations that should be taken into account by those who are seeking to make the chairman of the District in the Wesleyan denomination into a bishop. A need for a man set apart to exercise oversight over a District may be desirable, but care should be taken that he cannot exercise too much lordship over God's heritage. It is a large question, no doubt, involving the whole problem of the doctrine of the Christian pastorate. But it seems safest to go upon the principle that power should not attach to any office, but exist only in so far as it has been acquired by personal worth.

THE WESLEYAN MISSION IN MANCHESTER.

—The eleventh report of the Wesleyan Mission in Manchester has just been issued. It is an interesting and inspiring document, and deserves careful study on the part of Christian workers of all denominations. Only one or two items can be named here, and they are given in the hope that they may lead some to study the report as a whole and be led thereby to increased wise and earnest effort in the cause of God and humanity. The report of the membership, if it stood alone, would be a justification, and more than a justification, of the large expenditure of money and labour necessary for the prosecution of the work. It has the largest membership of any circuit in Methodism:—2,861 full members and 856 on trial, making a total of adults in membership of 3,717, besides 606 in junior classes. And the rate of progress has not been lessened recently. During the last four years it has reported the largest increase of any circuit, and for three years the increase has been more than 200 per year. The class contributions alone during the year amounted to £694. These are remarkable figures, and we record them the more gladly because we are convinced that whatever good an organisation may do in other respects, if it does not add to its own strength, the good will not be of a permanent kind. In connection with the mission there are the usual organisations found associated with such movements: temperance guilds, relief committees, district visitors, Bible and theological classes, entertainments, and the like. But the chief agency is the preaching of the Gospel, the old plan, which, when well done, never fails of success. It is said that a movement is on foot to start a mission on similar lines in Liverpool.

A GREAT AMERICAN INFIDEL.

—There are two sides to most questions, and in things evil, when fairly examined, it is discovered that there is often not a little good. In any case it is well to know as much of the truth about everything and everybody as can be learned. The larger knowledge sobers one's admirations, and modifies one's aversions. To those who have only a slight knowledge of Colonel Ingersoll, an article which appeared in a recent number of the "North American Review" may be commended. It is written by the Rev. Henry M. Field, D.D., who, although a Christian minister, was for many years a personal friend of Ingersoll's, and writes, therefore, from intimate knowledge of the man. He tells many interesting stories illustrative of the man's gifts, but what impresses one the most is, his freedom from worldliness and greed of gold, one of the great curses of his nation, and his magnificent spirit of benevolence. He was a leading barrister, and his practice with what he made at his lectures frequently brought him an income of £20,000. But he could not keep it. The poverty and sorrow of the world touched his heart, and the thought that so many received less of the good things of life than they merited caused him to lavish his gifts on the unfortunate. No amount of reasoning by his friends, who urged discrimination, and pointed out how he was imposed upon, could prevent him from indulging himself with the joy of charity. He would rather he said, be cheated a dozen times than leave one poor girl to suffer, and, perhaps, to die. Nor will this be forgotten by Him who said, Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me.

A BRITISH ASSOCIATION PREACHER.

—Archdeacon Wilson preached two fine sermons at the British Association, in which he called the attention of the savants to the changed attitude of philosophy and science to religion, and of religion to philosophy and science. The new theology, he claimed, because it recognised the evolution of religious thought, is scientific, both in its content and its method. The old theologies are to-day not very convincing, any more than is Plato's argument for the immortality of the soul. But theology has not been disposed of. It has been compelled to change its methods, but the truths it teaches remain. And by the teaching of Caird, Green and Martineau, it has vanquished the atheism that sought to give natural law the place of a personal God. And he hailed with pleasure the service rendered to theology by the science which was once atheistical. It had enlarged the bounds of knowledge, and "all knowledge," he said, "is revelation. I know of no distinction between what man discovers and what God reveals."

THE BAPTIST UNION AND PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

—The meetings of the Baptist Union were this year held in Leeds. Almost every question of public interest was discussed, and the assembled delegates showed that they were in no hesitating mood regarding these matters. Dr. Clifford was the President, and in his address reached a very high stand of eloquence and moral tone. His subject was, "The Christ of the Coming Century." In it were many passages that will bear lifting from their context, and which tempt the reviewer to indulge largely in quotation. "The religion of the Son of Man will not have reached its goal till it has turned the family into a Church, and the home into a temple, trade into a sacrament, and art into worship, science into an interpreter of the workings of the Infinite, and journalism into a prophecy for God to men, sport into true culture, and pleasure itself into a holy sacrifice; governments, societies, and nations into organs of the kingdom of heaven, and the whole earth into a paradise of the Father and His redeemed sons. I came, said Christ, not to judge the world, but to save it; and He will! Yes; He will save the whole of it!" Very strongly did he speak against war with the Transvaal Republic. At the time we write, the war has actually begun, and whatever may have been their views before, all will now join in condemning the ultimatum of President Kruger. Still, there will remain a large section of thoughtful people in these realms who will remain convinced that if the affair had been differently managed by the British Government, President Kruger would never have adopted a course so wicked and unwise. There is a strange mockery in the fact that the statesman who once said that a war with the Boers would be "a long war, a bitter war, a costly war, and a war, the memory of which generations would hardly be able to blot out," should be the man who is chiefly responsible, at least in the eyes of a considerable section of Englishmen, for bringing about the conflict. And so it has come to pass, to use the words of Dr. Clifford, that we have walked straight out of the Peace Conference at the Hague into the battlefield in South Africa. Is it surprising that we are regarded by some of the Continental peoples as a nation of hypocrites?

THE OUTCRY AGAINST POPERY.

—No one can read the report of the proceedings of the Baptist Union without being impressed with the fact that a new and stronger aversion against Romanism has taken possession of Nonconformists. This is partly, no doubt, the result of the agitation against ritualism, but it is clear that the feeling has been greatly intensified by the Dreyfus affaire. Cardinal Vaughan has sought to clear his Church of complicity with the crimes of the French General Staff, and it is as well to remember how impossible it is to pronounce a judgment on a large class of people without doing injustice here and there to individuals, however true the judgment may be in the main. But it remains true that in France and Italy, not a single Catholic newspaper, with, perhaps, the doubtful exception of The Soleil, espoused the cause of the martyr, nor did the priesthood make any attempt to enlighten the people, and lead them to think justly upon the question. Dr. Clifford has this in mind when he appealed to the members of the Baptist Union:—"Humanity is cutting its wisdom-teeth. Men are becoming free, independent, self-directing, and as they will not need, so they will not submit to the priestly caste. But you tell me, they are submitting in England, and that Cardinal Vaughan says, 'We must go back to the Romanist fold in order to improve our social condition.' Go back! No, never! The gulf between Romanism and the modern world is dug too deep. We cannot get across. The Council of Trent went far; the Vatican Council went deeper still; and the assertion of the infallibility of the Pope deepest of all. The cleavage is sheer down to the bed-rock; and on that side is priesthood, with its subtle falsehoods and its intrusive tyrannies; on this, brotherhood, with its truth and freedom. There you have the 'Church,'—the 'Church' put before truth and justice and life; here you have all institutions made subordinate to truth and justice. There you have darkness, decay, and death; here light, progress, and life. Yonder, usurped authority, unscrupulousness, and the Dreyfus affair; here the proving of all things; straightforwardness, and the uprising of conscience against injustice! Oh, Englishmen, you will not, you cannot, forget the cost of your heritage! . . . Heirs of Wycliffe and Latimer, of Cromwell and Milton, you will not submit your necks to the priests. I will not believe it! The stars are fighting for you in their courses. Hitch your waggon to the stars of liberty and truth and fraternity, and you will drive over the whole company of priests safe into the land of truth and goodness, manhood and brotherhood." Of similar importance was the indictment of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes in his speech at the great Missionary Meeting, when he charged the Jesuits as having no conscience, and finding his illustration of the fact in the trial at Rennes.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH UNION.

—However reluctantly it may have been done, it is clear that the responsible and influential members of the English Church Union, which is the Ritualistic organisation of the English Church, have thrown over Lord Halifax, and resolved to obey the Archbishopal "opinion." Some of the humbler members of the Union, it may be concluded from the interruptions to which Canon Body was subjected whilst he was speaking in favour of obedience, would have gladly followed Lord Halifax to any lengths of rebellion and lawlessness to which he might lead them, but these are, if a numerous section of the party, not blessed with much influence. The total result is that the ritualists are not prepared to be martyred for their principles, and hence incense-burning has ceased, save for "fumigatory" purposes, and candles are not to be carried in procession. No one who knows them, however, will suppose that the ritualists have given up their case. They will simply bide their time, and unless the nation continues to sit on the watch-tower, will, in a short time, introduce the old practices, while the bishops wilfully refuse to see what they are doing.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS AND NONCONFORMITY.

—The Church Congress has been holding its meetings in London, and in some respects the deliverances made by the leading speakers will prove pleasant reading to Nonconformists. To these the proceedings of October 12th will be the most interesting. The whole of the morning session was spent in considering the question of Nonconformity, its relation to the Established Church and to the religious life of the nation. Many of the speakers expressed themselves manfully. Prebendary Wace gave some statistics that must have startled those of his hearers who had been thinking that Nonconformity was a negligible quantity, and, strange as it may seem at this time of day, there are churchmen of this class; and pleaded for a better understanding with the Nonconformist Churches. Canon Overton spoke in a similar strain, pointing out that at the beginning of the eighteenth century Dissenters were to Churchmen in the proportion of one to twenty, whilst now they constituted a moiety of the religious people of the country, and urged that Churchmen should manifest toward them a brotherly and kindly spirit. Dr. Farrar spoke as we have always been accustomed to expect that broad Christian-minded man, and altogether, it seemed as though the air was charged with a spirit of charity and Christian brotherhood. We could wish, but we hardly expect it, that this spirit could be breathed into the average parish clergyman, especially the clergymen who live in the rural districts.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH AND SELF-GOVERNMENT.

—At one of the Sessions of the Church Congress there was a great outcry for the powers of self-government in the Episcopal Church. In reading the debate, however, one is impressed with the thought that there existed among the speakers some confusion of thought. Lord Halifax complained bitterly that the Archbishops' tribunal should have the power to prevent a parish priest from exercising whatever forms of worship he chose, but it never occurred to his mind that the rule of one man in a parish in relation to these things, whilst the laity are exhorted to obey him, is not what ordinary people understand by self-government. Canon Gore and Mr. Russell evidently held different ideas on the subject, and it is pleasing to note that some of the speakers were prepared to pay the price for self-government, that is disestablishment.

RECREATIVE EVENING SCHOOLS.

—The Rev. J. B. Paton, D.D., of Nottingham, Hon. Sec. of the Recreative Evening Schools' Association, has sent us papers describing the methods of his Association for the instruction of young people in Biblical truths. The method has been adopted by many of the Churches federated with the Birmingham Free Church Council, and has proved eminently successful. Particulars can be obtained from Dr. Paton, and we commend the method to all interested in evening class work for the young.

REV. WILLIAM EVANS.

Rev. William Evans.

OUR brother, William Evans, was born May 19, 1840, in the historic town of Shrewsbury—a town where the scientific mind of Darwin was quickened and furnished, and where his monument stands as an evidence of public appreciation and of his personal industry. Mr. Evans was blessed with Primitive Methodist parents, and early felt the power of their earnest and pure lives. It was in Knighton, a little town on the Welsh border to which his parents had removed, that he consciously felt the power of the grace of God at the age of nineteen, and in a short time, showing intelligence and aptitude, was called out as a local preacher. In those days the Hay Circuit formed part of Knighton, and so involved long journeys and much labour; no lamps to light the path, no bicycle to shorten the journey, but often many miles of tramp through the dense darkness and the beating storm. The office of local preacher in this wide circuit was the "proof house" of our brother. He stood the test well, and soon grave brothers were wishful to open the door of a wider sphere for the exercise of his powers. Brother Evans not only had an advantage in being born into a godly home and to consequent Christian fellowship, but for eight years previous to his entrance into the public ministry he was engaged as a lawyer's clerk—for him the office was a school of mental training and legal acquisition. His knowledge of common law has been useful to himself as a superintendent and economically helpful to his circuits in giving advice and in preparing deeds for trustees.

In entering the ministry he did not run before he was called, neither did he hurry when called, as he was wishful not merely to hear the voice of the Church, but to be sure that he heard the voice of God. For six weeks or so he prayed earnestly that God would by some means make it clear to him that He had called him to this great work. His sense of the responsibility of the ministry was so great that it oppressed him, and he shrank from it, and if left to himself might have yielded to remain in the lawyer's office, where there was a prospect of promotion. But the Holy Spirit settled this painful controversy, and made him deeply feel that no sacrifice was too great for him to make to meet the call of Him who gave His life a ransom for many. It was in the month of October, 1863, he began his ministry, and God gave him one soul as "a sign" of present blessing and as a prophecy of a fuller harvest. His circuits are his record. God has saved many through his ministry. It was our joy to have him as a colleague, and to gratefully rejoice together for the sheaves he gathered for the Lord. On one memorable Sunday night at a country church in the old Prees Green Circuit, twenty souls came out for Christ, and the voice of triumph was heard on earth and the angels rejoiced in the presence of God: this was a time never to be forgotten. The other evidences of our brother's success may be called financial. Peaton Strand, a branch of the Ludlow Circuit, during his first superintendency, was constituted an independent station, the quarterly income having gone up from £12 10s. to £26. Here he built two churches and a minister's house and left one of the churches free of debt. His next circuit was Leintwardine, where, by his life and labour, he made friends for all the coming years. Here he built a new church at Lingen and left it free of debt, and missioned Aymestry, where a church now stands as a beacon for the people around. We cannot speak of his four years' work in the Shrewsbury Circuit, nor the three years in that of Oakengates and Wellington. In the Lymm Circuit for four years he did the work of the ministry. By the aid of a legacy of £500 he cleared from the debt of Altrincham Church £800. He next went to Talke Circuit for four years, and laid up some £400 to be used in helping to build the Andley Church. His next call was to the Central Church in Derby—a post of difficulty and strain. There he paid £600 off debt and obtained £800 more in promises on condition the whole £1,700 was raised, and left £300 towards that amount for his successor. This is a record calling for devout thanksgiving.

In 1869, Brother Evans was joined in wedlock to the daughter of Mr. James Brown, a farmer of Burlton Grove, near Wem, in the county of Salop. In this important life-matter he committed his way unto the Lord, and He guided him to a helpmeet indeed. She was no peace-disturber, but a peace-maker. No trouble ever came to him in consequence of anything said or left unsaid. She is a wise woman and her husband safely trusts her. She is a worker in her Lord's vineyard. Domestically her children are her abiding memorial. Brother Evans is devoutly pious, strictly conscientious. He lives as seeing Him who is invisible. He preaches not what some people like but what they need. His sermons are Methodistically orthodox. No sinner can come to his church without hearing what he must do to be saved. His reading and study directly point to the great end of turning men from darkness into light, and from the power of Satan unto God. The Higher Criticism has never injuriously touched his faith in the Divinity of the Gospel committed to his trust. He is a good pastor. He knows the way to the homes of his people and is not ignorant of their struggles and needs, and therefore his addresses do not lack the sympathy that comes out of knowledge. The cry of the poor he hears not in vain, and the sick see in him a servant of Jesus who went about doing good. His heart is young and tender. He is not a dry tree, but full of sap. The young love him. In the day of adjustment, if faithful, he will hear the "Well done!" of Him whose he is and whom he serves. We trust he will still have years for work and for the joy of harvesting.

A STORY FOR THE TIMES.*

CHAPTER XXXIV.

RUTLAND'S HOME-COMING.

"HAT we need, Lady Neville, is time."

Her ladyship looked doubtful as Ritzoom spoke. She had come to see, in spite of the Jesuit's assurances, that he had not truly estimated her daughter's character, had not realised that her whole life had been completely changed.

"You may be right; but what then?"

"With time I believe everything will come right, only——" he hesitated a second.

"Only what?"

"Well, we must understand the case, and face it boldly. Your daughter has doubtless become unsettled."

"Yes," admitted her ladyship with a sigh.

"And she is in love with this—Rutland?"

Lady Neville was silent.

"What we must do at all hazards is to restore your daughter to the faith."

"Oh, if we can!"

"And, of course, we must destroy all possibility of a marriage between the two."

"Yes; but do you realise the difficulties? I am afraid you do not understand Alizon. She is very affectionate, but she cannot be driven. She will do what she believes right, even if it means her death. A few months ago, I believe she would have died for our faith; and now—well, I believe she would rather die than give up what she now believes. She laughs at the threats of our Church, or rather she treats them with quiet contempt. She seems to regard them much as an educated person regards the threats of a witch or a wizard. I cannot understand it. Concerning Rutland, she is inexorable; all my pleadings about the differences in their position do not move her one jot."

"All that may be true, and yet can we not fulfil our purposes through Rutland?"

"But how?"

"Well, it is a matter of time."

"Time! but how will time help? Alizon will soon be of age, and she will do whatever she believes to be right."

"And she loves this man? I mean, do you think it will last?"

"I am afraid it will. She is no giddy child, and she has never shown the slightest preference for any man before. And—why, think of it! If Alizon were to marry this Protestant minister here in Lynford, I—I think I should go mad! The papers would be full of it, the town would reek with gossip. Besides, think of it—my only child, a dissenting minister's wife!"

"It would be terrible, terrible!" said Ritzoom, like one musing. "Still I have hopes."

"But do not buoy me up with false hopes," cried her ladyship. "You see," she went on excitedly, "you thought her change of faith was only a passing whim, and that you could soon bring her to reason. But you were mistaken."

"I do not admit that," said Ritzoom, "and——"

* Copyright in the United States of America;

he hesitated for a second. "What is your real opinion of Rutland?" he added.

"I have nothing against him personally. He is well conducted, and gentlemanly. But for one episode, which, I suppose, he could defend, he has acted honourably."

"You know nothing of his antecedents?"

"Nothing except what he has told me," and Lady Neville related the purport of what Duncan had said about himself months before.

"He has had no love affairs before he came to Lynford, I suppose?"

"I don't know, but don't think about that. I could not bear any Adephi drama plots to be associated with Alizon."

"And I desire none, Lady Neville; still it seems to me our battle must be fought through him."

"How?"

"He struck me as having a high sense of duty."

"I should say he would try to do what he believed to be right."

"Do you not think he would do a great deal to win your consent for Alizon to be his wife?"

"Yes; but I could never give it."

"Not if he were a Catholic?"

"Perhaps; I don't know. But what is the use of speaking of that? It is impossible."

"Nothing is impossible. I do not give up easily."

"Yes, but surely if his contact with Rome and its teachers could not change him, he will not yield now. Remember he had given up all hope of winning Alizon. Had she not spoken—all would have been different."

"Was not that a ruse?"

"No, he is truthful and sincere, whatever else he may be. But, oh, Father Ritzoom, do think of some way out of this terrible affair."

"Lady Neville, will you give me carte blanche in this matter?"

"I do not understand?"

"Will you allow me to manage everything? To say what I think wise, to make promises in your name?"

"What promises?"

"I do not know, but only such promises as may be for your happiness, for Alizon's eternal salvation, and for the glory of our Church. Will you trust me fully?"

Lady Neville was silent.

"Without that I can do nothing. You see, I may have to take quick decided action, action which you may not understand. The situation is desperate, and if not managed wisely will become deplorable,—fatal. Believe me, I will not dream of sully the honour of your name, rather, I will try and save it, I believe I can. But no one can act without perfect trust. Have you sufficient confidence in me, to give me an entirely free hand to deal with Rutland?"

"But he is not in England."

"He soon will be. I see that the Tudor congregation have arranged to give him a welcome home the day after to-morrow. Unless we are careful they will soon be arranging to give a welcome to Alizon as the minister's wife."

"Oh, do something, Father Ritzoom!"

"You trust me, then, trust me fully. You give me authority to act in your name?"

"Yes, yes, but remember that Alizon is my only child, that she is as dear as my life to me."

"I will remember that."

A little later, Ritzoom and Father Sheen walked back to the latter's house. As they passed Tudor chapel Ritzoom read the bill announcing Rutland's home-coming very carefully, but he spoke no word to his companion.

"Have you done anything,—settled anything?" asked the simple old parish priest again and again, as they walked homeward, but Ritzoom made no reply; he was thinking deeply of the task which lay before him.

"If I failed with Alizon, I succeeded with Lady Neville," thought the Jesuit as he went to bed. "I led up the conversation in such a way that she was unable to refuse me."

Throughout the whole of the next day he did not leave the house, neither did he exchange confidences with his brother priest. He had work to do that was both delicate and difficult, and he determined to take no false steps.

"The initial difficulties will be the greatest," he concluded, after formulating his plans. "If I can once overcome them, I can begin to weave my web around him, and then——"

"It must be done too," he continued thinking, after pacing the room for some time. "The child must be saved from such a fatal step, and the Church must be defended. Yes, that's it. I feel like Cardinal Wiseman in that respect; I never cared for anything but the Church, and for it I would gladly give my life. But I wonder how it is that Alizon, a child of many generations of faithful Catholics, should, should—but there! I must heal the breach, I must heal the breach!"

On the Saturday evening, Ritzoom wended his way towards Tudor Chapel. What his purpose was in doing this no one knew. Indeed, Father Sheen, simple-minded, kind-hearted old man that he was, felt very much hurt at the Jesuit's behaviour. Having great faith in his power, however, the good old priest uttered no word of expostulation. Ritzoom was dressed as an ordinary layman, so he passed into the chapel without notice. Besides, no one knew him in Lynford. During his visits in the town he had always acted in a private capacity, and had taken care not to draw any attention towards himself.

The huge building was filled with people, even although it wanted ten minutes before the time announced for the meeting to commence. On nearly every face was a look of pleasant expectation, and all eyes were turned towards the vestry door.

All around the priest men and women were talking in subdued tones, but loud enough for him to understand their conversation. He found that Rutland was their sole topic.

"Hast a seen 'im?" said one.

"Noa, but oo's coom. Aar George William were spaikin' to th' station-maaster, and oo said as aa oo coom laast neight."

"Yi, and how did aa look?"

"Aw doan know. It wur dark. Eh, but I shall be reight glad to hear the sound on 'is voice agean. Oo's a gradely lad."

"Yi, oo is 'n all. Ther's niver been 'is like at Tudor afore. Hast aa contributed?"

"Yi, a bit. Ther's fifty volumes, I suppose?"

"More nor that. Then theer's a watch, and a writin'-desk. Ay, but it wur a pleasure to give brass to buy things for him. Aw spoase th' committee 'ardly knowed what to git. I hear as aa ther's no likelihood on his gettin' wed, and soa they couldn't buy things for a house."

"I've 'eard ther' was no trouble-i' gittin' brass."

"Noa. They got more nor they wanted. Ay, God bless 'im, but oo's a rare un. Ay, time's up, ther's clock strikin', look, and oo's comin'!"

Ritzoom looked at the vestry door and saw Rutland come into the chapel and walk up the rostrum stairs, accompanied by some of the officers of the church. When the young minister appeared, the whole audience, numbering nearly two thousand people, rose en masse, to cheer him. As it was afterwards remarked, never was such a sight seen in Lynford before. A great wave of emotion passed over the great congregation; old men with weather-beaten faces wiped away the tears which they could not suppress, old motherly women shouted out their welcome, young men and maidens cheered lustily, while all over the great church were heard expressions of gladness and thankfulness.

The meeting was an utter surprise to the young man. He knew nothing about it until a few hours before it commenced, and even then he had no idea that it would assume such dimensions. In the space before the communion-rails he saw a large piece of cloth, which was evidently placed there to cover some things beneath, but he had no idea what it was. Everything was surprising, overwhelming. As the crowd welcomed him, he felt so touched, so overcome by the manifestation of their love, that the tears welled up into his eyes, and a sob rose in his throat which could not be suppressed.

The senior church officer gave out a hymn, in which the great congregation joined. How the sound rose and swelled! Perhaps there are few parts of the country which are more noted for singing than Lancashire, and as nearly two thousand voices joined in the grand old hymn, "All Hail the power of Jesu's name," it was difficult to describe the impression made.

To Ritzoom it came as a revelation. He did not understand the mental and spiritual outlook of the people, he did not realise the religious convictions of the sturdy sons of the north. Here were people who had cast aside all priestly claims, and who yielded to no religious authority, save that of Christ Himself, and yet they were loyal to His ambassador. Here were men and women who confessed their sins to none but God, who trusted only in Him for the consciousness of forgiveness, and yet they rejoiced in their faith, and had no doubts about its reality. They claimed perfect liberty, mental and religious, and yet they were sober, law-abiding, God-fearing people. It was such as they who had made the nation great, and it was such as they who made it impossible for the priest to gain any footing in the country.

The whole gathering presented a problem to the subtle-minded Jesuit; he was ignorant of the forces which it suggested, aye, and ignorant of the sturdy independence which formed the basis of the people's character.

He took in everything at a glance, and tried to understand the significance of what he saw. It made his task more difficult, but it made his victory more glorious if he should accomplish it. Oh, if he could only convert Rutland, and if he could only bring this people into submission to the Church! Well, and if he did, would they be happier, stronger, more God-fearing than they were?

The singing was followed by prayer; simple, earnest, sincere. Again the Jesuit was impressed. For a simple layman to lead the prayers of the people in their own language, without appeals to saints, or apostles, or the Virgin! It was all strange, very strange.

Throughout the meeting he sat listening and taking note of everything. He heard the old grey-headed leaders of the church, as well as the young men just beginning to bear the burdens of life, testify to their affection for Rutland; he witnessed how they welcomed him back with heart-felt warmth. He heard them praise him for upholding the faith, and defending the liberties of the people. He listened to their prayers as they pleaded for his welfare, bodily, mentally, spiritually.

"The Church has an impossible task," he thought sadly. "These Nonconformists form more than half of the religious life of the country, and they will never yield."

Ere long a presentation was made. A writing-desk, a large parcel of valuable books, a gold watch and chain, and other articles were given with the church's love, and the people's prayers.

"I have said that these things are given by Tudor Church," said the chairman, who happened to be Mayor of the town, "but I am not quite correct. People from almost every church asked to contribute: Even Catholics, or those who used to be Catholics, are among the contributors. I am glad of this. It shows that the Church is broader than we think, and it shows how strongly our friend and minister has laid hold of our town."

When Rutland got up to reply, there was the wildest enthusiasm. For several minutes he was unable to speak, and eventually, when the audience settled down to listen, his emotion almost overcame him. That great sea of kindly faces, those tear-dimmed eyes, those honest cries, "God bless tha', lad," made speech almost impossible. He mastered himself presently, however, and was able to speak freely. He thanked them for their kindness, their generosity, their sympathy, their prayers, their love, and expressed the hope that he should in the coming days be able to prove himself worthy of it. He would not describe his experiences in Rome; perhaps, sometime soon, he would be able to give them a lecture, when he would be able to speak about them at length. And yet there was one thing he would like to mention in connection with Rome, which was in some degree associated with the controversy in which he took part some months before.

"And it is suggested by the chairman's speech about 'the Church,'" he said. "We Free Churchmen are often sneered at because of our divisions, and at one time it was a painful problem to me. But the real meaning of the Church has become more and more impressed upon me. As you know, the Romanists claim that theirs is the only Church, and they rest their claim upon certain so-called facts in history, and a supposed long line of Apostolical succession. It is a very sad fact that a great mass of the young and educated life of Italy is drifting from religion altogether, and that Romanism fails, even at its head-quarters, to meet the intellectual and spiritual life to young free Italy. At the same time, great hosts of the people belong to the Church, the real Church; because they love Christ, and are trying to be true to Him. On my way home I stopped at Berlin, where there is a strong Protestant spirit; here, again, in spite of ignorance, unbelief, sin, there is a great multitude belonging to the true Church, the Church of love and obedience to Christ. And the same is true here in Lynford. We have our different denominations, but we belong to the same Church, in so far as we love and serve our Lord.

"I know this seems like a platitude, but it has been made real to me during these last three months. Moreover, the great fact that the true Church of Christ is ONE has been made real. Of course, all those pagan trappings of priestcraft are foolishness, all that talk about the Church being confined to one organisation is worse than foolishness, but the oneness remains, it is a spirit of love and obedience, and that, thank God, in spite of ignorance, bigotry, and error, belongs to all the Churches. And this makes the Church so much greater than we imagine; it oversteps all the barriers of men, it embraces all pure, loving hearts, it makes the Church UNITED, and it makes it UNIVERSAL. I shall continue to fight what I believe to be error, I shall still try to destroy all cramping, narrowing influences; but I shall more than ever recognise the fact that the Spirit of Christ is everywhere, and wherever He is, the Church is. Indeed, I like to think of the words of that grand old father in the early Church, I mean St. Ignatius. He, when writing to the Smyrnaans, said, 'Wherever Jesus Christ may be, there is the Catholic Church.'"

His words struck a new note in the meeting, and Ritzoom felt its power. It made the work he had set to accomplish more difficult still, but he did not deviate from his purpose.

It was very late before the meeting broke up, for Rutland had to shake hands with hundreds of people, but Ritzoom stayed to the end. When the building was nearly empty, he made his way to Rutland's side.

"Let me also welcome you back," he said with a smile. "I have been much struck with the gathering, and with your address, and I should like an hour's chat with you about it, and about other things."

"You are very kind," said Rutland; "but I am afraid I could not see you until to-morrow night, after my work is over."

"That will do splendidly. Shall I call at your lodgings about nine o'clock?"

"Yes," replied Rutland quietly. "I will arrange to meet you."

"Thank you very much. To-morrow night then."

The priest walked through the town thinking deeply. "It is a difficult task," he said; "but I think I shall accomplish it."

CHAPTER XXXV.

DUNCAN RUTLAND'S TEMPTATION.

"WELL, and you enjoyed your visit to the Eternal City?" said Ritzoom with a pleasant smile.

"Enjoyed is scarcely the word," replied the young man, and he sat back in his arm-chair, while opposite him sat the Jesuit smoking a large cigar.

They were in Rutland's study on the Sunday evening as had been arranged. The young minister was rather excited. This was scarcely to be wondered at, for his work through the day had been very trying. Great eager crowds had filled the spacious building, and the young man's whole strength had been given to the services. Moreover, he guessed the object of the priest's visit, and felt sure he would have some message from Lady Neville.

"Isn't it? Well, perhaps not. One enjoys a cigar, but scarcely a visit to Rome, that is if one possesses the historical spirit; one is awed, bewildered, overwhelmed, but one does not 'enjoy' in the ordinary sense of the word."

Rutland waited for him to proceed.

"Of course, you will have guessed that I had some definite purpose in this visit?" said Ritzoom after a short silence.

"Yes, I guessed that."

"Of course you did. Well, there are two traits of my character which are strongly marked. One is an utter frankness, and the other is a disposition to get at a point quickly."

"THEN YOU WILL CONSIDER MY PROPOSAL?"

Rutland nodded.

"Well, to be true to my character, I will be frank, and I will get to the point at once. I am sure this will be most pleasing to you as a straightforward Englishman."

The young man again nodded, but remained silent.

"I will therefore be brutally blunt. You have, I am given to understand, become the suitor for the hand of our mutual friend, Miss Alizon Neville, and that she has been disposed to listen kindly to you?"

The young man flushed rather angrily. He did not relish the priest's interposition in the matter, but he spoke no word.

"Of course," went on Ritzoom, "I have personally no right to interfere with your privacy; but as you may know, I am honoured with Lady Neville's confidence, and—well, it has always been a pleasure for me to meet you."

"Thank you," replied Rutland quietly.

"I will be brutally frank," laughed Ritzoom almost nervously, "and I will confess that I hoped your visit to Rome would have led you to embrace our faith; but my hopes have not been realised."

"No, if you hoped that, they have not been realised; they never will."

"That is a pity. Lady Neville's objections might be overruled then."

Rutland looked up inquiringly.

"Yes, I repeat it. Personally, mind you, I should rejoice in such a union. I am not influenced by English prejudices. I believe in the aristocracy of intellect, the aristocracy of worth, but, of course, we don't all see alike, do we?"

"No, we don't all see alike."

"And so I have come to see whether we cannot arrange this matter. We are men, and we are both broad-minded enough to see the value of compromises. One of your sceptical philosophers seems to think that compromise is the basis of civilisation."

"What compromise are you thinking of?"

"I am interested in Miss Neville too," went on Ritzoom, without noticing Rutland's question. "Of course, her ladyship is very bitter, and will hardly listen to reason. It would be a terrible sorrow to me to know that the poor child was disinherited, and sent away from home. Of course, under no circumstance would Alizon do what her ladyship forbade her; but even a negative disobedience will, unless matters can be arranged, end in the poor girl's life being utterly wrecked. As you know, she has been tenderly reared, she has been surrounded by refinement and luxury, and so to be deprived of everything that must be dear to the heart of such a one would be terrible, and I would like to avoid such a calamity if possible."

"Am I to understand then," said Rutland, roused to speak by Ritzoom's words, "that Lady Neville—"

"Will certainly disinherit her if she persists in disobedience. And, well, even if you were to—well, carry out the plans which have suddenly formed themselves in your mind, it would be terribly cruel to drag her from the Priory in order that she might share with you the pleasures of a cottage."

"How do you know what is in my mind?" said Rutland, suddenly thrown off his guard.

"I have an unfortunate habit of arriving at conclusions very quickly," was the reply; "still, they are seldom wrong. Of course," he went on, after hesitating a second, "although I am an avowed celibate, I have great sympathy with lovers. At the same time I am sure you will agree with me when I say that it would be taking a mean advantage of a young girl's weakness to alienate her from her mother, to cause her to be disinherited, and to drag her into poverty. For myself I know nothing more contemptible than the doing of such a thing, and I am sure you would scorn to be a party to such a proceeding."

"I presume you have something to suggest," remarked Rutland presently.

"Yes," replied Ritzoom, "I have, and I feel sure you will see the reasonableness of my proposals. You see I wish to do two or three things. I wish, first of all, to save Alizon from being driven from her home, and I wish to make both of you happy. This, you will understand, cannot be done unless we adopt a course agreeable to Lady Neville."

"Well, tell me what you wish to say?"

"Of course, I need not remind you that you are a Protestant, and that Lady Neville is a Catholic. Now, while, in time, her ladyship may become reconciled to the thought of her daughter marrying a Protestant, she would never consent to her marrying a Protestant minister."

"I see."

"Of course, such an arrangement would be absurd; indeed, her ladyship, with her antecedents and her devoted loyalty to the Church, would rather see her daughter dead than that such a thing should happen."

"Well?" Rutland's face was set and stern, his eyes shone with an angry light.

"You see that. Well, the proposal I am authorised to make is this: You resign Tudor Church, and study for another profession, say the bar. With your previous education and training, you would be able to pass the necessary examinations very quickly. Then when you are entitled to plead at the bar, her ladyship will be willing to listen to your proposal for her daughter's hand."

"And meanwhile?" Rutland asked the question as though it meant much to him.

"Meanwhile," answered Ritzoom, "her ladyship will not seek to prejudice her against you."

"But should I be allowed to see her?"

"That, of course, would not be wise. You see, her ladyship is naturally anxious about the future of her only child; she is also desirous of being true to the commands of her Church. She regards the arrangement as a necessary probation for you both. You are both young, and your experiences have been, let us say, a little out of the ordinary. Therefore, it should not be hard for you to wait a year or two. The strength of your affection would be tested, and her ladyship would be assured that you were willing to make sacrifices in order to gain an inestimable treasure. There, Mr. Rutland, you have the case in a nutshell, and I think you must admit that Lady Neville has been exceedingly lenient."

"But if I remain a Protestant minister?"

"Then, of course, the case is hopeless. Even you can see that it would not be possible for her to consent to her daughter receiving the attentions of a Protestant minister."

"But if I persist, and—and if she persists?"

"In that case I think you would, to use an English colloquialism, 'cut your own throat.' Of this I am practically certain: she will not positively disobey her mother. That is to say, she will not do what her mother commands her not to do. But supposing she does. Supposing you pressed your suit, and she married you, what would follow? You would cause the woman you love to be disinherited, for her ladyship would no longer own her as her daughter. More than that, you would blight the lives of both mother and child. Her ladyship possesses the spirit of the old Roman matrons. She will do what she believes is right, but the evening of her life would be darkened, her home would be practically destroyed. You can, of course, see this. But not only would you curse her ladyship's life, you would curse her daughter's as well. How could she be happy while the memory of her disobedience haunted her? Why, think of it! She would be taken away from all her refined associations; she who never knew want, would be haunted by poverty, she would constantly realise that she was alienated from home, and that she had blighted the life of the mother who bore her. I put it to you frankly, as man to man, would it not be a despicable action?"

"Have you Lady Neville's authority for saying this?"

"Yes, I have; that is, I have her authority for making the proposal which I submitted to you. Have I made everything plain?"

"Yes, I think so."

"You can, of course, see what a great concession it is on her ladyship's part. Indeed, I never thought she would have yielded so much."

"There is nothing more to say, I suppose?"

"No, nothing. The issues are very simple, and I hope I may be able to congratulate you on deciding wisely."

"I hope so."

"Well, what do you say? What answer shall I take to her ladyship?"

"None at all—at present."

"Oh, well, of course there is no hurry; all the same, I thought you would have had no difficulty in deciding. You are not asked to change a single article of your faith, you are simply required to change one profession for another, and a far more desirable one. Why, think! The successful barrister may rise to the highest position in the land. He may be a great advocate, or even a judge. He may go into parliament and rise to be Chancellor of the Exchequer, or even First Lord of the Treasury. And with Lady Neville's influence, a baronetcy, or even a peerage, is not impossible. On the other hand, what has the Nonconformist ministry to offer a man of your ability and ambition? You can rise no higher than you have already risen. You are the minister of the principal dissenting church in the town, and if you stay here for thirty years,—well, you can be no more. I think I speak as your friend, and I do not see how a sane man could reject the proposal I have made, and to which her ladyship has consented. You see this, don't you?"

"Yes, I see it."

"If you refuse—well, I see nothing but misery as the result. Whatever course events take, they must be calamitous; but I need not go over that ground again."

"No, you need not go over that ground again."

"Then you will consider my proposal?"

"Yes, I will consider it."

"When may your answer be expected?"

"I don't know;—soon."

"Then I will go; good night."

"Good night."

"I've got him," thought Ritzoom, as he walked away from the house. "I've got him. He takes the bait. When that first great step is taken, I shall be master of the situation, and I will guide matters in such a way that all my desires shall still be accomplished."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

MAN PROPOSES, GOD DISPOSES.

DUNCAN RUTLAND did not sleep throughout the whole night after Ritzoom had left him. He could not. He was again in the toils of a great temptation. He had thought when he had determined to leave Rome a few weeks before that he had fought his battle and won it, now, however, he realised that it was harder than ever. Then he did not know that Alizon loved him, his hopes of winning her were very dim, now all was different, and that difference made the struggle more painful. The cup of happiness had been lifted to his lips, he had tasted of its joys, and to have it dashed from him for ever seemed more than he could bear. What would life be to him without her? How could he bear to spend perhaps fifty years without having her by his side, knowing all the time that she longed to be there?

He considered the whole situation again and again. He reviewed every possibility, and it seemed as though there were no alternatives save those which Ritzoom had set before him.

Hour after hour passed, and still he was under the Jesuit's influence, the cruel logic of his words constantly appeared before him, undermining his will and his power of resistance. For inclination, pleasure, aye, the happiness of a lifetime, lay in obedience to the priest's words.

Oh, it seemed so easy, so pleasant to yield, to swim with the tide, to live for love! It was so hard, so terribly hard to follow that path which in spite of all his reasonings, duty marked out for him!

For supposing he followed in the path of duty, would he not blight Alizon's life? supposing he determined to be true to the commands of his conscience, and continued in the work in which he was engaged, what then? Well, one of two things would happen. First, he would have to give up Alizon, and try to wipe out her memory from the pages of his life. And what would that mean? To him it would mean disappointed hopes, broken ideals, aye, it would mean a lifetime of weariness, of loneliness, of sorrow. He could not bear the thought of living his life without the presence of one who had become all the world to him! Then the other alternative appeared. Supposing he pressed his suit, supposing he succeeded in taking her away from the home of the Nevilles, that she might become the wife of a Nonconformist minister? Ritzoom was right, such an act would be cruelty, madness. How could Alizon, with her tastes, her education, her associations, be happy? Besides, she would bring discord in her own home; more, she would be disinherited, driven from home. She would be the subject of gossip for the whole town. His action would be misunderstood, and, possibly, his influence lessened. No, it would not be fair, it would not be manly to ask her to share his lot; she would be happier away from him, she would have less to repent of if she remained amidst the associations of her old life, and in the sunshine of her mother's smile.

Then he thought of Ritzoom's suggestion. It offered such glowing possibilities. Yes, he could become a barrister, and a successful one too. He felt sure of it. And the profession offered such a glorious sphere for an ambitious man! He could make for himself a name that would make him welcome in any home in England. As the Jesuit had said, there was but little probability of his rising any higher than he was at present while he remained a Protestant minister, but at the English bar—well, the horizon seemed boundless! He thought of all the great names which had become household words in the land. And he could rise as they did. But that was only the least part of the prospect. He would be able to have Alizon as his wife, aye, and with her mother's sanction. And why not? He could do good in his new life, as much as he was doing now. He could still preach the Gospel, could still help the poor, aye, his position would give him new influence, and greater opportunities for doing good. With Alizon by his side he could bring sunshine into thousands of lives, and at the same time he could fulfil the dream of his own life.

Yes, that was it, that was it. He would go to Lady Neville, he would tell her that for Alizon's sake he would resign his Church, and adopt the course she had suggested.

But—but—and then all the other side appeared. Conscience spoke loudly, loyalty to duty became a greater, grander thing than the happiness of a life-time.

When morning came the question was still unsettled. He rose as soon as it was light, and walked across the great wild moors which stretched away behind the house in which he lived.* Again he prayed for strength as he had prayed before; again he poured out his soul in wild cries to his Creator.

But the questions of his heart were not answered.

In the afternoon he went through the town. How glad the people seemed to see him, to shake him by the hand, to speak a kindly word. Many of them were rough in speech, some a trifle coarse, but they were kind at heart, kind and simple. He remembered the words which were spoken on the previous evening, and at the meeting on the Saturday. He thought of the expressions of their loyalty and their love. He saw again the great throngs of people who had crowded the building. Ah, he might become a greater man by being a barrister, he might occupy a more enviable position from the worldling's standpoint, but would he be a better man in himself? Did not Ritzoom's suggestion mean sacrificing his manhood?

At half-past five the machinery of the mills ceased, and thousands of weavers thronged the streets. Scores of them, aye, hundreds, gave him a cheerful nod and a kind smile; some stopped him and told him how glad they were to see him back again in their midst.

Presently he saw old Matthy Bray and Jonas Dixon coming towards him.

"Ay, Maaster Rutland," they said, "aw'm reight glad to see tha abaat agean. Yo're lookin' rare and brown, too. Tha mun tak' care o' thysen naa. We can noan afford for thee to laive us and go off to Rome. Tha mun stick to us naa."

"Do you really wish that I should?" asked the young man with a wan smile.

"Wish," said old Jonas, "wish, lad? We needn't tell thee that. Saturday neight tould tha that, yi, and yesterday too. Us Lancashire folk are rough and ready; we say straight things, but we know when we like onybody. Ay, 't would be a blow for Tudor, ay, and for Lynford, too, if thaa wert obliged to laive us. But yo' wil'n't, mester, yo're better naa, aren't you?" and the old weaver looked into the young man's eyes with a look of affection.

"Oh, yes, I'm much better; but not over strong yet!"

"No," said Matthy Bray, "tha wants some good

Lancashire food to ait. Yo've 'ad a lot o' Italian rubbish, an' it's noan good for a civilised man. Yo' mun geet plenty of good Lancashire beef, and craim, and that sort o' thing. Things wi' a bitt o' strengthenin' stuff in 'em.

"An' yo' mun noan work too 'ard. Tak' it aisy for a bit, lad, tak' it aisy. What we want is that tha sud geet wed. A nice Lancashire lass, wi' a bit o' brass. Ther's plenty i' Tudor, Mester Rutland, nice lasses an' oal. Geet wed and then thou'lt geet settled. Ay, but tha mun settle daan for life, lad. Tha mun noan laive Tudor, we're suited, and tha 'rt suited. Good neight, mester."

The two weavers walked on, and presently he met more. It was the same everywhere. Rich and poor met him with smiles, and all gave him a word of welcome.

He felt himself to be mean and ungrateful. These people had showered kindness upon him, and all the while he was contemplating leaving them. And yet—well, what should he do?

Days passed away, and still he came no nearer a decision. He had not seen Alizon, neither had he heard from her. He hungered for a message, and yet he dared not go near the Priory. He dared not go to places where he might possibly see her.

On the Thursday night, Ritzoom paid another visit to his lodgings. He evidently came in the expectation of receiving Rutland's answer, but in this he was disappointed. The young man was still fighting his battle, a battle between love and duty, between pleasure and pain, and try as he might, he could not make up his mind.

The Jesuit did not press him to state his intentions; he was too wise for that; but he strengthened the impression he had made on his previous visit; by many subtle suggestions, he drew Rutland along that course which he intended he should take. For the priest had made his plans carefully, and he knew that when the young minister had taken the first step he would be able to obtain a positive hold upon him, a hold which he did not intend to relax until his utmost wishes were fulfilled. He believed he had estimated Rutland's character correctly, and he knew the forces by which he would be governed.

But, as he had said to himself when on his way thither, he must first of all get the young man to cross the Rubicon, and burn his bridges, after that all would be well.

He did not get him to do this, however, for Rutland was not to be moulded like clay in the hands of the potter. He had an individuality of his own, he had a will, and he had a conscience. Thus, while he influenced him in the desired direction, he could make him take no step.

Nevertheless, he went to the Priory, after the interview, with a smiling face, for he believed that the battle was won. Whenever it was possible, Ritzoom made it a point to say some words to those whom he desired to influence, which he knew would have effect after his departure.

"Of course, you—you have seen no one from the Priory since your return to Lynford?" he said casually, as he rose to take his leave.

"No."

"I thought not," and then he looked at Rutland as a skilled mesmerist looks at his victim.

"There is nothing wrong at the Priory, I hope?" said the young man, thrown off his guard for a moment.

"There are wet eyes there."

"Wet eyes! What do you mean?"

"Surely you can guess," said the Jesuit, as he left the house. "Good night."

All through the night he thought of Alizon, and the memory of the priest's words haunted him. He interpreted them in a hundred ways, and every one of his interpretations made him long to yield to his heart's desire.

What should he do? What should he do? The question haunted him throughout the next day, and all the while he felt himself becoming weaker and weaker.

At nine o'clock that night he found himself alone fighting the same battle. He had just returned from a meeting, and was now sitting in his lonely rooms. Oh, it was very, very wearisome, this continuous doubt, this continuous struggle! He could not bear it much longer. He felt sometimes as though he must yield to the conditions which Lady Neville had authorised the priest to make.

Presently he drew a chair to his study-desk, the desk which had been presented to him the previous Saturday evening. Yes, he would write that night and decide the question for ever. He took up a pen and wrote the date, then followed the words: "Dear Lady Neville"—

So far he got, and then he stopped. Could he resign Tudor Church, for that was what it meant, on the very desk the people had given him a few days before? On the other hand, could he give up Alizon for ever?

He took out his watch and looked at the time. It was the watch the Church had given him. He looked around the room, and saw a number of books which told him of his duty. Oh, but he could not give up Alizon, and yet—

He heard a knock at the door. No one answered it. Evidently his landlady had gone for a few minutes' chat with a neighbour. It was repeated.

He went to the door, and on opening it, saw a veiled figure, which he could not recognise in the darkness.

"Mrs. Nutter has gone out, I think," he said, "but I daresay she will be back in a few minutes."

"May I come in?"

Without a word he closed the door behind her and drew her into the room.

"Alizon!" he cried.

She took off her hat and veil and placed them on a chair, and then looked at him like one wondering.

"I have heard everything," she said.

"Your mother's conditions?"

"Yes."

He was silent. He did not ask her how she came, or why. She was there before him, and he felt that the great moment of his life had come.

"What are we going to do?" she asked.

He continued silent. Her presence made him long more than ever to yield to the conditions which had been made, and yet she quickened his sense of duty, and of loyalty to what was right.

"Has he—Ritzoom told you of our meetings?" he asked presently.

"Yes, he has told me everything, told it as only he can tell."

He nodded.

"IT WOULD BE WORSE THAN DEATH TO GIVE YOU UP."

"What are we going to do?" she asked again presently.

He caught her hand. "Oh, Alison!" he cried, "it would be worse than death to—to give you up."

"Would it?" and a bright light shone in the girl's eyes.

"Yes," he said, and she knew that he meant what he said.

They were both silent for a few seconds, for they knew not what to say.

"You must not give up your Church," she said presently.

"Must I not?" His voice was hoarse, for the girl's words sounded like a death-knell in his heart.

"No, it would be wrong, it would be disloyal, you must not lower your standard by adopting a poorer profession."

"No." He felt she was right, knew that her voice was as the voice of God.

"All those fine sayings about place, position, and power are as nothing," she said, "they cannot be entertained by those who believe as we do. We know the truth, and the truth has made us free."

He felt ashamed of himself. She was a convert of only a few weeks, and yet she taught him his duty.

"Then you have come to bid me good-bye," he said presently.

"What?" There was a sob in her voice as she uttered the word.

"You have come to bid me good-bye," he repeated. "Oh, I know what you say is right. I feel it more than ever now. But, oh, Alizon, it will be like death to part with you."

The girl looked at him with questioning, yearning eyes.

"Yes, like death," he repeated. "The thought that I must spend my life without you, month after month, year after year, and yet not to have you near me. O God, I cannot bear it!"

"Must you bear it?" and her voice trembled as she spoke.

"The man said there was no other way, and I feel that he is right. It would be mean of me to ask you to disobey your mother; it would be wrong in me to try to alienate you from home, and cause you to be disinherited. Oh, I feel the meanness, the unmanliness of doing such a thing. And even if I thought you would consent I would not ask you. I have fought it all out, I know the bitterness, the remorse that would follow in the train of such an action, and yet—oh, Alizon, may God give us strength to bear it."

"Is there no other way?" said the girl.

"No, I know no other. You have made me feel that I cannot cease being a minister, and I cannot ask you to do the other."

"Then I must ask you, Duncan."

He turned towards her with a startled, wondering look in his eyes.

"If you will not ask me, I must ask you," she repeated. "God did not lead us to love each other to mock us. He did not open our eyes that we should live in darkness. I have been thinking too. I—I cannot believe that mother will remain for ever angry with me, she loves me too much for that. And even if she does, well, do you think I care so much for house and position and society and all that sort of thing—as to, oh, don't you understand?"

The young man sat like one dazed. He knew not what to say, or what to think.

"I should blight your happiness for ever if—if—" he stopped suddenly.

"And if you don't?"

"If—if I don't!" he stammered.

"Yes, if you don't, what would my life be then?"

He did not speak a word.

"Can you refuse me, Duncan?" she said, looking into his eyes.

"No, I cannot. God forgive me, but I cannot," he cried, as he saw the light of her great love shining through her tear-dimmed eyes.

IV.

THE MYSTERY OF PAIN AND THE COMFORT OF LOVE.

OR some minds the mystery of pain has a weird and ceaseless fascination. If the subject could be dismissed they would be devoutly thankful; for its repeated investigation only shows how vast is the prison-house of pain in which both men and animals are immured. Much of the suffering they contemplate seems needless and purposeless, and as this conception gains depth and strength, they feel themselves falling over the ragged edges of the precipice of insanity. Misery which contributes to edification, pain which is a necessary step towards a higher good can be patiently borne; but woes which appear both needless and purposeless render faith in a Divine providence difficult, and the maintenance of tranquillity of spirit impossible. The investigation of human woes and animal miseries has been to some men as agonising as the horrible experiences of the torture-chambers of the Inquisition. Paul said, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus;" and they might have said, "We bear in mind and body the marks of the mental anguish we have endured." The furrowed brow, the eyes which look like wells of tears ever ready to run over, say, "We have looked on sorrow, and can never be mirthful again." People said of Dante, as they saw his majestic face overcast with unutterable grief, "There goes the man who has been in hell." Men who have lifted the veil which hides the unpleasant sights of Nature tell us that they have found hell on earth, and the sight of its unceasing miseries makes them sad-hearted pilgrims in a world of seeming festivity and gladness. The discoveries of Bacteriology show the diseased bodies of men as ante-chambers of hell, wherein malignant cruelty riots under material forms.

"Instead of God the swarmed bacteria come,
Nature seven-fold has multiplied the curse
Man casts into her : now it makes an home
In him and generates, so to asperse
The burdened organs, where he holds his breath,
With fetid rains of generative death."

The contemplation of these sad, these tear-provoking facts, makes men feel as if they had passed through the torture-chambers of the Inquisition.

Edgar Allan Poe describes a veritable creation of the deepest hell of cruelty—a torture-chamber of the Spanish Inquisition. A victim of the inquisitors awoke from stupor, induced by torture and drugs, to find himself bound firmly upon a wooden couch over which oscillated what seemed at first the huge pendulum of an enormous clock. With apathetic vision he watched its regular movement from side to side until, with horrified alarm, he discovered that the weight of the pendulum was a semi-circular knife, which with every oscillation came nearer to his own person. Bound with unbreakable bonds he lay in speechless agony, wondering how long the torture of contemplation would last, and when the sharp knife would end his misery. He followed with his eyes the movements of the knife until unconsciousness mercifully supervened. When he awoke the knife was already fraying his clothing at each unhasting sweep. Happily he was able to force the rope that bound him into the path of the murderous knife, and thus obtain his liberation. But his escape from terror was only very brief. The walls of his cell begun to glow with heat, which made visible fiendish figures and mocking faces, filling him with horror. Presently he noticed that the cell in which he lay was getting smaller, for the walls were gradually contracting and compelling him to move towards the centre in which was now clearly revealed a yawning pit. He peered over the edge of the pit to discover if in that direction he might find a way of escape; but he started back amazed, for the pit revealed worse horrors than the cell of torture in which he lay. His plight was pitiable and hopeless. His tormentors were determined to drive him to insanity or death. How he escaped from their relentless grip we need not now narrate. Some who have sought to explore the Inferno of the world's miseries have, like this helpless man who escaped the death-dealing pendulum only to be forced towards the pit of deepest horror, found themselves helpless and hopeless between sorrows they could not relieve and evils they could not resist. Some men who have gazed upon the Medusa-like face of the MYSTERY OF PAIN have returned with the shadow of unrelieved woe upon their faces, and the gleam of hopeless insanity in their eyes. Others have declared that no satisfactory solution of the problem of suffering is possible. Very conscientious and laborious efforts have been made by many persons to cast light upon the mystery of pain, and find for sorrow-burdened men at least some relief from torturing thought. The literature thus produced is enormous. Dr. A. B. Grosart, who for a quarter of a century studied this subject, told me that he had in the course of his researches read, in various languages, over three thousand distinct works, and calculated that nearly two thousand more awaited his perusal. I regret that the work he contemplated writing, as the result of his studies, has not appeared in print. The existence of this immense literature is convincing evidence of the perennial interest felt by men in that mystery which casts a shadow across every man's path. Multitudes never think seriously about this subject, but it has for others a resistless fascination. It can only be regarded with indifference by the callous and the thoughtless. As life becomes rich and full, men are disposed to investigate sympathetically the sorrows of men, and even the wrongs and pains of animals. Whether under present conditions a solution of this problem, the enigma of the ages, can be arrived at may be questioned. But "when the day breaks, and the shadows flee away," it will be found that in God's scheme of things there is nothing meaningless and useless; and that pain and sorrow wrought for good ends, and subserved Divine purposes.

"Evil is only the slave of good ;
Sorrow the servant of joy ;
And the soul is mad that refuses food
Of the meanest in God's employ."

Like all great and tender souls, John Pulsford had often busied himself with the problem of suffering. I do not know that he claimed to have solved it; but that he cast light upon it I am sure. His book on "Our Deathless Hope" is my witness.

The following passages are worthy of the consideration of all who wish to find a way out of the conditions of evil, shame and sorrow which now prevail.

"The Great Father regards the very darkness and sin of His creatures as inarticulate prayers; because they are wants. Parents who understand the wants of their children, are equally concerned to supply them, whether they are put into words of prayer or not. God is seeking in His own way the men and women who are not seeking Him. 'I am found, and will be found, of those who ask nothing from Me.' His love and patience pass all human belief. Where He is not so much as named, where His very existence is denied, where self-will and ungodliness are dominant, there He is with His unchanged purpose of good."

Further on he says:—

"I am fond of the following legend, because it throbs with right God-like humanity.

"Some centuries after Abraham and Isaac had gone into Paradise, they are represented as watching the course of their people. They saw their sufferings in Egypt, they saw them led out of Egypt by Moses, they saw them crossing the desert on the way to Canaan. And one day Isaac saw Abraham in deep thought, with tears in his eyes. He asked him why he was weeping. He replied, I see what the Canaanites will suffer from our people. They will enter into their land, and will put thousands and tens of thousands of them to death, and will burn up their cities. Isaac replied, But have not the Canaanites filled up the measure of their iniquities? Do not their sins cry aloud for judgment? And is it not in mercy to the whole world that such a people should be swept away? Abraham knew that this was all true, and yet he could not refrain from tears. He said not a word to Isaac, but took him by the hand, and led him down to the earth, and entered a sorrowful human home, where the father and mother were watching their dying son. In an insane fit of rage this son had set fire to his own clothes, and was dying in great agony. Abraham said to the parents: Why do you weep? Has not this youth been a great deal of trouble to you? Has he not brought this end upon himself by his own act? When he is gone will not you and your other children be relieved of a great burden? The father looked up in Abraham's face with anger, and silently turned away from him. The mother simply said: 'Hast thou never loved? This was our son.' Abraham and Isaac left the house. Isaac bowed his head before Abraham and said: "Father, I am instructed."

Pulsford taught that evil, the result of perverse action, will some day terminate; and when evil terminates there will no longer be a problem of suffering. He lays down and seeks to establish the following propositions:

"(1.) God's purposes are sure, and in the end, His will will prevail, and His Eternal Love will be all in all; yet there is an open field for perverse action.

"(2.) Herein is the Cross of God; and the Cross of God becomes as a matter of course, the Cross of heaven and earth.

"(3.) But the whole mystery of evil, and all its cross-working purposes being completely under the overrule of Infinite God and the Heavens, there is no ground for despair; and no such thing as the finality of evil.

"(4.) Under the reign of Eternal Law, as it is in God and in His Heavens, right humanity, with its right reason, its progress and happiness without end, are to come out of the lawlessness of self-will."

With Whittier his hope for mankind centred in the perfect goodness of God. He could say with the Quaker-poet:

"For midst the maddening maze of things,
Though tossed by storm and flood,

To one fixed faith my spirit clings,
I know that God is good."

A familiar acquaintance with Pulsford's teaching will relieve the mind from the burden of anxious questioning placed upon it by the contemplation of seemingly useless suffering and purposeless pain. As we learn to live in and breathe the atmosphere of perfect trust in the Infinite Goodness, we shall find comfort in the thought that, "God is His own interpreter, and He will make it plain." THE COMFORT OF LOVE is the only thing that can support men in a world where sorrow reigns.

To show how Pulsford could impart to sorrowing minds this blessed consolation, we will give some passages from letters written to friends and inquirers.

The first is from a letter to one who informed him of the death of her mother. His words of loving sympathy and wise counsel must have come like healing balm to those who mourned beside the dead.

"Kewick Hotel,

"Kewick,

"Aug. 31, 1886.

"MY DEAR FRIENDS,

"The announcement in the paper to-day shocks me very much, (having seen you and your mother together so recently;) and brings me into tender, fatherly sympathy with you. The terrible thing to our poor hearts is, the total rupture of all communication which follows the departure of our dear ones from this lower floor, to the higher floors of our Great Father's house. My own soul is never reconciled to this cruel fact. But I suppose from the awful darkness and silence, keener and deeper aspirations may be stirred in the breast. Perhaps our unutterable yearnings are the conditions and signs of internal births. Jesus, at any rate, said: The soul, when in travail, is like a woman in sorrow; but the sorrow shall be, is, turned into joy. Wherefore, if we can neither see, nor hear, all we would, let our hearts go on craving and craving, until our immense capacities and longings shall find their satisfaction.

"O God, our anguish in many ways is very great, cause that our Hope may be even greater, for Thine own Name, as 'Our Father,' and for Thy children's relief."

Four years later this friend who received the above comforting letter, was prostrated by disease. When recovering she received from her trusted guide and counsellor the following helpful words:

"March 23, 1890.

"You have been one of an exceeding great multitude who have been smitten and prostrate this winter. We must take our illnesses and pains to be signs of the Beautiful and Blessed Spirit that is pressing down into us and into the earth. For the right pure and truly good substance is at war with all the corrupt and vain conditions of our flesh, which is said to be our humiliation. All our bitter experiences work together under God to prepare us for a greater measure and weight of glory. We are not yet made. 'Let us make man in our own image;' and there is much unmaking, before we can be finally made incorruptible and lovely immortals.

"Tell your dear sister, with my affectionate regards, that it is quite right to be depressed by the evils and sorrows of the world. They are God's cross, and they must be ours. We must ascribe them to the operation of the self-will—Hell's self-will, and mankind's self-will. The fruits of our Father's will are truth, joy, peace, goodness, sweetness, innocence.

"Thy will be done on earth, as it is in Heaven;" otherwise it would not be Heaven.

'O joy that seeketh me through pain,
I cannot close my heart to Thee,
I trace Thy rainbow through the rain,
And feel Thy promise is not vain,
That Morn shall tearless be.'

But some, while recognising the sweet reasonableness of the above comforting letters, may bid us look on Nature's disorder and consequent woes, and first explain and then endeavour to mitigate the pains of those creatures which have not, like man, wilfully perverted the laws of Divine order. From this demand Pulsford does not ignobly shrink, but gives at least a helpful answer to it. He holds with Paul, that nature suffers with man; that nature waits the appearance of a redeemed race, (a race in which redemption is perfected;) and that when these sons of God appear, nature's sufferings will be over.

Man is regarded as central in God's scheme of things; and nature as so vitally related to man that she rises and falls with him; suffers and rejoices with him; and in his final triumph will receive the crown of her everlasting rejoicing.

If this teaching is true, each man must find in the present sorrows of nature an added reason why he should strive to enter into the fulness of Christ's redemption. If nature must wait for her deliverance and glorification until "the manifestation of the sons of God," how imperative is the duty of man to seek for the triumph of the Spirit of God, even in his very flesh. When men so love their kind, and the races dependent upon man, that they will cease to sin and live in constant obedience to the law of life as it operates in God, the humiliation and degradation of nature will end; and the dream of the poet will become sober fact.

"And earth's fields, with herbs and flowers,
Shall put on their choice array;
And in all their leafy bowers
Shall the woods keep holy day.

When the Judge, to earth descending,
Righteous judgment shall ordain,
Fraud and wrong shall then have ending,
Truth, immortal truth, shall reign."

I can conceive of no thought more stimulating to holiness of life than the thought that holiness realised in spirit, soul, and body makes man a distributive centre for the redemptive forces of Christ; which working through him will not only save him, but save nature with him.

I will content myself with transcribing some remarkable sentences from "Our Deathless Hope."

"Wherefore every wise man, every right-minded man, every far-seeing man, will desire to have no body of which God is not the Life and the Main-spring. Any other body will be a curse to him; and its last work will be to send a warped, fleshly, vitiated soul into the eternal world. One awakes from death, before the angels, with a cadaverous aspect, which the earthly self-life imparts to the countenance of the soul. The book of his soul's life is opened in his face. Another awakes from death, flushed with the rosy-tinted health of the immortals. He sees before him illustrations in human faces of the blessed Law, that the Health of the countenance is from God's indwelling in the soul. The influx of God's Spirit through the Health of the Divine Man, will create in you a new and incorruptible soul-body, and will cause your after-death face to glow with everlasting youth and health."

"This law of human renewal and health, which we are commending to you, is the very law by which all evil will ultimately be expelled from our planet. The energies which flow from God through His renewed sons and daughters, as their numbers increase, will purge and renew the soil, the atmosphere, and both vegetable and animal races."

"God taught, by Moses and the prophets, that neither blight nor mildew, nor pestilence in the air, nor pestiferous insects, would occur in nature, so long as His presence filled men and women, and ruled nature through them. And prophets from the beginning of history to this hour, have declared that the perfection, harmony, and joyousness of nature cannot be, until the human family becomes the dwelling-place of God. The causes which are in operation through mankind are primary causes, while those of nature are secondary; and no man would suppose otherwise if he had not lost the life of his ascendancy in God, and fallen under the powers of nature."

"As the whole case is one of Divine science, it may be put thus: God's unimpeded breathing into nature, through Divinely constituted mankind, is the law of nature's purity, perfectness, and fertility. God breathing obstructedly into nature, through the degenerate and inversive race, makes for nature's cloudiness in one place, for her dis-tempered heat in another, and for her every unbalanced and disordered condition."

"Therefore, whoever seeks to interest man and woman in the law of their personal, immortal health and joy, is at the same time pleading for new channels through which Heaven's pure vigours may flow into the world's atmosphere. The transfiguration of the natural human race into true sons and daughters of God, is precisely the hope, the grand expectation for which the whole creation groans and waits."

"O Christ, Thou art our Eternal Health, Thou hast made our humanity divine and eternal. By refraining Thy human tongue from evil, and Thy human lips from speaking guile; by turning Thyself constantly from every tempting form of evil, and suffering it not to enter Thy soul; by doing good in the Spirit of God, and by opening Thy humanity utterly to His goodness; by seeking Peace, namely, the reconciliation of all things in Thyself, and pursuing it, until all that is Divine and all that is human were one harmony:—thus hast Thou perfected our nature, and won our everlasting thanksgivings. We see ourselves glorified in Thee; and the Law of the Spirit of Thy Life in us, will glorify us with Thee."

Truly the COMFORT OF LOVE, THE COMFORT OF DIVINE LOVE, casts light, helpful and guiding light, on the Mystery of Pain.

It is clear that in this direction—the road to oneness of thought and life with God, the solution of the Problem of Suffering must be sought, and will be found.

For Pulsford, the solution of the problem of suffering was found in Christ; and a glorious solution it is.

"In the Lord Jesus, the Divine-human distress reached its height; and in Him we see that the distress is a condition of the Divine-human victory. If we regard not Christ as the solution of the problem of our earthly existence, then there is no solution. Put Him out of your reckoning, and you will fail to see that human life on earth has any end that is worthy of God, or any issue that can comfort you. If Christ be not representative of God's way and will with the race, then we must come to the horrible conclusion, that heartless forces have the victory, and tread out the hopes of our souls. But if with your whole heart and reason you can regard Christ as the representative Man,—as God's revelation concerning the race,—then you can glorify God, and put on courage in the face of suffering and death. If all our woe is summed up in Him, and all our hopes crowned in Him, then we can set all our sorrows to music, and go down into our deepest, darkest valley, with the 'everlasting' joy upon our heads."

"So Near, and Yet so Far."

FROM THE WELSH OF REV. D. ROBERTS, BY "CEMLYN."

OFFTIME, like weary pilgrim, I
My lonely path pursue;
The loved wayfarers of my youth
Infrequent are, and few.

So nigh are we! 'Tis but a step
Into your presence bright.
And yet so far! Ye dwell beyond
The ken of mortal sight.

So nigh! The obscuring veil betwixt
Is but as insect's wing.
So far! Ne'er penetrates my ear
The loudest note ye sing.

So near! The "twinkling of an eye"
May waft my soul to bliss.
So far! The way from you to me—
Vast space!—impassable is.

Yet though to you the path is closed
By which ye might descend,
There lies for me an "open way"
Whereby I may ascend.

I tarry till He comes to whom Naught "far" or "near" is;
In Him, bright host, I, too, shall rest
With you in endless bliss.

How the Minister and His Wife Kept Christmas.

BY REV. W. M. KELLEY.

"Oh verily, verily this is not God's way.
Not thus the Maker toils upon His clay;
Be it He breaks us here, yet shall He not,
Think you, make us anew some other day!"

"All is not buried in the great abyss, Brains that stored truth, and Love that found its bliss
In death of self. Oh, God Himself is not So rich to bear such shameful waste as this."

HE blinds were drawn in the home of the Rev. Edward Moore. Inside the house there was a silence that could be felt. That indescribable hush that only one presence can produce—the dark angel Death—filled each room. The few inmates moved about with quiet tread and few words. In the front room upstairs, the windows of which looked towards the west, there lay, stretched upon the bed, the form of the eldest son, the only child.

Arthur Moore had died upon his eighteenth birthday. He had been born on the 24th of June, and as his father sat with bowed head by the corpse of his son, he felt that in very truth, these two days, the day of birth and the day of death, had been the longest of his life. The rays of the setting sun came streaming into the chamber, creeping slowly from one part of the room to another, until they fell across the face of the dead son, bathing the brow with a halo of glory. As the father watched, the sunbeams began to lose their strength and beauty. The broad bands of golden dust grew narrower until the western hills cut them off, and the grey shadows clothed the dead.

Instinctively the father's thoughts followed the analogy. His mind went back across the bridge of eighteen years. He lived again the day of birth. All through the hours of that 24th of June he had paced his study. From early morn until late at night he had not broken his fast. The whole of the day passed in anxious thought and earnest petition. But just as the parting sun had shot forth its last rays, the cry, for which he had been listening hour after hour, rang through the house, and Edward Moore thanked God that his son was born and his wife safe.

Arthur Moore had brought nothing but gladness and peace into the home. His nature was sunny and obedient. As a child his good temper was remarked by strangers. At school he never quarrelled, because it takes two to fall out. Without being weak, he possessed the grace of self-control, and the words of Holy Writ were eminently true of him, he "increased in wisdom and stature and in favour with God and man."

He was a born student. He took to his books as naturally as ducks take to water, or as most boys take to mischief. Before he could walk he could talk. By quiet unconscious stages he learnt his alphabet and began to read his childish books.

His father recalled that afternoon, (he had not been more than eight years of age), when he came in from school, and with a proud look upon his face, had put a two-shilling-piece down upon the tea-table.

"Well!" said his mother, "some poor body is weeping for the loss of that coin."

"Nay," replied Arthur, "I have won it."

"Won it!" echoed his mother, "how?"

"The master has given it to me before all the school because I was the only boy who recited Gray's 'Elegy' all through without a mistake."

And so a hole had been drilled through the coin, and a silken cord passed through it, and Arthur had worn it ever since. It had been his fancy never to part with the first money he had won. His father moved the sheet aside with his hand; the piece of money lay upon a breast as cold as itself.

There had never been but one profession for Arthur Moore. As a child he had gathered other children together to play at "chapel." It mattered not who formed the audience, or who took the part of organist, Arthur was always the preacher. Sometimes his father had suggested other ideals. He should learn to be an artist! he should become a business man! he should go for a soldier! And though the red coat and the band of music appealed with power to his imagination, he never faltered. "When I'm a man I shall go to college and learn to preach."

He had never swerved from that position. And it did appear, from all human standpoints, that he was one set apart by nature and grace to fill that high office. In view of his college career, his parents had practised a strict self-denial. It had been his mother's suggestion. A sum of £5 5s. a year for eighteen years was allotted to Arthur by connexional rule. When Mrs. Moore received the first quarterly instalment she had opened a banking account, and had put this money away with but one purpose—it was to pay for Arthur's education. With unfailing consistency the bank-book showed how four times a year an entry had been made. There had been many temptations to use it. Once when Mr. Moore had had a long spell of illness and it was needful that he should have luxuries that were outside the ability of their limited income to purchase, the wife had taken down the book with the intention of withdrawing £5. But as she put on her bonnet to go to the bank her conscience smote her. The last sermon she had heard her husband preach came with force to her mind. It had been upon the "Sin of Achan." She turned to the Bible in hope of some word that should be a guide. Of its own accord the Book fell open at the story of Achan's trespass. This decided her. From that day there was never one moment in which she desired to touch that money. It was sacred. It belonged to the Lord. It was put away for the purpose of qualifying her son to serve his Master more efficiently. The book showed an absolute blank on the withdrawal side. A sum of more than £100 was awaiting its sacred mission.

And now this money would never be needed. The one for whom all this sacrifice had been made during these eighteen years would never benefit by it. He had been called to the higher service of heaven.

To say that the light of the home was quenched, that the music of life had ceased for these parents, is to put the facts in their mildest form. Next door to the minister's home dwelt a large family, eight boys and girls with both parents, all full of vigorous health. Death had never stepped across their threshold. His bony arm had never been thrust into their family circle; it remained unbroken. Surely one might have been taken from their fireside with less pain, with less loss. But Arthur had been their one "ewe lamb." Both mother and father had allowed the deep stream of their love to flow out towards him until he was the central object of their life. His very goodness and ability had invited this. When they saw other parents bowed down beneath the load of family anxiety, they had unconsciously straightened their backs and said with pride, "Our Arthur has never caused a tear to flow or a grey hair to appear." And now they were broken, humbled to the dust. As they walked side by side behind that coffin they feared to look into each other's eyes.

Six months had passed since the death of Arthur Moore. The long days had given place to the long nights. The hot sunshine of June was replaced by the cold winds of December.

The minister carried about with him the signs of his visitation. There were patches of white in his hair that rivalled the snow in purity. Deep lines were furrowed across his brow, and his eyes had the look of a man who has seen the worst that life can show.

The discipline of sorrow had not been without its compensations. It had added a new note to his ministry; that note without which the most able ministry is unfruitful—the note of sympathy. Men who were in trouble turned to Edward Moore as naturally as the flower turns towards the sun. Women who were bereaved of their loved ones were strangely comforted by the words he spoke and the prayers he offered over their dead. One man, at least, had been saved from blank atheism by the minister's steady faith and unfailing sympathy.

It was John Howard whose life had been redeemed from this destruction. John had been married one year. It had been a twelvemonths of deep, pure joy. Their home-life had realised all the ideals exalted during the enthusiasm of court-ing-days. But one year from the day of his wedding two coffins—a large one and a small one—had been carried out of John Howard's home, and he hardened his heart against God. When all the visitors had left and had gone their ways, the minister tarried. By that empty fireside he and the husband sat side by side. Far into the night he talked and prayed with the stricken man. He opened to him the secret place of his own life, and showed him the mark of the nails. He picked up the golden threads of submission and trust until they were woven again into the fabric of John Howard's life.

But the great change that Arthur Moore's death had made in his father's life came out in the pulpit. His sermons appeared to be upon a higher level than formerly. They were bathed with a pathos that was new to his ministry. It was no uncommon thing to see large numbers of his congregation in tears while he preached. And though tears are not always the sign of permanent impressions, they served, in many cases, to melt the hard crust that had formed about the life, and to leave it more open to the highest influences.

A series of sermons that Mr. Moore preached upon "Paul's thorn in the flesh," was talked about for years within the circle of his congregation. As old Henry Cooper had put it to a number of the leaders:

"No man could have preached them who had snatched out the thorn with impatience. They were the sermons of a man who had learnt to walk about with the thorn sticking in."

All through these months the £100 had remained untouched in the bank. By mutual agreement the topic had never been named by the minister and his wife. The book had never been lifted from its resting-place in the drawer.

It was three days before Christmas, which fell this year upon Sunday. A hard frost had laid its iron grip upon the earth. "Real Christmas weather!" said the well-fed and well-clothed as the warm blood went circulating through their veins. Others, less fortunate, shivered and sighed for the south wind.

Mr. Moore had gone to his study that Friday morning, and had just settled down to his Christmas sermon, when his wife knocked at the door and came in. Her face was calm, but her hand trembled as she stood by her husband, and leaning upon his shoulder said, "Forgive my interruption, but it has been upon my mind for long that we ought to do something with Arthur's money. This is our first Christmas without him, and I should feel he was nearer to us if we unlocked his money."

"And I too have wanted to mention it but have feared to do so," replied Mr. Moore.

"We must spend it as I think he would like it spent," said the mother. "You know how fond he was of children," she continued. "Now that we have no child my mind goes out towards those children who have no parents. I should like us to send part to our own Orphanage with a request that all the children are provided with additional warm comforters and gloves. And what is left over shall be spent on a special treat for Christmas Day. I fancy that my boy will feel warmer in his grave when he knows that his money is bringing gladness and comfort to these orphan children."

"Yes," said the minister, "we must give £25 to this object. I will make out a cheque, and you shall write the note."

"Then," he went on, "you remember how deep was his interest in our African Missions, and how he was stirred by the speeches of our returned missionaries. One day he said to me, 'Father, when I am in the ministry I shall go out to Fernando Po.' I have always thought," added the minister, "that the influence of those missionary meetings at M—— Lane had most to do with his decision for Christ. Let us give £25 to our African Missions, and gladden the hearts both of our Secretary and our boy. For I feel sure he will know what we are doing this morning."

"There is still £50 left," said the mother, "and I should like it all put into circulation this Christmas. It may be fancy, but I have felt that this gold was a dead-weight upon our boy's happiness in that other world. I want it spent so that it may add to his peace."

There were many schemes discussed in that study between the minister and his wife. They competed with each other in charitable thoughts and generous purposes. The Spirit of the Season presided over their deliberations, and lent its gracious influence to their plans. In the end the minister drew out a list of twenty-five of the most needy families he knew. And while he wrote out cheques which would entitle each to a couple of sovereigns, his wife addressed a little note that was beyond the value of gold.

That afternoon's work will stand out for ever in the memory of the minister and his wife. At an early hour they started with their Christmas gifts, and made twenty-five visits. In the great majority of cases the call was most providential. It was simply wonderful how they had been led in making the selection. In many homes their visit was regarded as a direct interposition from heaven. Men who had been thrown out of work by the frost, widows who had been looking to the festive season with dread, children who had been told, "NOT to hang up their stocking this year." All these, and many others, were cheered and helped by Arthur's money.

As the two sat round the fire that night, talking over the events of the day, though they were £100 poorer than they had been in the morning, never before had they felt so rich. The words of an old proverb came instinctively to the minister's mind, "What I spend I exchange; what I save I lose; what I give I have."

Many new channels had been opened in their lives that day, and along these avenues there came sweeping that true wealth that outrivals all material possessions.

The minister's sermon on the following Sunday was considered by all who listened to it to be the most powerful Christmas sermon they had heard. And yet some of the older officials had trembled when they heard the text. They feared that Mr. Moore had overlooked the season, for he went past the narrative of the Incarnation, and selected for his text the words, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

But just as all roads lead from the circumference to the centre, so in the most apt and convincing manner this text was used to illustrate God's great gift.

And so Arthur's money was put into circulation in more ways than one. The inspiration of that service caused the Christmas spirit to enter many cold natures, opening new avenues of warmth, and turning many feet into the broad pathway of charity and love.

"EVERY PANE OF THE LATTICE WINDOW A QUAIN'T PICTURE."

Bible Emblems.

IV.—THE WINTER SNOW.

"He giveth snow like wool."—PSALM cxlvii. 16.

WE get our finest description of winter in a book coming from an Eastern land. We associate the East with light and heat only, but the Bible descriptions of snow and hail could not be surpassed by travellers from "Greenland's icy mountains."

Palestine is wonderful in this—its summers are almost tropical in their heat, but its winters are nearly western in their cold. This strange combination of the tropical and temperate climates fitted Palestine to be the scene of a revelation for the world at large.

Had the land been entirely tropic, its pictures would have been unfamiliar to the dwellers in the West. Had it been entirely temperate in its climate, its words would have made less appeal to the dwellers in the Orient. In its climate and scenery it is linked both to the East and the West; and so its words are fitted to run in both directions. When it tells of the "shadow of a great rock in a weary land," it has a familiar sound to the dwellers on the tropic plains of India; when it tells of a "righteousness like the great mountains," its words are welcome to those whose homes are under the shadow of the mighty Alps; when it pictures "those who go down to the sea in ships" it comes as a familiar guest to lands girt with the silver sea; when it tells of ice, snow, hail, it seems no stranger even to those in the long winter night of Lapland.

The Bible message is intended for all lands, and therefore the land of its birth has something in its scenery and climate familiar to the North and South, the East and West. Here we may find words suitable for every season of our changing year,—for the freshness of spring, the warmth of summer, the mellow richness of autumn, the bitter cold of winter. To the Jew, the winter snow had a spiritual significance; it was an emblem, a witness to the power of God. The Jew was full of Nature-worship—full of the sense of God's being present in all the varied moods of Nature's life; he filled psalm and prophecy with descriptions of God's works. Some narrow souls would severely criticise those old Jews for describing what they think only fit for natural history books, but the Jew thought them fit for his Temple songs. He might not look at Nature scientifically, but he did religiously.

When he sang about the sky, the clouds, the mountains, and the snow, he worshipped. Turn to that fine winter piece in Job xxxvii. 6-10. God is in it all, "sealing up the hand of every man," putting an arrest upon man's toil, hushing by His snow industry, traffic, business—sealing up the hand of every man. And in all this there is a religious purpose, "that all men may know His work." The only time some men have for consideration, meditation, is when they are blocked up—snowed up. The enforced leisure of winter, when toil is suspended, the singing of birds hushed, the streams silenced, this is the only time when some men are brought face to face with God. The thunder does not speak more powerfully to some men than the silent snow. Ships are blinded by it, and the sailors know it. The traveller hides from it; it covers our roads, hides bridges, fills valleys, makes silence in our harbours under its plushy embargo—"that all men may know His work." The awe of God's presence is felt as He seals up the hand of industry by the soft white hand of the snowflake. Thus winter becomes a religious teacher, the weather takes on a moral use and value, it becomes rich in spiritual suggestion. "There is no bad weather in Nature," says the Ettrick Shepherd. Winter is not dislocation, chaos, death; it is but a new form of power and wonder and beauty. What majesty and strength there are in the deposit of this quiet, fragile agency, fluttering in the air, hesitating, indeterminate, as if not knowing where to alight, melting by a breath, yet putting out the eyes of ships, and paralysing human industry. And its beauty is as wonderful as its power. It is but the old earth, yet how novel and grand she looks in her white robes! Hamlets, fields, streets, forests,—how royally covered! Every twig is crystallised in glittering whiteness, every pane of the lattice-window a quaint picture, every grass-blade an embossed teacher, every forest

"So like a temple does it seem, that there
A pious heart's first impulse would be prayer."

Powerful, beautiful, and useful, too, are the winter storms. They purify the atmosphere, disperse the noxious vapours. Motion is the soul of universal Nature. A winter without a storm would mean a winter of stagnation and universal death. A winter storm is cleansing and protective. We should miss many of the finer traits of spiritual character if we were left without the modifying, cleansing, protective, and mellowing influences of the winter storms of adversity and trouble.

The very frost of winter is of value, it pulverises the clods, it consolidates into firm wood what the summer has produced, and the consolidations of winter are as necessary to the tree as the growths of summer. We, too, need the touch of winter to consolidate our character. The summer of prosperity is apt to relax, to enervate; the winter of adversity has tonic power. It is out of privation, difficulty, and disadvantage that the good of our race grows; our progress is gained by the stimulus of want, the compulsion of necessity.

We sometimes speak of winter as the grave of the year, but it is not so in reality. Winter is only a pause in the music of the year. It is the Selah of the Psalms, and has the same significance. During the pause the musicians are tuning their strings so that they may be prepared for the coming outburst of richer, grander music. Underground, beneath the snow, next spring and summer are secretly getting ready. In Nature there is no such thing as paralysis. All the blossoms of the coming summer are packed away beneath the blanket of the snow.

Winter is not the death-time of the year; it is only the resting-time after the exhausting labours of the summer-time. Spring will come again with all its unfolding wonders, the annual resurrection will reappear by-and-by. The winter of the human world, men say, is old age; but the old may die with a song of spring on their lips: "This corruptible shall put on incorruption." We shall rise to the summer-life of God that knows no winter-death; for

"There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers."

For all Christian hearts, the winter night of earth will end in the June morning of heaven. The river of life from under the Throne never freezes over. The foliage of life's fair tree is never frost-bitten. The festivities of earthly winter days will give way to larger re-union and brighter lights and fuller joy in the great holiday of heaven.

"Ye good distressed!
Ye noble few who here unbending stood
Beneath life's pressure! Yet bear up awhile,
And what your bounded view, which only saw
A little part, deemed evil is no more.
The storms of wintry time will quickly pass,
And one unbounded Spring encircle all."

ALFRED J. CAMPBELL.

The Tenderness of Christ.

BY THE EDITOR.

"A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench."—ISAIAH xlii. 3.

REEDS AND RUSHES OF PALESTINE.

THE fathers of the Church called Isaiah the "Evangelical Prophet," because many of his prophecies are so clear and full of comfort; especially is this the case with those which seem to relate to the character and work of Christ. Many of these read more like history than prophecy; as though they had been written after the events referred to, rather than centuries before.

I take it as a remarkable fact that, when we wish to consider some aspects of the character of Christ, we can turn to Isaiah for material, as though his prophecies were a fifth Gospel, and he himself a fifth evangelist. Nor is the wonder of this much lessened by discussions as to the occasion and immediate applicability of his predictions, or as to whether there were more Isaiahs than one. The wonder still remains that Isaiah's words should fit Christ so well that they might, as we have intimated, have been prompted by the knowledge of Christ and the course of the evangelic history.

We have a concrete and typical instance of the marvellous manner in which Isaiah's words concerning the Servant of Jehovah fit Gospel facts in the declaration, "A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench." Where else between the covers of the Bible can we find an apter text for our meditations on the tenderness of Christ? Perhaps you say: "Well, you might have found quite as good a text in Matt. xii. 17-21." True; but I would remind you that in that passage Matthew is simply quoting this identical one. He felt that he could not improve on what Isaiah had written; he could not find a truer and more condensed characterisation of the Lord Jesus than was supplied by the Evangelical prophet, so he puts in his quotation-marks, and says: "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Behold My Servant," etc. The fact is, the Evangelists do not indulge very much in generalisations and characterisations. They, the Synoptists especially, confine themselves largely to narrative and reports. They give us instances in which Christ shunned tumultuous popularity, displayed perseverance, exercised forbearance and manifested tenderness. They give the examples, and we draw the inferences, and sure am I that no more fitting or poetic expression of those inferences can be found than the words of the prophet: "He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause His voice to be heard in the street. A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench; He shall bring forth judgment in truth. He shall not fail nor be discouraged till He have set judgment in the earth, and the isles shall wait for His law."

Here and now, however, we limit ourselves to a consideration of the Tenderness of Christ. Now there are certain traits of the Divine character which, though closely related, can yet be distinguished from each other. A person without reflection might say that the Divine goodness, patience, mercy and tenderness are but different words designating one and the same quality, but further consideration will show that different aspects of the Divine character in relation to human conduct and need are signified by these words. Goodness, benevolence, is a general quality shown, not only to man, but to all creatures. "The Lord is good to all." The Divine Being is patient with those that abuse His goodness, who break His commandments. The Lord is merciful to those who are miserable and guilty; and He is tender to those who are weak and feeble, though desiring to be good and do good. As soon as we came into the world, we, in common with all other creatures, became partakers of the Divine goodness. He made "His goodness pass before us." During the course of our thoughtlessness and impiety, God's patience was exercised towards us, even as the Master of the vineyard was patient towards the barren tree. When we were made conscious of our vileness and danger, and, like the sinking disciples, cried: "Lord, save: we perish," then His mercy was extended towards us. And now, in our renewed state, our manifold imperfections and weaknesses need and receive much tenderness at the hands of our Heavenly Father. Patience is a branch of mercy; tenderness a twig of patience. Or, if you will, patience is mercy displaying itself to those who do not ask for it; while tenderness is mercy showing itself to those who have obtained the great salvation but are yet deeply conscious of their need of an every-day salvation.

Christ, then, is the tenderness of God. Who are they that are signified by the bruised reed and smoking flax, or "dimly burning wick" as the margin of the R.V. has it? We all know that there is what is called the language of flowers; so in the typology of Scripture, various trees or shrubs are the recognised symbols of different classes of men. The oaks of Bashan are the mighty wicked who impiously disregard and condemn God. The green bay tree represents the sleek and prosperous wicked. The hyssop on the wall is the type of lowliness; and the reed, bruised or shaken with the wind, or swayed to and fro by the water, is an apt symbol of those who are weak or bowed down with suffering. "What went ye out for to see?" said Christ, referring to John Baptist. "A reed shaken with the wind?" that is—a feeble, vacillating creature who had no will of his own? In 1 Kings xiv. 15, we read, "The Lord shall smite Israel as a reed is shaken in the water;" and twice over, Pharaoh is likened to a bruised reed, which, if a man lean upon it, it will go into his hand and pierce it.

The smoking flax and the bruised reed stand for the same qualities and persons. In ancient times flax was used for the wicks of lamps, just as now we use cotton. So then, just as now, when the oil was about exhausted the light would grow dim; the wick would begin to smudge and smoulder, and give forth a fetid odour enough to tempt the householder to blow it out altogether.

See, then, the wind or water-tossed reed and the dimly-burning lamp hardly emitting light enough to see it by, and then transfer your thoughts to the things signified by these objects. Are there not many of God's people who, spiritually, are bruised reeds or dimly-burning lamps. That they are so may be their fault, or it may be their misfortune. It may be their fault as it was the fault of the Corinthians that they were babes when they should have been men, and who had to be fed with milk instead of strong meat. Blind Nancy, of old West Street, Hull, who was but a dwarf in stature, used to say with great regularity: "Had I but been faithful to the grace given, I might have been a tall cedar in Lebanon instead of being a dwarf in the valley." There are many who might adopt blind Nancy's lament, and this is their fault.

But I do not know that a man can always help being a bruised reed. It is some persons' misfortune that they are such. If they had a coat of arms the bent, swaying reed might very fittingly serve as their crest. Some are constitutionally sturdy, courageous, self-reliant and enterprising; but others are in their very make the opposites of all these. They have naturally weak wills; in fact, this defect or disability almost amounts to a disease. Others are prone to doubt and misgiving all their lives, as their opposites are sanguine and buoyant. Some carry the burthen of a constant nervousness and trepidation upon them, and this burthen they carry into their religious relations, and you cannot laugh or scold it out of them either. They know their weakness as well as you do, and it may be, strive against it; but all to no purpose. "The spirit, indeed, is willing, but the flesh is weak." Do we not remember how Bunyan, in his broad-minded, large-hearted way, recognised that there were these naturally fragile reeds and dimly-burning lamps, when he placed amongst his company of pilgrims whom Greatheart led to the river—Mr. Feeblemind, Mr. Ready-to-halt, Despondency, and Much-afraid. These were all feeble as their names show, but they were good for all that and sincere, and they all crossed the river at last, victorious over doubts and fears. What Feeblemind said to Greatheart is well worth reading.

"Alas, I want a suitable companion. You are all lusty and strong, but I, as you see, am weak; I choose, therefore, rather to come behind, lest, by reason of my many infirmities, I should be both a burden to myself and to you. I am, as I said, a man of a weak and feeble mind, and shall be offended and made weak at that which others can bear. I shall like no laughing; I shall like no gay attire; I shall like no unprofitable questions. Nay, I am so weak a man as to be offended with that which others have a liberty to do. I do not know all the truth; I am a very ignorant Christian man. Sometimes, if I hear any rejoice in the Lord, it troubles me, because I cannot do so too. It is with me as it is with a weak man among the strong, as with a sick man among the healthy, or as a lamp despised; so that I know not what to do. 'He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease,' (Job xii. 5.)"

But there are other weaklings in the Church whom Christ treats with unflinching tenderness, even those who are young in the Divine life. These pass through weakness as a stage in their Christian development. They will, in God's good time, grow out of it. The sturdiest oak that grows must once have been a tender sapling. The fire that burns so brightly may once have been a feeble spark that had to be nursed and fended. Samson himself was once a toddling child that a puff of wind might have upset; and so the strongest Christian must have had his day of small and feeble things. Infantile helplessness demands and receives careful and tender handling; so Christ treats the lambs of His flock with utmost tenderness. "He shall feed His flock like a shepherd, He shall gather the lambs in His arm, and carry them in His bosom, and shall gently lead those that give suck." (Is. xl. 11.)

There are some strong souls that cannot understand or sympathise with the weakness of others. Bruised reeds and dimly-burning lamps get little toleration from them. How sarcastic they become over the "weaker brethren!" Other coarse and cruel natures look down upon weakness and deformity with a feeling akin to contempt. Others, still worse, strive to trample the man who is already down, like the senseless herd that gore the diseased or stricken deer. Not so Christ. When it is written, "A bruised reed shall He not break," etc., it is implied that He will do the exact contrary. By His tender grace He will strengthen the reed until it shall become an instrument on which to discourse sweet music. Instead of blowing out the lamp that burns so dimly, He will pour fresh oil into the vessel. Like one who seeks to kindle a fire, He will take pains and bear with it, and not be too rough, lest the feeble flicker expire altogether. Those who are at all acquainted with the Gospel narratives will not need to be told that Christ did not break bruised reeds, or quench the smoking flax, when He went about amongst the inhabitants of Judea, Galilee and Samaria. See His tenderness to children; His constant readiness to mingle with publicans and sinners—the very outcasts of society. Look with what delicacy He treated that frail reed—the woman taken in adultery. Did He not ever resist the proud, and give grace to the humble; increase strength to them that had no might; bind up the broken-hearted? Oaks of Bashan and green bay trees He said hard things of, but bruised reeds He always spoke softly to, and handled tenderly.

I ask attention to the fact that the most discerning mind is also the most tender. Sometimes, God forgive us, we, in our ignorance and presumption, look upon this or that man, and we reckon him up and take his measure. "There is nothing in him," we say. We explore the recesses of his being; we sound the gamut of his nature; we take stock of the possibilities that lie wrapped up in him, and the conclusion, forsooth, we arrive at is: "There is nothing in him!" We do this because we know no better. It is the outcome of pure ignorance, and pride and presumption, the daughters of ignorance. But Christ, who knows what is in man, is also the most hopeful of man and the most tender to man. He sees not only what man is, but what he may become. He sees the oak in the acorn.

It is the Almighty, too, who is the all-tender. Strength is too often dissociated from tenderness. They are qualities difficult to combine, and so are seldom found together. They are not incompatible, however; for together they form the ideal after which we should unceasingly strive. We have to be "perfect, even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect," and in Him, as made known by His Son, we see strength and tenderness perfectly orbled. Jehovah-Shepherd. What a striking contrast, and yet what a blessed collocation of terms!

What Christ was in the days of His flesh, the self-same is He now; for He "whose we are, and whom we serve," is not the historical Jesus of Nazareth only, but the living Christ—"the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." He still displays the same qualities of tenderness and forbearance while discharging His high-priestly functions, (Heb. iv. 15, 16; v. 2.).

Let Christ's tenderness be to us a perpetual rebuke, and spur and incentive to right-doing. Was it not enough for Him to die on Calvary to save us, but must He also from day to day bear with our slowness, our dullness, our feebleness? Let us strive to become strong in Him, and in the power of His might. His gentleness is ours to make us great.

THE OLD GATEWAY AT STEPNEY, THE BIRTHPLACE OF DR. MEAD.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

X.—THE INDEPENDENT MEETING-HOUSE, STEPNEY.

By REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

NONCONFORMITY in England is older than the disruption of the Anglican Church, which took place on the morning of Black Bartholomew, 1662, when over two thousand conscientious clergymen left their flocks because they could not, from principle, teach the obnoxious Papal doctrines of the Prayer Book. Robert Browne is regarded as the founder of the Congregationalists, who established a separate Church in England as far back as the year 1583. Sir Walter Raleigh, writing in 1592, estimated the number of Brownists at twenty thousand. During the Commonwealth period they assumed the distinctive name of Independents, because their churches were distinct from the Established Church, and also, because they were independent of all outside interference and control. The Assembly of Divines which met at Westminster in 1642, included five leading Independent ministers. Some of the brightest names in theological literature have occupied its pulpits; and from its colleges have come forth a large number of men, who, for scholarship, piety, and zeal, would confer honour upon any Church.

Some two miles east of St. Paul's Cathedral, and bordering the Thames, is the low-lying parish of Stepney. In past centuries, it was an isolated, out-of-the-way nook, situated between the marshes and the royal river; and was then known as Stebunheth. In the early Puritan times Sir Thomas Lake, Secretary of State, and Isabel, Countess of Rutland, had their country mansions in the village. According to an ancient traditional law, all children born at sea of English parentage, belonged to Stepney Parish. This old-established custom originated the following rhyme:

"He who sails on the wide sea
Is a parishioner of Stepney."

The Independent Church at Stepney dates from the year 1644, and is one of the oldest of the Metropolitan Nonconformist congregations. Happily, the earliest memoranda respecting the formation of the Stepney Church have been preserved, and give interesting information concerning the origin of this particular communion of Christian believers. The first resolution of this early Church-book relates, "That the Church being constituted by the mutual consent and agreement of Henry Burton and his wife, William Parker, John Adingsell, William Greenhill, and John Pococke, in the presence of Mr. Henry Burton, Pastor of a church in London, to walk in all the ways of Christ held out to them in the Gospel, and having the right hand of fellowship given them by the aforementioned, and owned for a true Church of Christ—there were added to them from time to time as followeth." After this preamble there follow the names of twenty-four persons who were added to this same early Independent Church during the year 1644. The Rev. Henry Burton, whose name stands first on the roll of membership, organised the Stepney Church, and in the name of Jesus Christ, gave the right-hand of fellowship to the little band of Christian disciples, who became the nucleus of this historic Church. Burton was a divine and controversialist of some note. He spent his active life in the defence of Puritan ideas, as well as in the preaching of the Gospel. The literary and saintly Richard Baxter highly complimented him when he frankly declared that he had never rightly understood the principles of Independency until he had read Burton's valuable book, entitled, "The Protestation Protested." Because Burton would not "forbear to preach in his own congregational way," he had to suffer the severance of long-established friendships with many of the leading families and divines of his day, including Prynne and Bastwick. For defending his Puritan principles, and being faithful to his religious convictions, his body was mutilated in the Star-chamber. He calmly endured many painful tortures and cruel wrongs for his sturdy Nonconformity.

The Rev. William Greenhill was the first recognised pastor of the old Stepney Meeting-house Congregation. Palmier, in his "Nonconformists' Memorial," speaks of him as a member of the Assembly of Divines, and the founder of a Society of Dissenters at Stepney. His name stands fifth in the original roll of private members, who formed the nucleus of the Stepney Nonconformist Church. It was the common custom of those days that the pastor-elect of a Nonconformist congregation should first join the membership of the Church, and then be called therefrom to fulfil the higher duties of its pastorate. In common with the celebrated preachers of the Stuart period, he availed himself of the larger structures of the Anglican Church, in which he addressed the over-flowing congregations which flocked to his ministry. On Sabbath afternoons he regularly preached in Stepney Parish Church, and was known as "The Evening Star." He was the author of an elaborate work on "The Prophecies of Ezekiel." During the dispersion of the Royal family, he was entrusted with the care of the young princes and princesses. After living a useful and devoted life he died in September, 1671.

Matthew Mead was the honoured successor of William Greenhill. In the year 1656, and while lecturer at Stepney Parish Church, he became a member of the Stepney Nonconformist congregation. For twelve years before he became the assistant of Greenhill he enjoyed the "sweet counsel" and Christian privileges of those who rejoiced in the fulness of Gospel blessing. Cromwell appointed Mead to the curacy of Shadwell, from which he was ejected at Black Bartholomew, in the memorable year of 1662. His pulpit outspokenness stirred up the enemies of the Gospel, and he endured persecution as "seeing Him who is invisible." Several times he had to find a home on the Continent until the storm of oppression had passed away. Upon the accession of William, Prince of Orange, to the English throne, Matthew Mead preached a thanksgiving sermon, in which he, like the greatest of the Apostles, dwelt upon his own "deliverance from perils," during "his nine years' incessant vexations, by suits, by fines, by illegal house-breaking, by plundering and spoil, by imprisonments, by prosecution for life, and by wandering in a strange land." Mead was the author of a number of valuable theological works, including "A Sermon on Ezekiel's Wheels;" "The Young Man's Remembrancer;" "The Good of Early Obedience;" and several others bearing the somewhat fantastical titles of the Puritan period. His best-known and most widely-read book is entitled, "The Almost Christian, or, The False Professor Tried, and Cast." Some of his valuable manuscripts, which for long years had been lost to the Christian public, have been recently found and printed.

It was during the ministry of Mead, and in the year 1674, that the large meeting-house at Stepney was erected, in what was then a sequestered suburb of the growing city of London. The building was bald in its appearance, and lacked all ornamental pretension. In design it was "four-square," and was fitted with heavy galleries. The four massive internal pillars of pitch-pine which supported the four corners of the roof were presented to Mead and his congregation by the States of Holland as a tribute of their respect for the services he rendered during his exile in the Lowlands of the Continent. The Rev. Richard Winter Hamilton, in his bi-centenary sermon commemorative of the founding of the Stepney Church, and which was preached in this venerable meeting-house, referred to the honoured associations of these substantial pillars. He said: "They rise as memorable columns on which imagination may hang shield and write inscription. They are your doubled Jachin and Boaz. They have for a century and a half been the objects of something like a legendary curiosity. The thought of the immortals, who, during that period, have gazed upon them, and congregated around them, impress an interest upon them which may be excused in us, who confess that antiquities of temple, and donatives of senate, are not our proper boast." The roof of the meeting-house was constructed of secret chambers which were reached by ladders, and made accessible by trap-doors. These mysterious recesses were the hiding-places of the faithful, and where the persecuted members of the Church met for secluded devotion, when their footsteps were shadowed by the treacherous informer. the privileges of a Bill of Rights, the Stepney Independent Church continued its course amid many opposing forces. It was most fortunate in its pastorate, and it was served with several learned and devoted ministers of Christ. In the year 1674 Mead established the Stepney May-day Lecture to young men, which was intended to counteract the pernicious pastimes and profligacy associated with the May-pole festivities. For over two centuries this annual lectureship has been continued, and in its earlier history it was productive of lasting good.

After a prolonged and painful illness, Matthew Mead died in October, 1699, while seated in his chair. One of his latest utterances was, "I am going home as every honest man ought to do, when his work is done." His funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. John Howe, at Stepney Meeting-house; in this he says: "He was long in preparing and forming to be what he was when you lost him. His station among you in this neighbourhood when first he undertook the pastoral charge of this Church, over which the Holy Ghost made him overseer, required a man of as much wisdom and grace as any such station could well be supposed to do, considering how numerous, how intelligent, and well-instructed a people he was to take the care of. His excellent good natural parts, his ingenuous education, his industry, his early labours in preaching the Gospel of Christ in his native county, in the city, and in this place; above all, the gracious assistances he had from heaven; gave him great advantages to be a minister of Christ; approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

Matthew Mead lived in the apartments above the ancient brick gateway at Stepney, which formerly belonged to the mansion of the first Marquis of Worcester. In this singular and humble homestead, his son Richard, who became the eminent physician and antiquary, was born on August 11th, 1673. Richard Mead commenced his medical studies at Utrecht, under the guidance of Graevius, after which he removed to Leyden. From that celebrated school of physic he removed to Italy, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. In the year 1696, he returned to London, and commenced the practice of physic in the house in which he was born. For nearly half-a-century, Mead was at the head of his profession. His home was a miniature museum; for he acquired one of the most valuable collections of books, manuscripts, antiques, curios, and paintings, that ever belonged to a private individual. Dr. Mead became physician to George II., and he was privileged to attend Pope, Sir Isaac Newton, and Bishop Burnet in their last sicknesses. His professional duties produced about £6,000 per year. He was generous and charitable in his gifts. When the celebrated Dr. Friend, who was an acquaintance of Bishop Atterbury, the noted divine, was imprisoned in the Tower in the year 1723, Dr. Mead kindly undertook the responsibility of his practice, and upon his release by Sir Robert Walpole, Mead magnanimously presented the released Jacobite with the professional fees, which amounted to the handsome sum of five thousand guineas. It is said that Mead was the first physician to encourage inoculation as a preventive of that terrible scourge—small-pox. Having gained the consent of George I., he practised the Oriental system on six condemned criminals. He was elected a member of the Royal and other learned societies, and wrote several valuable medical treatises. Unfortunately, Dr. Mead was provoked to fight a duel with Dr. Woodward. Mead obtained the advantage over his adversary, and demanded Woodward to beg for his life. Woodward accordingly gave up the contest by handing his sword to his opponent. In the year 1691, Dr. Richard Mead was admitted a member of his father's Church at Stepney. This unhappy quarrel caused his severance therefrom, and opposite his name in the roll of membership is written the significant word—"Deserted." Dr. Mead died in the year 1754, and was buried in the Temple Church.

In January, 1700, the Rev. Mr. Galpine, son of John Galpine, the ejected minister of Ashpriors, Somersetshire, and the author of the Biography of Flavel, succeeded Mead in the pastorate. Three years later, the Rev. Thomas Bradbury, better known as "Bold Tom Bradbury," was appointed Galpine's assistant, and for four years he ministered to the Stepney Meeting-house congregation. His pulpit utterances were characterised by their wealth of wit and genial humour. His eleven volumes on "The Great Mystery of Godliness," and his "Christus in Cælo," show that his sermons "were not consecrated to flatter a corrupt court and triumphant cause, and did not at all mar the ample knowledge and sound and lofty views of evangelical truth, and copious acquaintance with Scripture, by which he delighted his hearers. Even his celebrated sermon on "The Ass and the Serpent," contains little that the fastidious of our day could condemn. He hated the Stuarts, and in his sermons he maintained with equal indignation and humour, the right of a people to resist tyrants.

Numerous are the stories that are told of Bradbury's eccentric ministry. During the prolonged controversy on Arianism, Bradbury had been contending at a largely attended meeting of the London ministers held at Salter's Hall, that those divines who really believed the orthodox doctrine of the divinity of Christ should openly acknowledge it. He concluded his contention by giving them the following practical test: "Those who are not ashamed to own the Deity of Christ follow me into the gallery." He had scarcely ascended two or three steps before the opposite party commenced hissing him and his followers. He suddenly turned round, and in forceful language, said: "I have been pleading for Him who bruised the serpent's head; no wonder then that the seed of the serpent should hiss!"

Bradbury was one of the forbears of the Rev. Richard Winter Hamilton, LL.D., D.D., the distinguished minister of Belgrave Chapel, Leeds, who has been described by Paxton Hood as "a great man, a great scholar, a great essayist, a great preacher, and a great wit and humorist." Ada Ellen Bayly, who is more widely known by her familiar pen-name, "Edna Lyall," and who is one of the popular women writers of to-day, is descended on her mother's side from Thomas Bradbury.

For seven years the Rev. Thomas Mitchell, who was a worthy divine, held the pastorate until his death in 1720. He was followed by the Rev. John Hubbard, who is best remembered by his Friday morning Divinity Lectures. He was elected Theological Tutor to the Academy which was located in Plasterer's Hall. The Rev. Samuel Brewer, who was greatly beloved by his people, had the charge of the Church for the protracted term of half-a-century. He entered upon his important duties when the congregation was waning, and the Church decreasing in numbers. By his earnest pulpit manner, his unctuous style of delivery, and the pointed appeals of his gospel addresses, he was successful in restoring the Church to its former spiritual vigour. As a preacher he was a connecting link between the old, stilted, scholastic style of the eighteenth century type of divine, and the impassioned oratory of the Whitefield style of preacher. He belonged to the new order of city divines, and was gladly welcomed to the leading Nonconformist pulpits of the Metropolis. For fifty years he preached the annual sermon to the young. After living a blameless and useful life, he peacefully passed away in 1796. He was succeeded by his assistant, the Rev. George Ford, who held the pastorate for twenty-five years. He was educated at Lady Huntingdon's College at Trevecca. Although he was a man of slender abilities, yet by his close application to mental culture, and the concentration of his powers to the welfare of his Church, he gained the respect of his people, and was eminently useful to the end of his days.

Dr. Joseph Fletcher was the best-known minister associated with the old Stepney Meeting-house during the present century. He was a man of fine presence, had a melodious voice, and was highly cultured. He was regarded as one of the front-rank preachers of his generation. The late Dr. Reynolds, Principal of Cheshunt College, in describing the preaching abilities of Dr. Fletcher, says: "Uttered by his lips, the words of some familiar text or hymn throbbed with a strange potency; and that blending of calm self-possession with intense feeling commanded attention and grappled with conscience. There were no awkward mannerisms, no unique peculiarities, no bursts of rhetorical splendour to arrest attention; there were neither sensational effects nor dramatic personation; but his views of the Gospel were all matured by a long personal experience, and by diligent research, while his power of expression was almost perfect. He aimed at producing religious results, and gave the impression that he was an ambassador for Christ, commissioned to proclaim the amnesty of Heaven, charged with a message which it was perilous to trifle with and most blessed to accept."

About the middle of the present century, a very fine and modern ecclesiastical building took the place of the old meeting-house at Stepney. The large and influential congregation had the advantage of enjoying for many years the enlightened and intensely spiritual ministry of Dr. John Kennedy, who, at the age of eighty-six years, still survives to enjoy the honourable distinction of being the "grand old man of Congregationalism."

The Star of Dawn.

"I will give him the morning star."—Rev. ii. 28.

PROMISE gleaming with poetic suggestiveness! "I will give him"—the flashing crystal of the dawn! mirror of God! I will crown the victor with the laurel, I will weave for him a diadem in light, I will stud his sky with glittering points of flame, I will embosom him in glory fringed with fire. The desire to dandle a star is the pretty conceit of childhood. And in a thousand walks of life the impossible allures the fancy. Distance throws the glamour of romance over the object of desire, and induces an irrepressible longing, a longing which is creative of triumphant enthusiasm.

The star is in the gift of God. Then the seemingly impossible is probable. The ideal becomes, in suggestion and possibility, the actual.

The ideal is to be discovered, if at all, along the lines of the actual. The romantic and the real are not to be understood as separate entities. The glittering star and the dull earth-clod are one. The essential unity of all things is admitted. The universe is the fruitage of a single thought.

We are in error if we seek the romantic in the fantastic. God's commonplaces are full of sublimest idealism. And life is full of poetry. It is God's great concern to fill our brief day with beauty; to crowd it with panoramic visions of ethereal splendours e'en though seen only through the film of tears; to turn our experiences, as by alchemic subtleties, into the gold of spiritual emotion.

All the gifts of God are unique—rich in promise, glorious in possibility. God cannot be accused of conspiring to belittle man. He would ennoble him. His gifts assume man's dignity, and are worthy the majesty of the Giver. The gift of God is—and the imagination can fill up the intervening spaces with every image it can command subtly suggestive of beauty, sweetness, tenderness, and power. Christ is the embodied smile of God, the genius of the dawn, herald of the day, surety of eternity. He is the Star which was foretold (Num. xxiv. 17) should arise out of Jacob; the day-star which is to arise in our hearts (2 Pet. i. 19); the bright and morning star (Rev. xxii. 16.)! The gift of God is light—love—life—eternal life;—always something sublime, extraordinary, pre-eminently essential.

"I will give him the morning star." Then the monotony of shadow is to be relieved. The morning star is beneficent—prophetic, heraldic! It delivers its light into every reflective heart—it pierces all clouds and shines through all the vapours which enshroud the soul.

The nadir demands the zenith. The morning star requires the dawn: it compels the day-break. Its merry twinkle laughs the darkness out of countenance—the shadows retire shamed by its aggressive luminosity. It announces the day; it heralds the sun; it betokens the dazzling splendours of the meridian. All unholy things creep and fly in the darkness; atheism is born in shameless gloom. Only transparency can live in the light.

The gift of dawn brings serenity, a quiet and holy joy.

THE LIGHT BLOTS OUT THE SHADOW: the night dissolves in day. But even the darkness is helpful. In the Divine intention it is purposeful. It whispers rest, it closes the protracted engagement, and suggests retirement. It rests the eye, it provides the opportunity for much-needed slumber. It is the Divine anæsthetic. And having accomplished her subtle ministry night is content to be dispossessed. So the light chases the shadows into deeper seclusion. And we can never know how dark the darkness really is until the light dawns.

* Sermon preached before the Mayor and Corporation of Burslem, Nov 12.

Education is illumination. Until the light of knowledge has shone upon the mind we can never really know how ignorant we have been, and how absurdly foolish we may have often appeared. Every advance in knowledge is an attempt to redeem the waste and darkened places of the mind, an acquisition of mental territory, an extension of the frontier of the soul.

Sin is deprivation, a conscious surrender of the soul's high places to the hurtful phantom of the night, a criminal loss of life's noblest possessions, the wilful obliteration of the clear shimmering lights which gem the soul. To think evil is to wrong your own soul, to commit an act of folly is to create an enveloping shadow. Sin is the fatal-absurdity, the maddest blunder, a hideous nightmare.

To know the truth and—do it, this is salvation, deliverance from the haunting spectres of the night, escape from the thralldom of wicked and alluring fancies, freedom from the imprisoning gloom of sin—entrance into the light!

Push back the creeping shadows! Let the day dawn in your soul!

Christ has vested interests in the dawn. He is solicitous for the returning day of eternal splendour. And in heaven there shall be no night! Were men wise it would be daybreak everywhere. The investing shadows—the creation of our own indescribable folly and sin, and from which arise the depressions and despairs which yield their awful tragedies—would die in dawn. If the multitudes were but as solicitous for their own welfare as God is to brighten and beautify their lives, the moral darkness of the world would pass away as a forgotten shadow.

Light is not illumination merely; it is beauty. It clothes the barrenness of life, peoples its emptiness, and fills the whole horizon with vernal splendours. The wastes are redeemed and clothed with verdure, and the solitudes are broken into eloquent song. The light paints the lily, it bedecks the sky with unimagined glories, it invests the earth with tender pulsing beauties. The darkness is averse to beauty; it blots it out.

The light is suggestive of consummate beauty: it points to the hour of full fruition. It is the incoming of a day which perpetuates itself in grandeur. Time is a term of curious meaning. It is a fragment—an accommodation to our ignorance. There are no days; there is but one day—it is always day with God. Our times, literally, our days, are in His hand—broken taibles. These broken fragments of transparency too often distort our view of things upon which we look. But we hug and cherish them, and would fain keep them—to work them up into one grand mosaic. They are, however, scarcely given than they are taken. They are poor symbols of the ever-present and abiding day of God. The Christ, the morning star, is the herald of that day. That day may dawn in the midst of the days. Then should we know that our day was night—the shadow cast by God—a shadow blotted out in the greater luminance. May the day-star arise in your hearts! For the dawn involves the day, as the spring demands the summer. It is pledge and token of all that is tender, exquisite, holy. Permit the dawn, you have the day. Predicate the most elemental truth; astro-nomic, geologic, and you adopt of necessity the whole cosmic order. You believe that twice two make four—not because you can prove it, for that is impossible, but because it accords with your moral intuitions; granted, then, that twice two make four, what is the next proposition? God—by an inevitable sequence.

Given conscience—and individual life would rise in moral stateliness, and the hours blend in one peaceful song, social injustices would die and all economic relations would harmonise; commercial "honour" would be no travesty of morality, for men would cease to violate the most elementary laws of common life, and international disputes would be readily settled without even the remote possibility of resort to the arbitrament of the sword. Let the first principles of Faith be admitted, and, in dawn of prophetic splendour, you have the millennium. Light, therefore, stands for poetry, music, beauty, ideality. It is rich in its suggestiveness; it means the evolution of the true, the beautiful, and the good.

And Christianity encompasses and involves the whole in its radiant and tender ministry. It palpitates with light, it flashes into beauty, it breaks into iridescent splendours, it kindles rapture, it radiates peace. All shadows die in its broad-glancing light; no alien sympathy can live in the cycle of its divine emotion.

With the dawn of the higher consciousness comes heaven, God. To live in the full light of Christian revelation, beatific splendour, is the soul's high festival. To know God, in any sense which is adequate to the meaning of the terms, is to enter into life—the dateless age of bliss. Bliss has no time-accent. The festive day is a perpetual meridian. Beatitude knows no hour-syllable: it hears no melancholy click of time which suggests a terminable joy. It is the delight of heaven that joy can have no end; it is raised above all such fearful possibility. Night is marked by dreary syllables. Grief counts the hours—numbers the painful moments—sighs for the day of peace. To have Christ, the Star of dawn, is to have the whole heaven of beatitude; to receive the spirit of illumination is to enter into the peace of moral sanity, for every element in life will be seen to have assumed its right relation and true perspective; to hold the genius of the morning is to have the gift by which we may light the shadows, beautify the commonplace, turn vague hope into startling prophecy, make the solitudes break forth into song, the desert bloom as the paradise of God.

THE PROMISE IS A CALL TO FAITH. "I will give him the morning star." The day will dawn in fullest splendour: it will unfold itself in light and beauty. It will dip its pencil in the sun and paint its glories on crested hill, in peaceful valley, on silver sea, and in azure sky. The day must dawn; for He that sitteth on the sapphire throne is Lord of light and shadow. But it is not yet. Mortality shall be swallowed up of life—but not yet. Meantime, I give you the token—the star in the sky, the bow in the cloud, the deathless angel seated in the silent and empty tomb. Be patient! Have faith in God!

He will pluck the brightest star from the heaven of His glory that it may flash its light into your darkness. The star is the flashing jewel of the night. It is only to be found in the abyss of gloom. It is not discernible in the light of day: it is there, but it has served its purpose and is swallowed up of light, or has grown into day. But for the darkness, then, we should have no visible star, the whole of its tender, light-quivering ministry would be unknown. And more, the day would lose its romance, life its poetry, were there no night with its kindling hope and awakening expectancy. If there were no night, there could be no faith. No night, no God. There is a sense in which the light is delirium, the night a return to sanity. While it is true that the darkness is the devil's opportunity, it is nevertheless true that the night is the best corrective of the baseless fancies and the vicious follies of the day. The nervous fears and the solemn grandeur of the night exercise a not unimportant influence if they make us pause and reflect amid the whirling frivolities of life. To awe us into sensibility, reverent wonder, is to have brought us at least to the borderland of Faith.

Into the sorrow-cloud of life is thrust a glittering star. In the night of disquietude and tumultuous grief, the something visible appears. It is ever something which radiates its brightness and dissolves the gloom—a palpitating smile from an angel face. It bids you dry those tears—for the dawn appears! Your life had been passing through its eclipse, all things bright and joyous were hidden, your very way in life obliterated—but God appeared, and instantly the darkness shamed, hid itself.

Illumination is identification. The light finds you out. It calls you forth from the obscurity of darkness. It restores your individuality. It rays you out in significance and splendour. It gives you centrality, influence, power, and affixes towards you the true relations of things. It provides for the evolution of the possibilities of every form of life. And this is exactly the higher mission of Jesus. He calls men into being, distincttiveness. He surprises them into a new, because higher, consciousness. He rehabilitates their manhood. "He came to seek and to save the lost,"—the lost to name and place and circumstance and power. He illuminates their night, and rays out in splendour the finer elements of their nature. He ennobles all instincts, and unfolds the life in all its higher meanings. He completes the cycle of desire, aspiration and hope. That actual visibility becomes a radiant personality. The pulsing star becomes the central sun of our life-system—the illuminating and guiding presence. He calls the mind "above"—"up" to the higher illumination, "off" from all things low or earth-born, "away" from all things beneath our inherent dignity—up to the "above" of us, to that which completes and consummates. He charms our thought to higher levels, to wider ranges; from self-consciousness to God-consciousness, from that which circumscribes to that which liberates, and leads us forth into fields of research exhaustless in plenitude, majestic in grandeur. Of two propositions on any given subject the mind instinctively chooses that which is higher in its moral significance, and finds in that its inspiration and delight.

The dawn signifies opportunity. It is a call to wakefulness—activity. Awake, thou that sleepest, and Christ shall give thee light! Thou wilt sleep thyself into weakness—mental imbecility, moral inanity. It is time to bestir thyself. Awake! the night is past, the day dawns! Lift up thine eyes to the awakening heavens—and see! The eye of morn darts its silver beams athwart the darkness, and throws its glistening halo over the Eastern sky. All things are wakeful, busy, wilt thou alone, the divinely privileged, slumber? Hast turned night into day in thy revelry, and wilt turn day into night in thy delirium? Ignoble perversions of sacred purposes! "I will give him the morning star." He must rise early to receive the Divine bequest. It will not wait his coming. At noon it will be lost in greater glory, and, having missed the prophetic promise, he will be lost in gloom. The dawn calls you out of your own perverse hiddenness into moral significance and power. It calls you to a completer faith, to a more gracious acknowledgement of the Divine purpose in your life, and to a more implicit confidence in God. Faith is security and power. Hesitance is weakness. He pledges you a star; the star will be a sun, the dawn the zenith; dost thou not believe it? Rise to the height and sublimity of moral manhood. Follow out thy glorious destiny. Act to purpose. Make thy humanity divine.

Fear? Know no fear! In the strength of the dawn follow out thine exalted ministry. Thou art called to heroism—triumphant enthusiasm. The service of God is the service of Truth—the practice and advocacy of Truth. Truth, not equivocation! Truth, not expediency! "Expediency is the anarchy of morals." Truth in the home, the nursery, the kitchen, the reception-room, the drawing-room. Truth in the street, the alleys, and the public squares. Truth in the city, the Legislature, the Councils, the Tribunals, the Committee-rooms. Drag up every sneaking falsehood into the common light of Truth. Expose every prejudice, all vain and self-seeking desires. Tolerate no injustice.

"Swoop

Down upon all things base, and dash them dead—
A knight of Arthur—working out his will,
To cleanse the world."

Draw your enthusiasm for all noble purposes from Christ. Cultivate the noblest ambitions. Do the holiest work. Attempt the impossible. "Hitch your wagon to a star"—the morning star. Link your purpose to His Omnipotence, and He will complete and consummate your most exalted hopes.

THE STAR IS THE SUBLIME ANSWER TO HUMAN NECESSITY. "I will give him the morning star." The world had waited in an agony of expectancy the coming of One long foretold, who should redeem His people. At last He came, a Babe. A new star glared in the Eastern sky: the Star of Bethlehem. "We have seen His star," was the startled cry of the Magians, and it led them on to God. Whose star? His, whose name shall be Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins. All human needs sum themselves up in that one great, awful, despairful word, Sin. And there is but one word that we can oppose to that term which is synonymous with all that the imagination can conceive of the mysteries of iniquity—and that word is God. Man can do nothing with sin. He cannot alchemise it, he cannot wash it out, he cannot burn it out. God only is competent to deal with sin. Can God effectually deal with sin? Yes; He can dissolve it in light. Hence, in response to the anguished cry of man's despair, God says: "I will give him the morning star," I will blot sin out in sunshine. "I will give,"—a Son, My Son, the Son, the only begotten Son. You will kill Him for His pains, you will endeavour to thwart His purpose, you will not tolerate that radiant gleam of purity amongst you. He shall be hounded to the death, but His blood—His whole vicarious offering of Himself—shall be to you the symbol and token of Life.

The star points to the Cross therefore. It grimly suggests tragedy. It means Redemption. There is liberation in light—freedom from the investing shadows. The star of the dawn signifies hope. It tells of renewed lease of life, and points the way of escape from all enslaving passions. We can never quite know what evils and dangers the darkness conceals. A thousand lurking snares beset our feet; hideous phantoms flit about us; the very air seems charged with noisome pestilence; but with the dawn comes deliverance; the pearly gates of morn open upon our eager and agonised vision. We are bidden to enter the kingdom of light—the Kingdom of God. A sense of enlargement possesses us—all fetters broken, thralldom past. Light everywhere—pulsing light, animated brightness. The palpitating spaces seem filled with airy presences 'witched with beauty. Some new and ravishing wonder waits upon our every step. With every motion we stumble upon an unfamiliar seraph. Life is one long day of pure enjoyment—serenity, peace. In this new light all things and all experiences change their aspect; a new lustre lights the weird and sombre hours, the painful monotony is broken into silver sounds of sublimest song, a subtle grandeur rests upon the peaceful valley, a calm upon the up-reaching hills, the higher significance of all things outshines in mystic glory, hope moves steadily onward to fulfilment, sorrow radiates a chastened peace, and the grave itself is transfigured, made redolent of love and beauty. The difference between men is ever a difference of outlook—vision. Some see clearer than others can. In the kingdom of light the range of vision is extended, the horizon enlarged glows with changing tints, everywhere is space, openness, light kindled into beauty. In this light men see more—further, deeper, clearer; everything upon which the clarified vision rests is charged with divinest purpose, and gleams with new significance. All urgent necessities answered, all aspirations fulfilled, life breaks into colours fresh and fair.

Bethlehem is the prelude to Calvary. The morning star sheds its shivered light upon a Cross. The Cross grows in ruby splendour until its light fills the horizon of the world. It is the Divine dying into life. The way of life henceforth is the way of the Cross. Through Calvary to serenity. Through the darkness of personal sacrifice into the Light of Life. And the Kingdom of Eternal Light is the Kingdom of the Victorious. All shadows lighted, all griefs assuaged, all tears dried, all battles won, girdled in glory, jewelled with light. May we enter into the joy of such beatific consummation!

J. W. CHAPPELL.

Christmas Musings.

THE gladsome season is with us once more. It has come not a whit too soon. Its coming was earnestly desired and eagerly anticipated. It was never more welcome, for Christmas means the hushing of dissonances, the softening of sorrow, the lightening of care, the ease of strain, the silencing of anguish, the hallowing of joy, the transfiguration of life. Its coming is fraught with blessing. It gives without stint, ungrudgingly and royally. It is not so ill-natured as to take note ofocracies, castes, classes, but distributes its benison on all alike—summons the world to its banquet, and spreads before mankind its feast of fat things. The Christmas atmosphere is unmistakable, it soon registers itself, it is easily detected. The days have a flavour peculiarly their own, and affect us in sundry subtle ways as do no others—whisking out of us our ill-humours, blotting the care-clouds from our faces, healing the sorrow of our hearts, giving an unwonted tenderness to our thoughts, a softness to our feelings and a gentleness to our carriage. What does it mean? We can only answer, It is Christmas—and the answer is sufficient.

Of all seasons this is the most distinctly associated with happiness. The sky may be grey, the air may be cold, the frost may nip, the snow may be falling—but no matter, the merry season has arrived. Childhood bounds at the thought of it. Youth hails it with delight. Mature years give it welcome with a chastened pleasure, and in its exhilarating atmosphere old age forgets its weakness and weariness, and becomes rejuvenated—aye, the whole world not only lights its biggest fires, and puts on its fairest apparel, but it laughs and sings and shouts with one accord. The Russians have a legend to account for the origin of song. They say that in the beginning of the world the god of song came from the sky and sat on the mountain-top, and all creation listened. A bit of music was caught by all things and creatures. The woods learned their rustle and the waters their roar. The wind learned to whistle, the bee to hum, and the bird to carol. Every part of creation caught a bit of the mighty music. But only man grasped it in all its meaning and blessedness. In the morning of Christianity the angels of God stepped down to earth and discoursed such music as men had not hitherto heard. Its burden was, "On earth peace, good will towards men," and "Good tidings of great joy to all people." Slowly, all too slowly, fragment after fragment of the angel-minstrelsy has been caught, and so it comes to pass that year by year as the anniversary of our Saviour's birth comes round, men are lifted out of their sadness, carry music in their hearts, and find happiness in giving joy unto others.

There are those who spend their Christmas without any reference to Christ. Bethlehem is nothing to them, they kneel not at the cradle. This is of all blunders the greatest. A Christless Christmas is of all anomalies the strangest. We do not grudge these the indirect blessings of the Incarnation. We rejoice that they are in some measure influenced by the Redeemer whom they ignore, and that they pay to Him unwitting homage; but we lament their failure to observe this great festival in a truly Christian way. To leave out Christ is to denude the day of its deepest significance, is to rob it of its glory, is to fail to get the best out of it. Our Christmas should be celebrated by focussing our vision upon Him who loved us and gave Himself for us. During the day our thoughts should revert to Him again and again, until all our sin-clouds are dissipated, our life-shadows grow thin and pass away, and our whole being is irradiated. This is the secret of the purest blessedness. There is a picture of the Christ-child in the stable, which has its beautiful suggestions. The Child lies upon the straw, the mother bends over Him, the wondering shepherds are close at hand, and in the background are the cattle. It is night, and there is only one feeble lantern in the place. But from the infant face a radiance streams which lights up the rude scene, and on the faces of the wondering shepherds are golden beams. In the vision of the Christ-face we can always get a glory and a gladness not otherwise attainable. We should celebrate our Christmas by availing ourselves of the unsearchable riches of Christ. What a golden time we might have were we only to appropriate our heritage in Christ! "Of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace." Yes; but we have only received meagrely as yet—a scintillation or two of glory instead of a full-orbed revelation; a chord or two of heaven's music instead of the majestic symphonies; a crumb or two of heaven's bread instead of the full loaf. One writes, "The infinite light, the grace, the energy, which are ours in our Lord are most imperfectly actualised in our experience. Our poor experiences are not the measure of the gift of Christ. We have the dust of gold, rather than the gold itself, a few rose-leaves rather than the garden, grape gleanings rather than the vintage." Let us enter upon the realisation of our precious possessions. The season is opportune. Christmas speaks eloquently of the unspeakable gift, which will free us from all our sin, save us from all our thralls, enlarge and enrich our life. Let us accept with gratitude the deep peace, rich joy, profound love, and the great salvation which Christ has brought to our world.

JOSEPH PEARCE.

"Wedded to London."

IT was a dreary afternoon in autumn, and Catheline Blondel, of the Villorie Farm, in Guernsey, was counting the money she had saved during the summer. When she had accumulated a certain amount, it was her custom to deposit it in the Old Bank at Saint Pierre Port: and she usually took £20 at a time, which she had saved from current expenses. Living alone as she did, with an old servant, she spent comparatively little; but the farm was, of course, an expense, with its labourers to pay, and repairs and improvements to be kept up. She had been engaged for many years, and though she was now twenty-eight, there was no talk of marriage; both she and Roc Corbell, her farmer-lover, were of a "saving" disposition, and desired to amass a few more and still a few more francs before they ventured on matrimony.

This particular afternoon she was well pleased to find that her savings amounted to £20. She tied up the bank-notes and stowed them away in a drawer which she locked securely; then, going down-stairs to the kitchen, she found tea ready, and the servant waiting to have it with her mistress. They had just sat down when a hasty tap at the kitchen door was followed by the entrance of a pleasant-faced woman about Catheline's age.

"Ah! but you are at tea!" she cried, hesitating on the threshold.

"Bah! it's all right; come in and have a cuppoie, (cup of tea), Lucie. But, my good, isn't it dull weather?"

"Yes, indeed," answered the visitor, briskly taking off her "scoop," and helping herself to a dôri, (slice of bread and butter), "that's one thing that brings me here, it's for to ask you if you'll come with me this evening to Saint Pierre Port. There's a preacher from London going to tell about his work; in one of the Methodist chapels he will speak. They say, down to Jersey, that's he's very good, and I like to hear about poor people, me!"

Catheline shrugged her shoulders, "Well, I don't know; there's no really poor to Guernsey, and one doesn't think much about them."

"Ah, but, Catheline, there is poor to Guernsey! Only those that know, they say it's because of drink and other wickedness. But in London, I've been told, it isn't always their fault they're poor. There's so much against them! But, say, you'll come, won't you? We'll drive, of course, and I'll put up the caravane (carriage) to the stables in Le Bordage."

Catheline considered. After all, there would be no expense entailed, and she felt dull and heavy; it would brighten her up to go to "la ville." So she said, half reluctantly, "Well, I don't mind if I come."

"Bon! That's decided; then I'll be here to fetch you at six, the meeting begins at half-past seven, and don't forget, there'll be a collection, Catheline!"

Catheline nodded; she was a Methodist, and well used to collections, though she never, by any chance, put more than a penny in the bag. She couldn't afford more, she told herself.

When the two women entered the chapel, it was already well filled, but they found seats near the rostrum, and could command an excellent sight of the preacher from London. He was a tall man, with a strong face, a broad forehead, and thick, dark hair turning grey. He began his lecture on his London work in even tones and without gesture of any kind; but when he had gained the entire attention of the people, he swayed them as he willed, as only a born orator could. With face uplifted, he translated the visions he saw in simple, telling words, instinct with pathos, strong and convincing. His blue eyes darkened as he pleaded for his poor brothers and sisters, and his heart agonised as he told of their awful sorrows and awful sins. Yet, through it all, there breathed a spirit of hope, for he saw the Christ in the worst of sinners; he despaired of none; he had "the tender heart, the mother's touch, the tear-dimmed eye" needed for the uplifting of the lowest and most degraded of God's children.

Tears of sympathy poured down Lucie's face as she listened to these tales of the London poor; but Catheline Blondel sat motionless, seemingly as cold as a stone. In reality, she was deeply moved, for she was living through an entirely new experience. She was thinking, for the first time in her life, of other people; she was even longing, in a vague way, to help them. Though she had been dutiful to her parents, she had not loved them; and her engagement to Roc Corbell was of a purely financial nature. But this evening she was as though new-born into another world: scales fell from her eyes; she grasped the meaning of lives apart from her own; she realised, for the first time, the existence of a world outside Guernsey, outside her little parish of Saint Sauveur. Her thoughts expanded, a paralysing influence lifted from her brain; she became, in a few hours, more intelligent than she had ever been; and she left the chapel with the germs of life in her soul, and despair at her heart. Alas! she had given but a penny to the collection: that was all she had taken in her big purse, greasy and stained by market coppers.

She said but little to Lucie on their return journey, though that little was appreciative of the meeting. Reaching Villorie farm quite late, an unaccustomed event for her, she went at once to her bedroom, without touching any supper. She was ousted, entirely, from her usual grooves; and sitting down on her bed, she fell to musing, with her best bonnet on, regardless of everything but the stories, the true, wondrous stories she had heard from the London preacher. She was so excited that it was long before she got into bed; and then she passed a restless night, filled with dreams of weary little children and hollow-eyed women. Waking early, she started up in bed and wondered what had happened; then she remembered the evening before, "And I gave only a penny," she murmured, "and there's £20 in the bureau!"

Jumping out of bed, she opened the drawer and took out the bank-notes. With trembling fingers she counted out £5 and put them aside; then she tied up the other notes and restored them to the drawer. But with cool, calm daylight, her years of scraping money together reasserted their power. She hesitated, flushed, clasped her hands, opened the drawer again, untied the notes and was about to slip in amongst them the five pounds put aside, when suddenly she stopped. A strong, pleading face rose before her, a hand pointed to starving children and broken-hearted women; a stern voice cried in her startled ears:

"Behold your sisters, your brothers, help them! or surely God will call you to account!"

She let the money drop on the floor; and falling upon her knees, she cried to God, in broken words and sighs. The struggle was bitter and the victory tarried: but at last she rose, took five pounds from the twenty, and locked up the fifteen in the drawer. And two days after, the London preacher received from Catheline Blondel a cheque for use in his "parish." It was an era in her life when she received his acknowledgment, and a parcel of booklets relating to his work. Ah! she had enough to think about then! She took Lucie into her confidence, and they studied the great question together, absorbed by the new interest in their monotonous lives. Catheline's nature softened, a womanliness crept into her hard face, a soft-eyed look of love. But she said not a word of all this to Roc Corbell; he was not a Methodist, and she began to regret this, for she felt a quickening of religious life in her soul, a desire to be nobler, purer, better; and she realised keenly now the lack of sympathy that must henceforth exist between them.

He noticed, on his part, that she did not speak as much as usual of money matters, and it did not disturb him; women's ideas were not much accounted of by this hard-headed money-lover. But she never thought of giving him up, for she did not realise that a true love, a broad, strong love was mastering, gradually, but surely, every fibre of her being.

And Christmas time drew on. There were to be various festivities got up in the London preacher's "parish," and as Catheline read of them her heart burned within her; she untied her bank-notes again, and taking out ten pounds she sent them to the good man who had opened her eyes, and saved her from the curse of avarice. Then she confided to Lucie that she had decided to go to London to spend Christmas, and see for herself the doings in this "parish" of her ideals. Lucie gasped at the audacity of the plan, but she was delighted, nevertheless; and it only remained for Catheline to break the news to Roc Corbell.

He listened with a queer smile as she told her tale, simply and earnestly; then he laughed in her face, and said she must be mad to throw away good money in the gutter, just to see a lot of dirty loafers living on charity. At his brutal words, she turned white and sick with disappointment; but she clung to the old arrangement and left Guernsey, still engaged to be married to Roc Corbell. He did not write to her; but he went to the Villorie farm very often, and "poked his nose in every corner," as the old servant told Lucie; and Catheline did not write to him.

Christmas passed; and on the last day of the Old Year, Roc Corbell went, as usual, to Villorie farm in the evening. A bright vraic (dried seaweed) fire blazed on the broad hearth in the kitchen; the crockery on the dresser, and the brass candlesticks on the chimney-piece glowed again, as the flickering light fell upon them. The kitchen was the picture of comfort; and Catheline sat in an old chintz-covered arm-chair before the fire, her busy hand sewing at little garments. As Roc entered, she rose in evident constraint.

"You've come back then, at last," he said coldly, "and I hope you've had enough of it. You might have let me know you were coming."

"Yes," she replied, meekly, "I've been in the wrong, Roc; but it's that, at first, I couldn't make up my mind."

"Make up your mind! What do you mean? I suppose, now, the truth is that you're sick of the affair to London! You have found out it's all rubbish and waste of money."

"No, no!" she cried, "it's not like that at all! It's that I love the work to London, Roc! I love it with all my heart—and you—I don't—love—and it's that I can't marry you."

"What!" he cried, "you don't mean to tell me you're going to give up the Villorie and work to London, and put all your money there? You're never such a fool, Catheline! That rubbish of work amongst drunkards and worse!"

"Hush," she said, "hush! Do not speak thus of God's work! Roc, let me speak just for once! Won't you try not to care for money so much?"

He laughed harshly. "Do you take me for a madman? To get money is the first thing in life, and money I have and mean to keep. I don't believe in that silly talk of marrying for love; bah! it's rubbish. It's as well I know you are going to throw your doubles away, because, then, of course, I needn't come here no more. You've decided, quite?"

"Yes," she replied quietly, "I'll sell Villorie, and go and work amongst the poor. I love them; ah! I can't tell you how much I love them!"

"Go, then!" he cried rudely, as he banged the door after him, "Go! since you're fool enough to give me the sack and be wedded to London!"

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHAPEL AND SCHOOL, BOLSOVER.

Men Worth Remembering.

VIII.—JEREMIAH GILBERT.

BY THE REV. JESSE ASHWORTH.

HE subject of our sketch has already had the strange distinction of what may be termed one resurrection. In January, 1853, the mortal remains of this highly-honoured servant of God were deposited in a vault in front of our old Chesterfield, (Beetwell Street) Chapel, in the midst of a large concourse of mourning friends. When this time-honoured sanctuary was superseded by the erection of our splendid new church in Holywell Cross, the old chapel was disposed of for business purposes. This rendered necessary the exhuming of the body of our departed friend. Some little difficulty was experienced in discovering the vault, as there was no stone over it; but there was a tablet to his memory in the old chapel, which has been transferred to the Holywell Cross Trust property. When the body, by permission of the Home Secretary, was removed to Calow Churchyard, Mr. Mason, the sculptor, informed us that although it had reposed here for over thirty years, the oak coffin bore no marks of decay, and the lettering of the brass plate was perfectly legible. What a striking emblem of the faith of its occupant while living, and the enduring character of his work when dead!

Being in the neighbourhood of Chesterfield, we embraced the opportunity of visiting the hallowed spot and standing upon the once occupied grave of our departed friend. The inscription-stone is still over the door of what was the old chapel. Mr. Edwards, the evangelist, who accompanied us, stated that he himself had seen hundreds of conversions in that old sanctuary.

We had personally only once the pleasure of meeting Jeremiah Gilbert. When a youth of sixteen we called upon our esteemed superintendent minister of Stockport Circuit, the Rev. Samuel Smith, who introduced us to him. His quiet, pleasant smile, the kind but gentle pressure of the hand, and the words of blessing which he uttered, made a vivid and life-long impression upon our youthful mind; and the knowledge of his successful labours caused his name to be familiar as household words all along the years.

In addition to this we have possessed for about sixty years, a little book published by Mr. Gilbert at North Shields, in the year 1824, with the following title page: "Extracts from the Journals, Camp Meetings, Revivals, etc., etc., of Jeremiah Gilbert, Primitive Methodist Preacher." The following quotations from Scripture are on the title page, "In prisons more frequent," "Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things; charity never faileth."

To this little book we are indebted for much of the following information. We are also greatly indebted to our esteemed friend, the Rev. Thomas Jackson, of Clapton Mission, for the loan of the magazine in which Mr. Gilbert's memoir appears from the pen of the late Rev. Robert Parks.

Jeremiah Gilbert was born at Caunton, near Newark, in the county of Nottingham. When only four years of age he was bereft by death of his earthly father, and was consequently left to the care of his widowed mother. Although strictly moral through his childhood and youth, he did not obtain the pearl of great price till the age of twenty-one, at which period he joined the Wesleyan Methodists, among whom he laboured as a local preacher for several years with great acceptance, and was made extensively useful. In this work he had the pleasure of seeing hundreds of sinners converted unto God. His labours were not confined to the Newark Circuit, nor circumscribed by the hours of the Sabbath; for he took appointments in the Retford and Worksop Circuits, and frequently preached two or three evenings in the week. He was occasionally employed as an assistant in supplying the appointments of the itinerant ministers.

While thus engaged, the Primitive Methodists came to his locality; but he first regarded them with a measure of suspicion, as unworthy of his confidence or attention. The excitement, however, became so great, and the popular feeling in many places ran so high in their favour, that Mr. Gilbert was induced to attend a Camp Meeting held in his own locality. As the result he was so fully convinced that his prejudices were unfounded, and that the work of Primitive Methodism was of God, that he came to an immediate and full decision to join our people, and give himself entirely to the work of the ministry.

Mr. Gilbert preached his first sermon among the Primitive Methodists on May 19, 1819. Thus we are carried back in our imagination to the distant period when the Connexion was but in its infancy, being only nine years old. Things moved on in those days with great rapidity. There were no anxious waitings for Candidates' Committees, no searching examinations—which are quite the proper thing in our time. Mr. Gilbert went the same month to the Quarterly Meeting at Nottingham, was accepted, and at once appointed as a home missionary. Like the apostles of old, he went forth without purse or scrip, or guarantee from any Sustentation Fund; but committing himself to the guidance of Divine Providence, he was directed to the town and neighbourhood of Sheffield, where a great and effectual door was opened unto him. The metropolis of cutlery and the whole country around it were greatly moved, while hundreds of sinners were turned from "darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God."

It was during these gracious revivals that Chesterfield, Barnsley, Wakefield, Halifax, and their adjacent villages were missioned.

From Mr. Gilbert's journal we obtain a momentary glimpse of the first Annual Conference held at Hull, May, 1820. He tells us that preaching was appointed each morning at five o'clock, and at seven in the evening services were held both in the chapel and in several of the streets of Hull. Many thousands attended the Camp Meeting on the Sunday; the Love-feast, which commenced on the Tuesday evening, continued till one or two o'clock the following morning, and was crowned by the conversion of about forty persons.

Being filled with the Divine Spirit during the Conference services, he called on a Wesleyan in Hull, went to prayer, and saw two saved, then went to Kirton, preached, and witnessed more conversions. The Sunday after the Conference was spent at Sheffield. He preached at six o'clock in the morning in Young Street, and had a good time; at eight, preached in Water Lane, supposed to be the worst place in Sheffield, but many appeared to be greatly affected, and came to the chapel in the evening. At half-past ten, and six, preached in the chapel, and in the Park at eight; in the afternoon he administered the sacrament. Surely in this Jeremiah Gilbert was like the Apostle Paul, "in labours more abundant." Six services, two before breakfast, three in the open-air, and yet he cheerfully adds, it was a blessed day to his own soul and many others.

During the following week, while renewing tickets, one sinner was saved, and one believer sanctified. While calling to see a friend he witnessed two more conversions, and while visiting a sick woman who was happy, he had the joy of leading two to the Saviour. He had a refreshing time at Rotherham, and saw one set at liberty. So he appears to have gone on rejoicing day by day.

On Sunday, June 4th, he attended a Camp Meeting on Ravenfield Common. While the different praying companies were wrestling in mighty prayer, a boy of twelve, a girl of fifteen, and an old man with hair as white as snow, were among the weeping penitents and rejoicing believers. He states that he never saw more life, more of the power of God, more tears shed at any Camp Meeting before.

Shortly after this Camp Meeting, he gives a graphic description of his strange encounter with a clergyman. "On Thursday, June 15th, I went to Balborough, sang up the village, mounted a heap of stones for my pulpit, no one daring to lend me a chair. After prayer and singing again, I took my text and spake a little; a clergyman and constable came along, and desired me to desist from preaching and come down. I told them it was my intention to come down when I had finished my discourse; but I added, 'You had better go to yond' men who are making a very great rabble and noise, and let the preacher proclaim the Word of Life.' I reminded him of his son, a clergyman, who had pulled me down a year ago. I also told him that a greater than any magistrate had given me a licence,—that the King of heaven had given me authority to preach the Gospel. I then opened my Testament, and read to him Luke xiv. 23; Mark xvi. 15; but he said, 'We have nothing to do with those things.' I replied, 'The Bible ought to be our standing rule;' but all I said to him about the Bible seemed to have no weight. So the constable seized me, and I began to sing:—

'Wicked men I need not fear.'

The clergyman desired me to be silent, and almost got his hand to my mouth, but I told him my tongue was not to be tethered, for, as the Almighty had imparted to me such a gift, it should be employed in His praise. When in custody, I asked the clergyman if he believed the Bible? He said he did. I then asked him, 'Do you know that God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven you your sins?' He said, 'No;' and then told me he had been a preacher of the Gospel for thirty years. I then read to him St. Luke i. 77, and told him that at the day of Judgment we should both have to give an account of our preaching to God. He thought God would keep no account of his preaching in the Church, nor of my preaching out of doors. 'Why,' I replied, 'you said a few minutes ago that you believed the Bible, and in that sacred Book it is written, "By thy words shalt thou be justified, and by thy words shalt thou be condemned."' He told me several times I looked very respectable, and that I had better go away; but I told him as the constable had seized and brought me, that I should stay for the present. After having sung and prayed till a very late hour, I had a good night's rest. Next morning the constable came and wished me to go quietly away; but as I refused, he brought a cart to convey me to Chesterfield. As soon as I was seated I commenced singing,

'The Gospel news is sounding.'

As it was a busy day, the magistrates had not much time to spare with me, so the clergyman and another person took me aside to talk with me on the affair. I said, 'I wish you to proceed to the extent of the law.' 'Do you want to be sent to gaol?' they asked. 'Yes,' I said, 'if the law would send me there.' After a little more conversation, they told me that it could not be settled till the next Saturday; so I inquired if I were to return to Balborough till that time. They seemed to huff at that as if they had been at sufficient expense with me already; for the constable said, when I was taken up before, I cost them nine shillings, and it appeared I should cost them a deal more now. When they talked of fining me five shillings, I said they might as well fine me forty pounds, for my Father had much property, and if He saw it right, all the money would be paid, and although I have been taken before the magistrates six or seven times the last fifteen months for preaching the Gospel, I have always come out of prison with increased devotion to my vocation. When I was in Bolsover Round House—the name of the then lock-up—where there was neither bed nor straw, I felt God had full possession of my body, soul and spirit. After hearing these statements, the clergyman hastily made the best of his way out of the room, so I immediately followed him, and was at liberty."

It would seem that the parson and constable when they had taken him scarcely knew what to do with him. As with the Apostles when brought before rulers, the Holy Spirit furnished him with suitable answers. What a glimpse this gives us of the past; and how gratefully may we recognise the great and happy change which has come over society since that time! Bolsover Round House had neither bed nor straw. Now we have just opened at Bolsover, under the superintendency of the Rev. R. Heppenstall, a beautiful new chapel, school, and class rooms, that have cost about two thousand pounds, designed by Mr. Morley, of Bradford, architect. We present our readers with a view of this fine block of trust property in which we have just had the pleasure of holding services. While staying at Bolsover we visited the market-place where Mr. Gilbert was, with trumpet tones, eighty years ago proclaiming salvation when the constable interfered and led him away to the Round House. We should like very much to have given our readers a picture of this notable Round House, but it has sometime since disappeared. The Round House has gone, but he who once occupied it "being dead yet speaketh."

Standing on this sacred spot, and looking back for four-score years, we cannot but rejoice in the progress which both civil and religious liberty has made in our country during that period, and also in the advancement of Primitive Methodism from a few thousands, to a Church membership of nearly two hundred thousand, besides all the myriads who are safely landed in the heavenly home, and who will be the crown of our rejoicing in the great day of the Lord.

It is worth while attempting to show the change which has come over the face of things. A few years ago, when our esteemed friend the Rev. George Windram was superintendent of Chesterfield Circuit, Dr. Booth, who is so well known throughout the Connexion, was elected mayor of the town and invited the Corporation to attend with him our Holywell Cross Church the first Sabbath after his election. What a marvellous change! Chesterfield, where Jeremiah Gilbert was so repeatedly brought before the magistrates and threatened with fines for preaching the Gospel, now chooses a distinguished Primitive Methodist for its chief magistrate, and the sermon to the Corporation is preached in a Primitive Methodist Church. Little did our fathers dream that such honours would result from their heroic endurance of persecution and self-sacrificing labours.

The Sabbath following his liberation from Chesterfield, Mr. Gilbert attended the Sheffield Camp Meeting, preaching at five o'clock in the morning in Young Street, and at seven in Water Lane, at which services the power of God descended, and many wept; thus he held two open-air services before the Camp Meeting commenced. At the love-feast in the evening about thirty found salvation.

During the following week, while calling to see a friend, he led three persons to the fountain of mercy, and one evening, when preaching at Mexborough in the open-air, one was saved and others were seeking salvation.

Mr. Gilbert next records another instance of persecution, suffering, and deliverance. "Wednesday, July 5th, at Eckington, in Derbyshire, I mounted a chair, and after singing twice and prayer, I took my text, when the constable came, got hold of my coat and pulled me down. I then began to sing:—

'Christ He sits on Zion's hill.'

It caused the people to smile when they saw me take hold of the constable's arm and walk away with him. He took me to a place which seemed to be as complete a prison as I had ever seen; the window had strong bars, and the door seemed full of great nails. I had neither bed nor straw, but lay across some laths, and had a broom for my pillow. A large number of people gathered round the iron-barred window; I exhorted them 'to flee from the wrath to come.' After some time the gaoler came and conversed with me; I persuaded him to go down on his knees in the prison, and prayed with him. I had to block up the window as well as I could to keep out the cold, for it was a wet, damp, and doleful prison." Like another Jeremiah, he knew what it was to be in the dreary dungeon; "Yet at midnight," he says, "like Paul and Silas at Philippi, I prayed and sang praises to God;" proving the words of the poet true:

"Prisons would palaces prove,
If Jesus would dwell with me there."

"After being," he says, "in this loathsome prison two days and two nights, I was taken to Chesterfield in a gig. Going up the street I sang—

'Come, Oh come, thou vilest sinner.'

On the way to Chesterfield I talked to the constable till he wept very much. The magistrate, finding no fault in me worthy of bonds, set me at liberty. It is reported the magistrate said, 'What do you bring that man here for? He has no money to pay fines.' Undaunted, the moment he had his freedom he set off to Eckington again to finish his sermon.

It is difficult to make selections from his journals for want of space; but the following may be taken as samples of his marvellous labours and success.

"At Thorpe we had a prayer meeting in the afternoon. After the meeting was concluded, I said to a woman, 'Thou art not happy;' she replied, 'No.' We commenced again; she cried out for mercy, and soon entered into glorious liberty. At night, preached in a schoolroom, and in a prayer meeting which followed in a house, seven or eight found pardoning mercy. Oh, what a heaven my soul felt! and the house was filled with the glory of the Lord. The following morning we had a prayer meeting in the same house, and the Lord set one at liberty; in the dinner-hour I spoke again in the schoolroom, and the Lord saved two or three more. At night, spoke at Rotherham, when two backsliders were restored to the favour of God. At New Hill, went from house to house most of the day, several cried for mercy, and one old man found salvation, shouting, 'Glory to God for what He has done for me.' Next day, spoke at Aughton, three or four found peace; it was a night of great joy. June 1st, 1821, I preached at Denby-Dyke side, out of doors, and we afterwards held a prayer meeting in a friend's house, which continued till five o'clock in the morning. The scene was very interesting—some crying for mercy, others getting into liberty, and praising God with all their might; twelve or fourteen found the Lord. Such a night of prayer as I have scarcely witnessed before."

Much more of similar records might be added if our space permitted; but we pass on to notice some testimonies which were furnished to his biographer after Mr. Gilbert's decease.

The Rev. G. W. Armitage writes: "When Mr. Gilbert came to Barnsley the circuit was in a rudimentary state, but he and his colleagues opened a number of places, at most of which societies were formed. He occasionally stayed at my father's house when labouring in the neighbourhood, and I can distinctly remember his stentorian voice, robust frame, undaunted courage, and his indefatigable efforts to bring the guilty to God. I was called to labour with him in Halifax, where he had an increase of 219 members in one quarter. Here I was an eye and ear-witness of his great zeal and untiring energy to win souls. Frequently after week-night services he would spend an hour or two in pleading for distressed penitents at their own homes."

Mr. Gilbert's next field of labour was Bradwell, in Derbyshire, to which mission he was appointed in 1822, and left it a rising circuit in 1823. "His labours here," writes the Rev. W. Inman, "were indefatigable. Strong and healthy, willing and fearless, holy and mighty, he proved himself one of our early sons of thunder; many hardened sinners were arrested in their downward course and led to seek the salvation of God." The writer of this sketch commenced his itinerant ministry at Bradwell thirteen years later. The name of Mr. Gilbert was then like ointment poured forth; it was said that he would work in the hayfield during the day, and preach at night; thus, like St. Paul, labouring with his own hands.

Mr. Gilbert's next sphere of labour was North Shields, respecting which the Rev. W. Lister wrote: "He had nearly three hundred increase of members the first half-year. At the December Quarterly Meeting, Newcastle was made a separate circuit from North Shields. He was very arduous in his missionary labours, and very successful in the converting work."

For lack of space we pass over his labours in Sunderland, Hexham, Whitby, Darlaston, Belper, Wrockwardine Wood, Chesterfield, Boston, Burton, Winster and Nottingham; but we judge that an account of his early Camp Meetings from his own pen will prove full of both interest and inspiration to our readers.

"The first Camp Meeting I attended in 1821, was near Thong, in Yorkshire, at which ten thousand people were estimated to be present. Conversions were witnessed morning, afternoon, and evening; about two hundred and fifty were saved in this locality in about three months.

"On Sunday, June 3rd, we held a united Camp Meeting for Sheffield and Barnsley Circuits, on

The Old
Chapel & Preachers' House.
Beetwell St. Chesterfield.

Mexborough Common. The day was glorious throughout. The meeting commenced at six in the morning, and closed about six in the evening. At one time there were sixteen praying companies; the loud amens were like claps of thunder, and the bursting joy of Christian voices like the sound of many waters. It was fully believed there were hundreds converted that day; the newspapers reported that upwards of twenty thousand people were assembled on Mexborough Common on that occasion.

"On Sunday, June 10th, we held a Camp Meeting on Skircoat Moor, near Halifax. The rain came on very heavily in the forenoon, but we continued to sing, pray and exhort till dinner-time. The rain coming heavier still in the afternoon, we held a prayer meeting in a house at Halifax, where the woman of the house, her daughter and another found peace. After this we went again to the moor, and continued till near nightfall; we afterwards spoke in the town; we believe this was a good day to many souls.

"Aug. 3rd, a Camp Meeting on Greetland Moor, at which it was estimated about ten thousand people were present. Five found salvation in the morning, six in the afternoon, and a good number in the evening. About nine we closed on the moor, after which we held a prayer meeting at Greetland. It was a shaking time, three backsliders got reclaimed, and one man who left the moor with a wounded spirit found salvation in his own house.

"Sunday, May 19th, 1822, a Camp Meeting at

HOLYWELL CROSS CHURCH, CHESTERFIELD.

Bradwell on a very high hill. It was a remarkable day for the Holy Spirit; numbers were broken down and set at perfect liberty on the Camp ground. In the lovefeast a number more were born of the Spirit of God, and witnessed a good confession before men.

"July 20th, 1823, we held a Camp Meeting for North Shields Circuit on Scaffold Hill, at which thousands attended. Although the day was unfavourable, with wind and sometimes rain, the work of the Lord went on well; several fell down before preaching began in the morning; when the three preaching-stands broke up for dinner, brother Nelson was wrestling hard in prayer with three in deep distress. Oh, how cheering to see them all rise and praise God for pardoning mercy! In the afternoon rain came on very heavy, but the Lord's work did not stand still. I thought there were more souls set at liberty during the heavy rain than when it was fair; five souls were saved in one praying company. At the lovefeast, which was held in the open air, others sought the Lord with many tears, and found Him to the joy of their hearts.

"Aug. 3rd, a Camp Meeting at Colliery Dykes, at which the weather was unfavourable both morning and afternoon; the lovefeast at night was in a barn; Brothers Batty and Jersey laboured with all their might. I believe within two hours twenty-seven souls were set at liberty."

We could add more such records if necessary. But who can read unmoved of these great gatherings on Mexborough Common, Skircoat Moor, Bradwell Heights, Colliery Dykes, Scaffold Hill, Greetland Moor, and many other places? Who can read of the labours, enthusiasm, success, and power of the fathers and founders of our Connexion without wonder and admiration? Who can recall these great Camp Meetings without searchings of heart and earnest inquiries why we have not equal, or even increasing success? Have we the same preparation, the same anticipations even for our District Meeting or Conference Camp Meetings, as they had on ordinary occasions? Is not the old phraseology, "Set at liberty," "Found salvation," "Got converted," "Obtained peace," "Born of the Spirit," "Fully sanctified," too much lost sight of, or gone into disuse? What produced these mighty soul-saving results? Some may attribute a great deal to the charm of novelty; but while this may be to some extent admitted, have not we numbers, influence, prestige, chapel and school property, colleges, libraries, and many appliances which our fathers did not possess? Should not all these more than make up for the lack of novelty? Were all these great talents and advantages possessed by modern Primitives, fully baptised with the Holy Ghost, might not our success surpass that of our fathers? Is not the promise of the Holy Spirit made as fully to the closing hours of the nineteenth, as to the beginning of the first century? "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto Me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

During the last two years of his active ministry, Mr. Gilbert's health had broken down, and he was compelled, though very reluctantly, to accept superannuation. This took place at the Tunstall Conference of 1846. For nearly the following six years he resided at Bath Terrace, Chesterfield. While here he rendered considerable service in visiting his old fields of labour in neighbouring circuits; but even this latterly exhausted him so much that he had to lie in bed for several days after some of these return journeys.

At length the end of his remarkable earthly course drew near. His biographer states: "I had several pleasing interviews with him in his chamber during the closing weeks of his earthly career. He seemed to live in daily communion with God, and in holy meditation on the heavenly world. Some of his latest words to his dear wife were, 'I am happy, happy, happy!' On the 30th of December, 1852, he fell asleep in Jesus without a sigh, a struggle, or a groan, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, leaving a mourning widow and several children." How beautiful such a death! Who does not say with the poet:—

"How blest the righteous when he dies."

For want of space we pass over the funeral solemnities, which were attended by numerous ministers and crowds of deeply sympathising friends.

In summing up the character of this father in our Israel, we may remark, in his Journals he gives a copy of one of his letters, which, if space permitted its insertion, would show his great affection for his dear mother and relatives.

From his journals, also, it is evident that he was as well acquainted with books as the opportunities of those earlier days permitted; but his supreme praise was reserved for the Bible. We quote the following: "The Bible is not only the oldest but the best book in the world. The matter, the manner, the end, the harmony, yea, and the success of the Bible, together with the character of its penmen and the accomplishment of its predictions, should impress us with its Divine Authority. We ought to be thankful that our salvation, our holiness, our happiness, does not depend upon the trivial errors of copyists or translators. Infidels may reject, sceptics may doubt, and the licentious may sneer; yet the Bible is the sure word of prophecy. There is no other book in the world so admirably adapted to the capacities of all men as the Bible; so sublime in its language, so noble in its doctrine, yet so plain in its precepts, so rich in its promises; and is, indeed, able to make men wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ."

Mr. Gilbert would evidently have agreed heartily with Dr. Alexander Maclaren in one of his recent pronouncements: "If, in the eagerness of the chase after the literary facts of the origin of the Old Testament, we forget that the Bible is a unity, that it is a Divine unity, that it is a progressive revelation, and that the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy, then I venture to say, that the most uncritical old-fashioned reader of the Old Testament that finds Jesus Christ in the Song of Solomon, and in the details of the Tabernacle, and in all the ministrations of worship and sacrifice, was nearer to the living heart of the thing than the most learned scholar that has been so absorbed in the inquiries as to how and when this bit and the other of the book was written, that he fails to see the one august Figure that shines out, now more, and now less dimly, and gives unity to the whole."

Mr. Parks sums up the character of Mr. Gilbert in the three following very striking particulars. "First, he was a Christian of the highest order; second, he was a philanthropist of the noblest class. Loving God with all his heart, and consequently loving all mankind, led him to leave his home, to endure privations, to brave persecutions, to perform herculean labours, to devote the strength of his manhood, to sacrifice his health, his life, his all, in the cause of suffering humanity. For this Jeremiah Gilbert prayed, wept, agonised, endured hunger and thirst, bonds and imprisonments, and wore out a vigorous and healthful constitution. Thirdly, he was a minister of an apostolic character. When we consider the Divinity of his call to the work, the providential openings in his course, the purity of his doctrine, the power of his appeals, the strength of his faith, the fervency of his zeal, the abundance of his labours, the multitude of his converts, and the holiness of his life, we deem him such an one as St. Paul would have chosen for a companion; one whose example may prove a noble inspiration to all who make it their prayerful study."

Who can read this sketch without feeling that Jeremiah Gilbert was a man worth remembering; that he was a living Christian entirely devoted to a living Christ; his whole career evincing the intensity of his inward, spiritual vitality? He could say like St. Paul, "This one thing I do." Were we attempting to describe his whole life in a single word or sentence, it would be—Conversions; an unflinching, undying zeal for the conversion of sinners to God. When a local preacher, he led hundreds of souls to Christ. From the beginning to the close of his itinerant ministry, the conversion of sinners was his constant aim. He witnessed conversions when leading classes, renewing tickets, administering the sacrament, visiting the sick, calling upon a friend, when preaching in barns, houses, streets, on commons, wild moors, from prison cells, and in conveyances which were taking him before magistrates, on windy, wet Camp Meeting days, at week-night services, yea, he witnessed conversions under every possible circumstance, and in almost every variety of place. Nothing could for a moment divert his attention from the one great purpose of his life—the conversion of sinners to God.

Is it not possible, even in the Connexion's improved position—with large chapels, magnificent organs, musical services, splendid colleges, a trained ministry, educated young people, enhanced prestige—Is it not possible for the whole Connexion, even amid its multiplied activities, large bazaars and debt reduction schemes, to concentrate its attention simultaneously upon this one all-absorbing object, the conversion of sinners to God? Might not such a concentration bring any year, an accession of twenty or thirty thousands to our Church membership? Is this too much to anticipate, when we remember the extensive area which the Connexion now covers, its possession of vast talent, wealth, and influence, with the infinite resources of Divine power and grace, available in answer to prayer? Let us catch the sentiment of the old hymn, often sung amid rolling revivals:—

"Haste again, ye days of grace,
When assembled in one place,

Signs and wonders marked the hour,
All were filled and spoke with power.

Oh, that each may now prevail,
Pray in faith that cannot fail,
Rise and pull the blessing down,
Seize the kingdom for our own.

Fire our hearts with holy zeal,
Glowing still for Zion's weal;
Heaven open, blessing pour;
Spirit, work, this present hour."

XII.—QUIETISM: ITS GAIN AND LOSS.

ALTHOUGH the word "Quietist" bears a technical acceptation, and is used, in the parlance of the schools, to signify that form of mysticism which consists in entire abnegation of all active exercise of the will in religion, and in meditation on God and Divine things as the essence of the true life, there is a very real, if free, sense in which it may be applied to Wordsworth.

Discharge the term of all special theological implication and we may say that he stands for the Quietist spirit in literature and in life. If we may not speak of him in the same breath with Miguel de Molinos, the Spanish Jesuit priest who started the school, or with Archbishop Fénelon, or with Madame Guyon, he has, assuredly, his affinities with George Macdonald, perhaps the most distinguished of modern Quietists. Chiefly by temperament, but partly also by circumstances, Wordsworth is the recluse of poets. Not that he did not travel, or take interest in practical affairs. Until within fourteen years of his death he made long tours abroad, besides visits to Wales, Scotland and Ireland. He was, at first, at all events, an energetic patriot, as we have seen, and watched the Revolution and its developments with an eager, though truly, as time went on, a lack-lustre eye. In a word, his deepest and most enduring sympathies were with a retired quietness. Emerson is right when he says that while Wordsworth's genius was the great exceptional fact of the literature of the period, he had no teachers or inspirers save nature and solitude. He "murmured by the running brooks, a music sweeter than their own," His early conditions of birth and up-bringing were rustic and isolated. He lived out his own opinion that "a man of letters, and, indeed, all public men of every pursuit, should be severely frugal." His wants were ever modest, and two or three lucky little windfalls saved him from sordid anxieties. Carlyle softened his cynical disparagements of Wordsworth by admitting that he had a genuine admiration for "the antique greatness" of the poet's "devotion to Poverty and Peasantry." Sir Henry Taylor remarks that "a fine wholesome rusticity, fresh as his mountain breezes, sat well on the stalwart veteran [in the year 1840], and on all he said and did. You would have said he was a usually taciturn man, glad to unlock himself to audience sympathetic and intelligent, when such offered itself. His face bore marks of much, not always peaceful, meditation." With all this agrees, to a marvel, his own self-estimate, as given, for example, in the three fine sonnets entitled "Personal Talk." I can quote but snatches of them.

"I am not One who much or oft delight
To season my fireside with personal talk.—
Of friends, who live within an easy walk,
Or neighbours, daily, weekly, in my sight.

Better than such discourse doth silence long,
Long, barren silence, square with my desire;
To sit without emotion, hope or aim,
In the loved presence of my cottage-fire
And listen to the flapping of the flame,
Or kettle whispering its faint undersong.

Among your tribe,
Our daily world's true worldlings, rank not me!

Dreams, books are each a wor'd, and books, we know
Are a substantial world both pure and good;
Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood,
Our pastime and our happiness will grow,

Nor can I not believe but that hereby Great gains are mine; for thus I live remote
From evil-speaking; rancour, never sought,
Comes to me not; malignant truth or lie.
Hence have I genial seasons, hence have I Smooth passions, smooth discourse and joyous thought;
And thus from day to day my little boat
Rocks in its harbour, lodging peaceably."

It is easy to say that boats were not made for this, but it is equally hard to deny the attraction of such an ideal for thousands. Without being lotoseaters, longing for the land where it is always afternoon, we may yet be forgiven for being not seldom tired of the mad race of modern life. Pascal once wrote that all the "evils of life arise from our not being able to sit still in a room;" and although the old text which tells us that our "strength is to sit still" is, as commonly quoted, a palpable misreading, it holds a deep and needed truth. The Wordsworthian calm has more real strength in it than the Byronian fury; after all,

"The Gods approve
The depth, and not the tumult, of the soul."

The active and the contemplative ideals of life—the Martha and the Mary views—will always have their respective votaries, and it is ill for us to seek to rule out either. For each there are both gain and loss, and we can but try to steer clear of the falsehood of extremes. For while it is true that Wordsworth's message of stoical simplicity and content comes like balm to minds attuned to his own, it cannot be gainsaid that for thousands upon thousands it is either empty or irritating. Macaulay could not stand it, and he speaks for a big class, with no pretensions to his culture, but yet like to him in love of pomp and stir. Wordsworth knew quite well how he struck such souls. "Merely think," he once wrote, "of the pure, absolute honest ignorance in which all worldlings, of every rank and situation, must be enveloped with respect to the thoughts, feelings, and images on which the life of my poems depends. The things I have taken, whether from within or without, what have they to do with routs, dinners, morning calls, hurry from door to door, from street to street, on foot or in carriage? . . . It is an awful truth that there neither is, nor can be, any genuine enjoyment of poetry among nineteen out of twenty of those persons who live, or wish to live, in the broad light of the world—among those who either are, or are striving to make themselves, people of consideration in society."

Even people in whom there is no trace of vulgarity find Wordsworth lacking in force. A genial lady critic of these papers writes me: "I must say that, much as I admire the chosen thoughts you delve out of his poems, and much as one must appreciate your desire to deal fairly with both his faults and his merits, still, whenever you quote another writer as expressing the same views, I can't help thinking how much more life there is in his lines than in Wordsworth's." That is a typical stricture, and one is bound to take notice of it. Wordsworth is not for all men, nor for all moods. His public and his appeal are limited, but those whom he does find he moves profoundly. As John Morley says: "He is probably too deficient in concentrated power to be classed among the great giants. We cannot be sure. But he has the skill to lead us, so long as we yield ourselves to his influence, into inner moods of settled peace, to give us quietness, strength, steadfastness, and purpose, whether to do or to endure." That verdict the present writer modestly begs to endorse out of his own experience.

Mr. Myers, in perhaps the finest passage in his fine monograph on the poet, definitely faces this allegation against Wordsworth that his life of almost "halcyon calm" was not the best either for the man or for his poetry. Had he enough of sorrow? "If we would still pronounce the true Beatitudes, not on the rejoicing, the satisfied, the highly-honoured, but after an ancient and sterner pattern, what account are we to give of Wordsworth's long years of blissful calm?" After pointing out, first of all, in reply, that no vulgar or transitory elements entered into the poet's happiness; that that happiness would by many have been found "austere and blank indeed," and therefore no happiness at all, he goes on: "And if it be answered that however truly philosophic, however sacredly pure, his happiness may have been, yet its wisdom and its holiness were without an effort, and that it is effort which makes the philosopher and the saint; then we must use in answer his own Platonic scheme of things, to express a thought which we can but dimly apprehend; and we must say that though progress be inevitably linked in our minds with struggle, yet neither do we conceive of struggle as without a pause; there must be prospect-places in the long ascent of souls; and the whole of this earthly life—this one existence, standing we know not where among the myriad that have been for us or shall be—may not be too much to occupy with one of those outlooks of vision and of prophecy when—

"In a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither;
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore."

That answer accepted, may commit us to re-incarnation, but what of that? Is it any more difficult to believe in pre-existence than in post-existence? Our current theologies leave much to be said and speculated about the origin of the soul.

To return, however, to our true subject, the quietistic Wordsworth must be content to pay for the pureness and intensity of his influence on certain minds with a certain real restriction of it in the general. Intension and extension are well known to be logical exclusives. Even Shakespeare, the million-minded, pays his tax. It is the fashion to "revere" him, but he is not read, except by the few. Silly operas displace his great masterpieces. The world has not yet come up with him by a long way. And similarly, Wordsworth has no doubt curtailed, not only his public, but his power too, by his lonely meditative life. He had his gains of happiness, but there must be set over against these his losses and limitations of appeal. As Myers says: "Many of life's most impressive phenomena were hid from his eyes. He neither achieved nor underwent any of those experiences which can make all high romance seem a part of memory, and bestow, as it were, a password and introduction into the very innermost of human fates."

The boat that rocks peacefully in the sheltered harbour never brings home rare and rich lading. It escapes the battering of the surges, but it misses also the fine spoil of strange seas. "Home-keeping youth hath ever homely wits." The dales of Cumberland and Westmoreland, for all their beauty and their rustic types of character, do not exhaust the universe. We need the energetic Marthas who serve, as well as the quiet Marys who sit. Eli's "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good," may be the classic expression of religious resignation, but it was accompanied with lamentable weaknesses. Now that I have struck upon that name it may serve to point both the good and the evil of Quietism in the religious sphere, at any rate. I commend the study to my brethren of the pulpit. The old man was in many ways very lovable. There was about him a beautiful absence of self-assertion, of priestly pride and pretension, and of selfish jealousies. His relations with young Samuel are pictured in a very attractive way. It speaks volumes for the simplicity of Eli's character that he could thus delight in the society of the guileless boy. His mind was subdued to child-likeness. They lived on terms of the most delightful frankness. Eli did not churlishly rebuke the boy for his "visions." He had also his close and kindly relations with the people, and took a fatherly, practical interest in them. And his resignation was not craven. There was a quiet strength about him. He was not a fighting judge, but he could dare to face the full truth about himself. He begged bravely to be told every whit. He seems, on the better side of him, the sentiment of St. Theresa incarnate: "Let nothing trouble thee: let nothing affright thee: all things pass away. God never changes; nothing is wanting to him who possesses God: God alone suffices." But turn now to the other side of the account. Life's ledger shows two opposite pages, and we must balance them fairly to get a true estimate. Eli was too much of a Quietist. "His sons made themselves vile and he restrained them not." He tended too readily to torpid acquiescence in things as they were. He shows that the type of character to which Quietism comes as natural is passive and feminine (no offence meant), rather than independent, masculine and morally vigorous. Quietism is liable to lack moral fibre and stamina, and strength of moral purpose; to be indifferent to the stern demands of duty and righteousness; to be lax in interpreting, realising, and applying moral laws and principles. Eli did not speak rebuke till the evil was too deeply rooted and had caused a public scandal. His reproof when it came was negative and pointless, both in form and substance. "Nay, my sons, for it is no good report that I hear." As one says: "In the case where the rebuke should have descended like a bolt from heaven, we hear nothing but low and feeble murmurings coming, as it were, out of the dust." There seemed no sense of the intrinsic evil of the sin—and there was no practical discipline. The old man left his vile sons weakly to God. He connived at the evil for a quiet life. Eli would not have lived so long, nor become so obese and heavy, but for this over-Quietism. A long life may be a discredit to a man, as well as a merit. It depends on what he does, or does not, with it. It was said of a certain man that in feeding the lamp of charity he exhausted the lamp of life. The encomium could never apply to Eli. Quietism's danger (in any sort of life, whether literary or religious), is to be too intent on happiness as an end. It seeks only to have the soul enveloped in a mystic and ethereal calm. Wordsworth paid the penalty of his temperament and his career in losing all vital interest in progress. He did nothing for education practically: though he had written much in favour of it. He bitterly opposed both Catholic Emancipation and the Reform Bill. His later poetry is formal and hard; or thin and jejune. He lost touch with the general world of his kind. He shut himself up in his valleys, and for all practical purposes, became a spent force. For his best work, done in his young prime, we owe him much, and these papers, now concluding, have drawn only on that fresh fountain of his earlier days. Where he is strong he is magnificently strong, and his better poetry will always be a tonic and an inspiration, but his character and his personal life, as well as the history of his muse, illustrate all too well the partialisms of human experience and human attainment, and warn us against seeking in any one man, however great or good, the ideal of the soul.

"There was no room for them in the inn."—Luke ii. 7.

THE fashionable church that night was full,
'Twas Christmas Eve; without, all drear and dull,
And bitter cold; within, all warm and bright
With decoration, as became the night.
The four walls blazed with texts; sweet hymns were sung;

The organ pealed; a merry chime was rung.
And all in honour of that Heavenly Child,
Who brought down peace to earth, and "mercy mild."

Here is He King, to Him the anthems roll,
And all the assembly "crown Him Lord of all."
Here is He Guest, the blazoned letters tell
That on the altar dwells "Immanuel."
How well the preacher chose his text that night!
His words how fit; with taste and judgment right!
"He came unto His own"—whom He had bought—
He came to them—"His own received Him not."
How he denounced, as he his theme pursued,
That Jewish blindness and ingratitude!

Showed Israel's many privileges up,
Her punishment a well-deserved cup,
And left his hearers, at the least, to infer,
How very different they were to her.
There was but one opinion at the close—
Above himself, they said, the preacher rose;
And in the praise the preacher gained that night,
The Christ he preached, alas, was lost to sight.
How brightly, smoothly everything had gone—
No, not quite everything—for there was one
Strange and unpleasant incident; midway
In the discourse. How entering none could say,

A stranger, clad in rags, with faltering feet,
Moved up the aisle, as looking for a seat;
He turned from side to side, but none gave place,
For all the pathos of his worn, sad face;
No furry coat or mantle of the throng,
To make him room, moved e'en an inch along;
Some smiled, some frowned, and others, much too proud

For either, not so much as just allowed
A look of wonder to o'erspread their faces,
But sat like stocks or statues in their places.
With lingering step, and sad, regretful look,
Out of the church at length his way he took.
"He was despised"—their parting anthem rang—
"He was rejected"—so the singer sang
"A man of sorrows, and with grief acquainted"—
So homeward went the people, well-contented.

"But inasmuch as"—so He gave the sign—
"Ye did it not to one the least of Mine,
"I take it ye had done it not to Me—
"Be banished from My face eternally!"

Once, long ago, in crowded Bethlehem,
The story says, there was no room for them.
Poor way-worn travellers! Reason excuse finds,
In their blank ignorance, and distracted minds:
But how, 'mid this lip honour, if to-day,
We shut Him out more utterly than they?
Will He not answer us as those of old,
Who gave Him words, but deeds of love withheld,
"Why call Me Lord?" He'll question in that Day,
"Why call Me Lord, but do not what I say?"

X.

LONG before Christmas the children begin counting up the weeks, and at last the days, and wondering what Santa Claus will bring them—strange make-believe of child-life. The presents of Santa Claus consist largely of what they buy for each other. Everybody but the recipient knows, in strictest confidence, what Santa Claus is going to put in his or her stocking. There are people, who have forgotten their own childhood, and have no sympathy with children, to whom Santa Claus is a mischievous folly, which fosters deceit. How little they know of the child-mind! All play is make-believe, yet nothing is more inborn than the love of play. The kitten runs after a reel, or chases its own tail, the lambs frisk about in the fields, dogs indulge in mimic battles, horses released from the shafts at the close of their day's work gambol with each other over the turf, and the boys and girls delight in "pretending," all their games and toys being pure mimicry. That man or woman is happiest who retains the longest the childish passion for play. I have read of a young wife who kept all her dolls in a secret drawer, and with locked doors would every day spend an hour in dressing and undressing and talking to them. Who would make a better mother? And within a day or two a young father has imparted to me, with huge glee, the information that he was going to buy a big humming-top. "I always liked humming-tops," he said, "and now I can have one again for Marjorie."

"Don't talk to me," said Delia, "about people who think Santa Claus should be done away with, and that all sorts of harm is done to children by games and toys! They must have been born old. They forget how Jesus delighted in children's games. Didn't He say, 'But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.' Thank God for Christmas Day, and all the joy and merriment it brings. It is the children's day of all the days, for it reminds us of the pure and stainless childhood of the Bethlehem Babe, whose infancy has blessed and consecrated all infancy."

"Well done, Delia! Wordsworth says that, 'Heaven lies about us in our infancy,' and Jesus Himself said of the children, 'For of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.' The Wise Men brought their presents to the Child Jesus in the manger. Is it too far-fetched to regard Santa Claus as a symbol of the Magi bringing presents to Jesus in the persons of the children who are most like Him?"

"I never thought of that, but why shouldn't we think so? After all, there is a good deal of truth in our make-believe."

"There is more truth in our imagination often than in our realities. Leigh Hunt expresses this very well in one of his essays."

I take down the book, and read from that charming paper on "The Realities of the Imagination." The writer is speaking of the great creative poets, whose characters and whose scenes are so living to us. For my own part, I have a theory that it is the child-mind that makes the poet, or the story-teller, and the writer who has retained the most of the fresh ingenuousness of the child is the great poet and the great novelist. Leigh Hunt says nothing is more real than the inventions of these authors who, with their magical words, bring forth to our eyesight the abundant images and beauties of creation. If their creations touch us, he says, they exist to as much purpose as anything else which touches us. If a passage in "King Lear" brings the tears into our eyes, it is as real as the touch of a sorrowful hand. We hear not the sounds with ears, nor see the sights with eyes; but we hear and see both so truly that we are moved with pleasure, and the advantage, nay, even the test, of seeing and hearing at any time is not in the seeing and hearing, but in the ideas we realise, and the pleasures we derive. Intellectual objects, inasmuch as they come home to us, are as true a part of the population of nature as visible ones, and they are infinitely more abundant. Between the tree of a country clown, and the tree of a Milton or Spenser, what a difference in point of productiveness! Between the plodding of a sexton through a churchyard, and the walk of a Gray, what a difference! What a difference between the Bermudas of a shipbuilder and the Bermoothes of Shakespeare; the isle—

"Full of noises, sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight, and hurt not; the isle of elves and fairies, that chased the tide to and fro on the sea-shore; of coral homes, and the knells of sea-nymphs; of spirits dancing on the sands, and singing amidst the hushes of the wind; of Caliban, whose brute nature enchantment had made poetical; of Ariel, who lay in cowslip-bells, and rode upon the bat; of Miranda, who wept when she saw Ferdinand work so hard, and begged him to let her help, telling him—

'I am your wife, if you will marry me;
If not, I'll die your maid. To be your fellow,
You may deny me; but I'll be your servant
Whether you will or no.'

Such are the discoveries which the poets make for us; worlds, to which that of Columbus was but a handful of brute matter."

"Splendid," said Delia, with whom Miranda, the heroine of "The Tempest," is a great favourite. "I hate those dull prosaic people who see no good in poetry, and ask, like the Scotchman of 'Paradise Lost,' 'What does it all prove?' What would life be without its poetry? Poetry is the language of the ideal, and is the natural expression of our highest and purest feelings. How can we express those things that 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive,' in the language of the morning paper? Why, every child is a poem, and the Child Jesus is the loveliest poem of all! What would the Bible be without those first two chapters of Luke? I love to think of that Bethlehem inn under the clear violet star-lit Eastern sky, with the wonderful star all at once appearing over the roof, and the shepherds surprised in the fields by the angels' song, and the Magi bringing their gold and frankincense and myrrh. Why, Jesus seemed to set everybody singing and breaking into poetry when He came into the world—the angels, and Mary, and Zacharias and Simeon, and the followers of Jesus have been singing ever since. Christianity seems to float in a sea of music."

"Why, you are getting quite poetical yourself, Delia."

"And pray, sir, why should I not? I have been reading lately a volume of 'Sacred Poems of the Nineteenth Century,' and if your lordship pleases, I will read you a poem of Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, the Methodist poet, which has pleased me."

My lordship did please, and Delia, who reads poetry with charming expressiveness, read a piece bearing the title, "Gold and Frankincense and Myrrh." It tells of a beggar who fell asleep and dreamt of the Wise Men offering their gifts to the Child Jesus. I quote four of the seven stanzas:

"The first—a stately man of noble mien,
With wise and thoughtful eye and brow serene—Addressed the sleeper thus: 'Pure gold I bring
To sacrifice before the new-born King.'
Then spake the second—who was young and fair:
'A costly gift of frankincense I bear,
Distilled from all the sweetest things on earth,
And therefore meet to grace a Monarch's birth.'

The third—a weary traveller, worn and old—
Sighed: 'I have neither frankincense nor gold;
To me life brings the bitter, not the sweet,
And poor indeed I go my King to meet:
I ne'er have found pure gold without alloy:
Nor yet the frankincense of love and joy;
Still all I have I give Him, and believe That e'en my bitter myrrh He will receive.'

An angel's voice made answer: 'Blest are they Who dedicate their gold to God, and pray
That He thereof will fashion crowns of light
To wreath their brows, who well have fought the fight.

Twice blest are they who bring the costly spice
Of life's most precious gifts as sacrifice;
For all such incense burnt before the Lord
One day a thousandfold shall be restored.

Thrice blest are they who—having nought at all
To offer save the wormwood and the gall—
Lay down their sorrows 'neath their Saviour's feet;
For He shall change their bitter into sweet,
His loving Hand shall wipe away their tears,
His gracious Smile dispel their doubts and fears,
Eternal joy shall turn their night to day,
Whilst grief and sighing quickly flee away."

"The beggar learnt the lesson that the most miserable can offer to Jesus an acceptable gift, even of their misery."

"The miserable," I said, "of all people, have reason to rejoice in the Saviour's birthday. At this season everybody's heart seems more tender, and their thoughts go out to their less fortunate brethren and sisters. We ought to be sympathetic and helpful to the poor and the suffering and the heart-stricken at all times, but alas, we are too often forgetful of them. At Christmas, however, it seems that unless we do something to make others joyful, our own joy is incomplete."

"I must press that idea," said Delia, "on the people I am going to call on for subscriptions to the poor children's dinner. Some of the people, who could best afford to give, appear to think they will be happy enough with their own turkey and plum pudding, and their own children's Christmas-tree, even if there are families starving on Christmas day, and children whom no Santa Claus will visit. The wretched old curmudgeons!"

I saw that Delia was getting wrathful, as she always does when her charitable feelings are rubbed

THOU hast not made, or taught me, Lord, to care

For times and seasons—but this one glad day
Is the blue sapphire clasping all the lights
That flash in the girdle of the year so fair
When Thou wast born a man—because alway
Thou wast and art a man through all the flights
Of thought, and time, and thousandfold creation's play.

GEO. MACDONALD.

the wrong way, so I created an immediate diversion by calling her attention to "The Lewis Carroll Picture-Book," just published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The title is really a misnomer, for the pictures are limited to a few early drawings and some photographs taken by the author of "Alice in Wonderland," and "Through the Looking Glass," books which Delia has read to the children till they know them almost by heart. The author, whose literary name was a pseudonym, was, as most people know, Rev. C. L. Dodgson, a profound mathematician and logician of Oxford University, a confirmed old bachelor, but devotedly fond of children, and especially of little girls, to whom he told the most delightful stories, with whom he played the funniest practical jokes, and to whom he wrote charming letters. This new book, on which Delia seized at once, and promised herself to read it before another week was over her head, consists of unpublished writings and letters of "Lewis Carroll," some drily mathematical, others very learned jokes, not understandable of ordinary people, but still some—especially the letters to little girls—that could only have been written by the creator of Alice, the Mad Hatter, and all the other funny people Alice met in her adventures. Here is part of a letter to a girl friend:

"My dear Jessie,—I liked your letter better than anything I have had for some time. I may as well just tell you a few of the things I like, and then, whenever you want to give me a birthday present, (my birthday comes once every seven years, on the fifth Tuesday in April), you will know what to give me. Well, I like, very much indeed, a little mustard with a bit of beef spread thinly under it; and I like brown sugar—only it should have some apple pudding mixed with it to keep it from being too sweet; but perhaps what I like best of all is salt, with some soup poured over it. The use of the soup is to hinder the salt from being too dry; and it helps to melt it. Then there are other things I like; for instance, pins—only they should always have a cushion put round them to keep them warm. And I like two or three handfuls of hair—only they should always have a little girl's head beneath them to grow on, or else whenever you open the door they get blown all over the room, and then they get lost, you know. Tell Sally it's all very well to say she can do the two thieves and the five apples, but can she do the fox and the goose and the bag of corn that the man was bringing from market, and he had to get them over the river, and the boat was so tiny he could only take one across at a time; and he couldn't ever leave the fox and the goose together, for then the fox would eat the goose; and if he left the goose and the corn together, the goose would eat the corn. So the only things he could leave safely together were the fox and the corn, for you never see a fox eating corn, and you hardly ever see corn eating a fox. Ask her if she can do that puzzle.

"I think I'll come and see you again—suppose we say once every two years; and in about ten years I really think we shall be good friends. Don't you think we shall? I shall be very glad to hear from you whenever you feel inclined to write, and from Sally too, if she likes to try her hand at writing. If she can't write with her hand, let her try with her foot. Neat foot-writing is a very good thing. Give my love to her and Kate and Harry, only mind you keep a little for yourself.

"Your affectionate friend,

"LEWIS CARROLL."

Delia laughed till the tears ran down her cheeks at the good old gentleman's queer fancies, but suddenly stopped and said:

"What a pity he remained an old bachelor! Why, he was a magnificent father spoilt. A man who could tell such stories and write such letters to have no children of his own—why, it's just tragic."

"But may it not be that if he had had children of his own, he would have kept his stories for them? The beautiful thing about Lewis Carroll seems to me that he found channels for his suppressed father-love in a succession of children who drew out the best that was in him, and were the better for his disinterested affection. There are hateful old bachelors and old maids who love nobody but themselves, but, thank God, many a bachelor uncle and maiden aunt is the good fairy of nephews and nieces, to whom they are second fathers and mothers. God does not allow the treasures of affection to be wasted because there are some who, for various reasons, do not enter into the marriage state."

"Well, that may be true," said Delia, "of some, but it's fortunate for you that you are not an old bachelor. A poor creature you would be, stranded among your books, as helpless as a child. Why, without someone to keep constant watch on you, you would forget to eat, and let your things wear out, as you let them get dusty enough now, goodness knows!"

With this truly feminine "strategic movement to the rear," Delia went off, carrying Lewis Carroll with her, to read after the children were put to bed.

LIBRARIUS.

£50,000.

By J. DODD JACKSON.

THAT morning The Sentinel was decidedly dull—a murder in Essex, a column about the machinery at the Battersby Exhibition, a speech by the county member to his constituents. I don't read murders. I hate machinery. The county member is Morpheus revived. The sun was shining brightly, the birds singing roundelays to the queen of May. I could hear the mystic music of the rippling river. I will confess to being a child of impulse, and, presto!—The Sentinel was blocking the waste-paper basket, and I was lifting the latch to step into the garden.

Mrs. Midgley! Yes, Mrs. Midgley just extending her hand to grasp the knocker. There on the threshold she stood erect as a pine-tree—black bonnet, grey shawl, fastened by the familiar brooch from which looked the smiling presentment of the departed Midgley, white apron, black merino skirt, clogs, with toes upturned and pointed—the tout ensemble of a dozen years of striving widowhood. Mrs. Midgley has a square lower jaw, a Wellington nose, thin firm lips, eyes that look straight at you, and can snap little sparks as well as any flint and steel your grandfather ever had. You don't know Mrs. Midgley; I do. But for once I parleyed.

"Hem! I—ah, was just going out, Mrs. Midgley. Will you see 'the missus'?"

"Quoth Mrs. M., 'Going out? Then I'll walk with you. It's you I want to see.'"

At once I surrendered, murmured a suggestion that my business might wait, and invited the lady to come in. She came in. I have a nephew in the Horse-guards; he comes in in much the same way.

Mrs. Midgley is never very ceremonious. That morning she was even less so than usual, and, without waiting for an invitation, sat down on the chair I use, smoothed out her apron, unfastened her shawl, and put her feet upon the fender. Now let me again confess. I am a creature of habit, and it is my habit to sit on that chair. Out of that chair, when the place of council is my own house, I am nothing. I have ideas about chairs. I knew a man who could never preach without his fingers could touch, from time to time, a particular seal on his watch-chain. Some one stole it, and until a facsimile was provided, people talked of his approaching superannuation. As for me, I grasp the arms of my chair, and am "Sir Oracle." Mrs. Midgley had appropriated my citadel, and had me at a disadvantage. Perched on the edge of a small "hair-seated," I waited for her to begin.

Her first question showed the serious nature of her mission.

"Do you know anything, Mr. Brown, of breach o' promises?"

I confessed I did not know a great deal about the subject, and ventured to hope that it had not come to that with Mrs. Midgley. I even made a small joke.

But Mrs. Midgley was in no humour for joking. "Me, indeed!" she retorted, and I distinctly saw the sparks aforesaid. "Me start a breach o' promise! Do you think as I'd go round with this 'ere portrait o' Midgley on my busom? Do you think as I'd carry this 'ere lock o' hair (turning the brooch round) if I thought o' such a thing as taking another partner? Not but what I've had my chance as many a woman 'ud ha' jumped at. No, it ain't for myself as I'm asking. Did you ever hear of a breach o' promise being brought by a man?"

I had heard of one such case, and told her of it. It occurred in Ireland, and the result—verdict, one farthing—was not encouraging.

"Of course," I added, "it would depend on circumstances, and especially on the ability of the defendant to pay damages."

Mrs. Midgley was silent for a few moments, and then ejaculated, "It's Jacob!"

"Jacob!" I replied. "Impossible! Why, I am to perform the ceremony for him a week to-morrow." Jacob is Mrs. Midgley's son, "eldest o' nine," she always says, and Jacob is as decent a fellow as you'll find in the parish.

"Yes," she persisted, "it's Jacob!"

Then Mrs. Midgley drew out a copy of The Sentinel. It was a week old, and I, having been from home, had not seen this particular issue.

"Read this," said she, pointing with a strong and bony finger to a short paragraph. "Read this first, and then this 'ere letter."

The paragraph ran as follows:—

"WINDFALL FOR A COACHMAN."

"By the death of a relative in Australia, Mr. William Morris, of Riversley, falls unexpectedly into a fortune of £50,000. Mr. Morris, we need hardly say, is the respected coachman of Colonel Westover, of Riversley Hall, and is much and deservedly esteemed in Riversley. His wife is a daughter of the late Thomas Cordley, who was for many years in the service of the Westover family. Miss Morris, their only child, has carried on for some years a millinery business in Riversley. We presume that, having thus suddenly become a considerable heiress, Miss Morris will throw away needles and feathers, while, of course, her father will lay aside the ribbons. We congratulate Mr. Morris, and his wife and daughter, on their good fortune."

So ran the paragraph, and I was meditating upon it, and especially, perhaps, upon the information that Bill Morris, who half lived at "The Horse and Hounds," was much and deservedly esteemed in Riversley, when Mrs. Midgley thrust the letter into my hands. I read as follows:—

"The Lodge,
"Riversley Hall,
"Tewsdays."

"DEER MISTER MIDGLEY,

"I hope you are well, as this leeves me at present. I rite to say as father and mother thinks as we had better not get marrid. You see, I must look higher up now as I am a hairass. I send you back the fotttygraf and the lady's companion, also the dreem-book as you give me. You need not trouble about the neck-tie as I give you, I expect it is all wore out. Hopping you will be 'appy,

"Yours truly,
"MARY MORRIS."

To say that this letter was a surprise to me was to use language altogether too weak for the occasion. Again and again I went over the epistle, Mrs. Midgley watching as I did so, and growing redder in the face the while.

To gain time, I inquired, "Did Jacob send you here?"

"No, not he!" was the answer. "He don't know as I knows o' this. You see, I hears from Mrs. Martin—her as lives next door—about this 'ere money, and then I gets the paper—precious few papers as I sees!—and when Jacob comes home, I says, 'Fine lad you are,' says I, 'not to tell your old mother the news!' Well, he has nothing to say, only looks solemn like, and eats no dinner—rabbit-pie, too, as he's so fond of. Next morning he only pingles on with his food, and same at dinner—an' him so hearty—never a word for anybody. Then I finds this 'ere letter in his Sunday-coat. No, he never sent me; but I means to advise him. He's my son, Mr. Brown, eldest o' nine, and all childer when William Midgley died, and I means to say, 'Bring a' action, Jacob,' and if it costs me my last penny, a' action he shall bring." And without waiting to say or hear another word, Mrs. Midgley, to my great relief, flounced out of the room, and banging the door in a fine frenzy of maternal feeling, disappeared.

Half an hour later, walking along Lark Lane, whom should I meet but Jacob himself! Young Midgley drove a cart for Turnbull, the Riversley miller, and was trudging along by the side of old Betty, who travelled as if one day were a thousand years. Jacob's hands were in his pockets, and Jacob's white billycock was hung over his eyes, and Jacob's eyes were bent upon the ground. He started at my salute, and admitted that it was a fine morning, as if he was not sure of anything on earth.

"Well, what about the wedding, Jacob?" said I.

"Hoff!" said he.

"Off!" I answered. It was better, I judged, to keep Mrs. Midgley's confidences in the background.

"Hoff!" said Jacob again. "Fact is, there ain't going to be no wedding. Fine talk there'll be in Riversley, and me a local preacher and s'ciety steward, too! Ain't you heerd, Mr. Brown, o' this 'ere fortun', and as Mary—Miss Morris—I means, has got to be a hairass? 'Course, with fifty thousand pound she can't look at a miller's man. Mister, if it's a fair question, was you ever crossed?"

"Crossed?" I said.

"Yes, crossed in love, Mr. Brown; disappointed in the object o' your affections, sir."

I owned to sundry passing tribulations in long past years, and said that after all there were as good fish in the sea as ever came out.

Jacob stood silent for a while. He was meditating, it seemed, on the wisdom of telling me the whole story, but rural caution prevailed, and his next word therefore was to his steed. "Gee whoa!" he shouted, and Betty's flank received a blow that made her start at express speed, and shake her harness until it jingled like a belfry in an earthquake.

But Jacob had not yet said his say, and a moment afterwards Betty's career was brought to a halt, and again the s'ciety steward was at my side.

"Mr. Brown," said he, "I want to say as it ain't goin' to make no difference."

"No difference?" I questioned, wondering at his meaning. "No difference," he explained, "at the chapel. I'm steward, and I ain't agoin' to resign for all the young women in Riversley, and I ain't coming 'off' the plan neither! 'Cause why? 'Cause I've done what's right, Mr. Brown. I won't say, sir, as it ain't hardish to bear—you know that, sir, having gone through it—and I won't say as I won't change my subject next Sunday night. I was going to preach on 'Mary has chosen the better part,' sir, and I'll give 'em 'Zaccheus' instead. But if she breaks my heart, Mr. Brown, she shan't ruin my immortal soul! Gee up, Betty!"

"WHOM SHOULD I MEET BUT JACOB HIMSELF!"

There were tears on his ruddy cheeks, and my heart went out to him for a brave man. I hardly know now what I said or did, but I think I took hold of his great rough hand, and told him he was a brick, and that God would pull him through. I think I said too, that I was sorry for him, and would remember him in speaking silently to a great Friend of mine and his, who asked us to cast our care upon Him! I think that was just about what passed, but I've an idea that sometimes emotion plays tricks with memory.

Well, surely that was to be a day of coincidences, for Jacob Midgley's cart had hardly disappeared round a distant corner when Bill Morris came along. At first I hardly knew him. He was dressed in broadcloth, wore collar and cuffs, and sported a huge watch-chain. But alas! there was the same redness of face, and the same unsteadiness of gait that were so familiar in the "esteemed coachman of Colonel Westover." Said I to myself, "That £50,000 will take ten years off Morris' life, and the last chance of heaven from Morris' soul." Said I to the man himself, "Good morning, William."

"Mr. Morris," he replied, "if you'll excuse me, Brown."

It is bad policy to quarrel with a drunken man, especially if he be bigger than you, and I good-humouredly begged his pardon, and inquired after the Colonel, who had been ill.

"The Kernel," he answered, "I hear is some better. But the truth is, I ain't his man any more. I ain't anybody's man. Look herē, sir, Riversley's looked down on Bill Morris, and Bill Morris' wife, and Bill Morris' daughter. But now, sir, I'm Mr. Morris, and the wife is Mrs. Morris, and the gal is Miss Morris, and Riversley's agoin' to look up, sir—up, I tell you!"

"Of course," I murmured in a conciliatory tone, and Mr. Morris continued, "Yes, Riversley's going to look up, sir. There ain't many fifty thousanders about here, I reckon! Why, blest if I couldn't buy up the Kernel. Fancy my daughter marrying Jake Midgley!"

"Coming off next week, isn't it?" I said gently.

"Coming off next week—no, it ain't," snarled the man. "'Mary,' says I and the old woman, 'Mary, you give him up or not a ha'p'ny.' Would you believe it, sir, the hussy, she cried and carried on like a babby. But she knew better nor stick up. She's gin him up. It's hoff, Mr. Brown."

Then, gentle reader, I said, "Good morning." I had heard what I wanted, and certain previous suspicions were more than confirmed. Over the dinner-table I told Mrs. Brown that Mary Morris should marry Jacob Midgley in spite of all the fathers and mothers and fortunes in the world.

Thus it came to pass that the wife and I conspired together, and the first result thereof was that half-an-hour later I dropped in upon Mrs. Midgley, and after talking like a Philadelphia lawyer for a full hour, managed to persuade her to hold her maternal tongue and wait a little. Mrs. Brown meanwhile waylaid Miss Morris, and inveigled her into promising to drink tea at the manse that very afternoon. And in all this and what followed, we claim justification. Here was Jacob, as honest, kindly, and simple-hearted a fellow as the county has bred. Here was Mary Morris, a bonny, good-hearted, pious village lass. Why, she was made for him and he for her. Criticise if you like, and talk as you will about coming between father and daughter. Our consciences are quite comfortable on the matter. Mary Morris was over twenty-one, and coming between parent and child is justifiable when it is also coming between a young life and a long misfortune.

So Miss Morris came to tea, and on the shoulder of Mrs. Brown—estimable woman!—wept out the whole story. She loved Jacob, and could never! never! never! love anyone else, and it broke her heart to give him up, and she wished the money was at the bottom of the sea, or anywhere else. She hadn't been happy five minutes since they had heard the news. Her father had almost lived at "The Horse and Hounds," and her mother had done nothing but talk about the bonnets and dresses, the silks and satins and diamonds she was going to wear. She had told her she must leave the chapel, and go to St. Wilfred's, and curiously enough, the vicar and his two curates had just found them out and called, one or more of them, nearly every day, and her mother had promised she should go into the church choir and teach in the church Sunday school. She wished, almost, she was dead. As she talked she cried, and Mrs. B. cried too. We had a daughter of our own once. Ah me! she has been in heaven these twenty years!

Now Amelia Betsy Brown is a quiet woman, and could no more preach a sermon or "take a chair," or exhort a mothers' meeting than a baby. But, taking you into confidence, reader, when once Mrs. Brown makes up her mind to carry a point, I, who speak from experience, without hesitation assert that she will do it or perish. This being the character of Mrs. Brown, I left poor Mary in her hands, absolutely certain as to the result, and looking into the kitchen half an hour afterwards, found that the expected had come to pass. Miss Morris had been brought to the sticking point. There was a light in her erstwhile tearful eye, and on her face where fear had ruled, resolution, newly-enthroned, reigned supreme. Money or no money, she was going to "make it up" with Jacob.

Now there must be a Providence or else how came it to pass that Jacob Midgley should come sauntering by as I stood at the door a moment or two later, watching the shadows of the poplars draw longer to the east? "Jacob," I called, "I want to see you about a lovefeast." A minute and Jacob's big form passed through our humble door, another minute and Jacob was alone with Mary in the kitchen, while Mrs. Brown and I discussed possibilities in the garden. An hour elapsed, and then after a double knock at the kitchen-door, for you need to be careful in matters of this kind, we appeared upon the scene. Jacob was examining a geranium on the window-sill as though he had never seen a geranium before, and Mary was sitting looking into the fire. I could see that her cheeks were red, and that her eyes were bright. She had a parcel on her knee. From its size and shape I judged that it contained a "dream-book" and a "lady's companion," also a photograph, and I concluded that for some inscrutable reason, Mr. Midgley had been carrying these articles concealed in one of the ample pockets of the velveteen jacket that swathed the upper part of his manly person.

Of course it had all come out right, and in the sanctum sanctorum to which I gently withdrew him, Jacob gave my hand a grip, and with a laugh that had a tear in it, remarked, "It ain't haff now, Mr. Brown, it's hon." Mrs. B. told me that Mary in the kitchen had another good cry with laughter intermingled, and called her "a dear, kind, good old thing" a dozen times.

Then in a council of all parties we arranged details. We felt that we could safely adhere to the date and place formerly fixed for the ceremony, as everybody by this time was fully believing that no wedding was to take place, and we would not undeceive them. Jacob was to go to work as usual that day, and drive his cart past Mr. Morris' dwelling two or three times in the course of the morning. Mary was, of course, to say nothing at home on the subject, and to try not to look too cheerful. In the afternoon Jacob was to drive up the chapel road and drop into the building quite accidentally, and Mary was somehow or other to turn in about the same time by the backway. I undertook to arrange with Dollums, the registrar, and Mrs. Brown and the chapel-keeper would be on the scene to act as witnesses. We apprehended no interference from Mr. Morris, who would certainly at that hour be in his glory at "The Horse and Hounds," and as the chapel stood well outside the village, we anticipated no trouble from prying villagers. After the ceremony, the bridegroom was to take home his horses, and in the evening Mr. and Mrs. Midgley were to meet at Enderby station, a couple of miles away, and go off for a week's honeymoon, which Jacob, having saved a little money, could attempt without fear. In the meantime, it was hoped things would work right at home. Such was the plan, and as we discussed it, poor Mary suffered from many a flutter. But flutter or no flutter, fortune or no fortune, she had made up her mind.

Well, as luck would have it, the day of the wedding was a day of teeming rain, for which I for one thanked old Pluvius, as the less would be the danger of prying eyes. Looking out of the window in the morning I saw Jacob pass, and noted how the water ran off the white billycock into a flour sack bound round his shoulders, and how the sides of old Betty steamed in the abundant shower. In the afternoon it positively poured, and hardly a soul was to be seen abroad in Riversley. Mackintoshed and legged, I made my way to Salem. Under my umbrella, and holding up her skirts—for she would put on her black silk to grace the occasion—Mrs. Brown, by another route, also made her way. Mrs. Mills, the care-taker, was sorely puzzled over our successive appearances on such a day, more so by Mary's, more so still when Jacob stopped his cart in the road, and came in dripping like a Neptune by the vestry-door. Old Dollums was five minutes late, but explained that he had seen Mr. Morris standing in the doorway of his usual resort, and to avoid suspicion, had turned from the main path in a direction that involved a circuitous approach. Then I read the service, and Jacob put on the ring, and I'm bound to say that if the bride wore no orange blossoms, there were blushes enough to furnish out a fashionable ceremonial in St. George's, Hanover Square, and if the bridegroom was attired in a floury coat, he, nevertheless, looked every inch a man, and gave the bride such a kiss as, from honest lips, any duchess might have been proud to receive.

Then the register was signed and Mrs. Mills, delighted to write her name, pledged herself to secrecy for twenty-four hours. With another salute to Mrs. Midgley, who was now trembling at the thought of what she had done, Jacob disappeared through the doorway, and we heard him shouting, "Gee up, Betty!" on the road outside. Then Mary, Mrs. B. and I went out by the school-room door, and took to the path across the fields. As we passed the threshold the sun burst out, and a throstle in old Mills' garden broke forth into a grand burst of splendid song. "Happy is the bride that the sun shines on," I said, and Mrs. Midgley smiled again.

In the evening as we were leaving to escort Mrs. Midgley to the station, Mrs. Brown suggested that, as I was for a day or two unplanned, we might go over to see her sister at Ringwood. "It might save trouble with Morris," she suggested, and as I hate a scene, we left by the same train as Jacob and his bride, as, up to the Junction, our ways lay together. Four days later, with some fear and trembling, Mrs. B. and I again walked up Riversley Street. As we passed the cottage of Mrs. Midgley the elder, that lady came out by the rose-clad porch to greet us. She wore a black cap with white lace and jet beading thereon. She had on a smart gown of new cashmere and a black silk apron with a crewel-work sunflower in the centre. "They're coming home to-night," she said. "Have you heard the news?"

"What news?" we asked in a breath.

"Why, Morris ain't a-gettin' the fortun' after all. Seems as a nearer relation has stepped in, and I, for one, ain't sorry. Fancy Bill Morris with fifty thousand pound, and fancy our Jacob with fifty thousand pound! Why, he'd ha' been miserable, he would. Come an' look at their house over the way."

We went. It was a dainty cottage, with shining furniture and dimity curtains to the diamond-paned windows, and a clematis growing up to the very eaves. "This'll suit Jacob better 'n a mansion, and Mary too," observed Mrs. M. I agreed with her. I said she was a wise woman. I asked her if the action had been entered yet.

That night they came home, and we went down to supper. Mr. Morris was there, and Mrs. Morris, and both of them looked as if sense was coming on the heels of disappointment. "Here's to the young couple!" I exclaimed over a glass of lemonade.

"Hear, hear!" responded Morris.

"God bless 'em," said Mrs. Midgley senior.

"Amen!" said Jacob.

And this is not quite the end of the story. The loss of the money, or rather of the immediate prospect of it, for I could not find that he had handled more than a small advance from the lawyers—the loss of the prospect, I say, was the best thing that ever happened to Bill Morris. It made a man of him, saved him from a drunkard's grave, and started him on a path of reform that did bring about a verification of the prophecy about Riversley's looking up to him and his. And the "nearer relation" turned out a good sort after all, and as some compensation for blighted hopes, settled a sum on Mr. Morris that brought him in a hundred a year for life. When at last he came to die, being predeceased by Mrs. Morris, it was found that a large portion of this annuity had been saved, and as this accumulation, and the continuation of the yearly hundred came to Mary, Jacob was able to start a mill of his own. Industry, temperance, and religion have flourished in their home, and they are well-to-do and happy people in Riversley to-day.

Religious Uniformity : A Broken-down Theory.

O commence this article by defining the word Uniformity might seem a needless task. But it may not be entirely so, simply as a reminder of its precise limits in our various applications of it. A division of the word into Uni-formity will show that its etymological meaning is oneness in form. Its application is to the outward and visible, whether in the method of growth of the hidden life, or its final expression. The various Acts of Uniformity afford examples of what a section would enforce upon all without distinction. While they have been repealed, they nevertheless fairly express the mind of many even in the present day. In looking into those Acts, we discover that they deal with both dogma and ritual, and the logical position to which they were committed was, that the Establishment as it stood, and as expressed by its articles and formularies, was to be accepted in its entirety by all. These articles and dogmas being deductions, inferences, and interpretations of a revelation in itself transcendently profound, a very great demand upon human credence is here obvious. This seems to be recognised by some of the ablest thinkers in the Anglican Church, for in their endeavours to make good its claims in an age characterised by much independence of thought and criticism, they have seen the necessity of invoking a supernatural element. Any claim to inerrancy in the logical processes of inference and deduction cannot fail to be regarded with suspicion. We have, therefore, the doctrine of the Catholic Church as the pillar and ground of the truth, and rendered such by a perpetual Incarnation within and limited by its own pale. Of course, the very existence of Nonconformity involves a denial of this modern theological idea, and we cannot notice it any further at present. But, dealing with Anglican assumptions in relation to the supposed obligatory nature of its dogma and ritual, they certainly imply a view of human nature which is very different from the reality. People must be strangely alike in mental and moral constitution and habit thus to assimilate what is provided for them. Even if it is contended that all such dogmas and articles are objectively true, it still remains a fact that the real acceptance of Gospel truth has a largely subjective basis. Even the Providential methods of inspiration and revelation do not ignore subjective conditions. Now, for everyone to accept in any real sense such a complexity of dogma and ritual implies sameness of mental and moral outfit on the one hand, and complete identity of experience on the other. The actual constitution of human nature, however, is contrary to the former, and renders the latter impossible. Thus, what becomes the possession of one is not invariably that of another. There is, virtually, no truth to the individual except what he has assimilated. This, and the fact that the personal acceptance of Christ and honest following where He leads, are marks of the true Christian, it results that the failure to apprehend this absolute truth may arise from causes which cannot possibly un-Christianise a person, and can only un-Church him in the narrowest sectarian sense.

In the realms to which we should naturally turn for analogical suggestion and guidance we may find them in abundance, but they are radically opposed to the theory of Uniformity. If there be oneness anywhere in nature, it must be in the central element or elements of life itself, and not in external form, for we appear to approach simplicity the further we carry our investigations inward. There is an inner region, however, which still belongs to the things unknown, however rational certain presumptions may be. It is almost unnecessary, too, to point out how varied are the forms of life intermediate between the vegetable and the spiritual. Animal and intellectual life comprises the individual, the class, and the race. The underlying life, whatever it may be, evolves along these multitudinous lines. Now, the actual facts of the religious life agree with all this. To notice one or two of these facts only, it is to be observed that here, too, oneness appears to be approached as we carry our search inwards, but here, again, we arrive at a point where investigation is baffled. Before leaving this part of the subject, it may be needful to remark, in order to a fair application of the principles of analogy, that the spiritual is a distinct realm, equally wide, at least, with those from which these suggestions are drawn. Hence, to take an oak, or any other species of vegetation, as the basis of a complete analogy of it, would be a mistake. A more correct method would be to consider the individuals and classes in the one realm as representing the same in the other, while the whole realms with their endless varieties would also correspond. It will thus be seen that it is altogether a different thing for the deepest religious consciousness to be always the same, and for any human minds to construct a liturgy and forms quite adequate to its varied manifestations, or to give that life appropriate expression in every case.

Further, it is the life itself which is destructive of Uniformity. You may chip a lifeless block into what form you choose, and there will be nothing to offer resistance. Superstition, formalism, and the religiosity which is only concerned with externals, afford the ground upon which the theory is, in a measure, workable. But even in such systems as Romanism and Mohammedanism, the spiritual and intellectual vigour which sometimes lie dormant in them begin to produce divergences as soon as they assert themselves. It may be needful to correct a popular idea on this subject by stating that the heavenly unity which so many persons attribute to these persuasions does not exist in reality. To say nothing of Romanism, what is often regarded as the cast-iron and formal system of Mohammedanism numbers, according to Moslems themselves, no less than seventy-three sects, which have arisen through the exercise of devout thought, and the endeavour to make the Prophet's utterances agree with certain moral convictions. Similarly, the existence of Nonconformity is a sign of life, rather than of death.

It is specially significant that attempts to enforce uniformity have not merely failed, but have established the variety they sought to crush. Only that variety has been rendered far less attractive than it might otherwise have been. The Acts of Uniformity gave impulse to tyranny and persecution, with the inevitable result of recrimination and hatred. Differences became exaggerated, narrowness and intolerance increased. The Russian Empire furnishes another and more modern illustration of the utter failure of force in such matters. The late Emperor said that if the generation then existing were compelled to conform, their children would do so from the love of it. There is not the slightest likelihood of his prophecy being fulfilled, for if he could rise from the dead, his soul would be afflicted at the numberless sects springing up, and the absolute impossibility of crushing them without utter extermination.

I suppose we must regard the existence of the Broad Church as an evidence of its recognition, in a measure, of the truth here contended for. But its very effort to broaden the provision of the Church, as long as the idea is to formulate a liturgy comprehensive enough to meet the wants of all, has little chance of success. Life will not bear cramping. The method also tends to laxity. Deep piety needs strong meat, but the catering method provides an insipid mixture which is of little use to anyone. The growth of a distinct type of life through absence of intermixture is not such an evil as many suppose. It grows, like the different kinds of vegetation, through the assimilation of its special nutriment, while it may foster the deeper unity of the Spirit. It may be contended that a communion could be established on the broad basis of the sacraments, but while these lend themselves to varying interpretations, and especially while they are made integral parts of an ecclesiastical system, schools of religious thought and sectional types of religious character will inevitably result, which would hardly be an improvement on the present state of things. For if oneness is essential anywhere, it is in the region which lies at the back of these forms, which are the most external of all things pertaining to religion.

Some anticipate that a chief characteristic of the Golden Age to come will be a synthesis of religious thought and observance on a world-wide scale. There can be no permanently successful arrangement, however, which does not allow for the free and unfettered growth of the individual life. Belief must be allowed to clothe itself in appropriate forms, instead of ready-made and often ill-fitting garments. There must be a total surrender of the methods which have been so subversive of manly independence and honesty, and productive of Jesuitical equivocation. Communion, in its deepest sense, is our watchword for the future. Uniformity is contrary to any true religious philosophy, and stands condemned by its own utter failure in history.

Connexional Biography.

REV. GEORGE WARNER.

REV. GEORGE WARNER, long known throughout our Connexion as "a burning and shining light," was born November 8, 1829, at Holt Farm, Southam, Warwickshire. He was converted to God in a small Wesleyan Chapel near Worcester, in the year 1848, and for a short time was a member of that community. When he returned to his home in Warwickshire he united in church fellowship with our people at Napton in the Leamington Circuit. The superintendent minister soon had him on the plan as a local preacher, and in the year 1851 he was called into the ministry by the Banbury Circuit. Mr. Warner subsequently travelled on the following stations:—Banbury, Malmesbury Branch of the Brinkworth Circuit, Marlboro' Branch of the Newbury Circuit, Sturminster, Newton Branch of the Motcombe Circuit, Banbury (second time), Belfast, Exeter, Kingston-on-Thames; then for twelve years he was employed as Connexional Evangelist, at the end of which period he was stationed at Ryde and Ventnor. On this latter station he lost his wife, whom he had married in 1855, and he, being in failing health, took a voyage to Australia and New Zealand. Here he was married to the widow who now mourns his loss. On his return to England he was stationed at Teignmouth, but in the year 1891 he was compelled through illness to seek superannuation. But superannuation did not in his case spell retirement from work altogether. If he could not do full work, he must do some, and during the eight years which still remained to him he laboured with great acceptance as special agent at Nottingham, Bristol, Barnoldswick, and, lastly, at Settle, where, when the Master's call came, he was seeking not without a measure of success to resuscitate our cause, which for many years has languished in this ancient town. Of our brother's life-work we have not space to write at length. He himself was wont to speak of the term he served as Connexional Evangelist as the most useful period of his life ("for about fourteen years I held generally from twelve to twenty services a week, and I expect a glorious harvest from that sowing"), and such perhaps it was. At the same time, the years before and also after this were years of fruitful and never-grudging service.

The Rev. I. E. Page writes:—"He was a typical Primitive Methodist, a fervid, happy saint, with glory in his soul. He had a passion for saving men, and for leading believers into Christ's full salvation, and God used him to save many—Gipsy Smith among others. God raise up in all the Methodist Churches men of Brother Warner's stamp, men of one all-consuming purpose, men who know the art of leading men into salvation."

Of Brother Warner's life-long advocacy of the primal doctrine of Methodism, "Entire Sanctification by Faith," many are aware, and in this connection it is pathetic to observe that the last manuscript he ever penned (it is left unfinished) was on that subject so dear to his heart, viz., "The Genesis of Holiness." Our departed brother was not only a religious man, but a man to whom religion was everything, and of him it may be truly said he felt in the full tide of life what the average Christian only feels on his knees or on his deathbed. He was pre-eminently a man of prayer, and we have heard him say how, when Sir Henry Thompson was about to administer chloroform for the operation he underwent years ago, he said, "Why, what is the matter with your knees? I never saw knees like yours." The answer was, "If you had read your Bible through and through, and spent nights in prayer as I have, your knees would show it." And now this man of God is numbered with the saints who see their Master "face to face." Contracting a cold in the early part of the year, he still clung to his work with characteristic zeal, but was at length laid prostrate by the malady from which he had suffered for some years. His last days were in keeping with the whole of his Christian life—bright, trustful, and wholly surrendered to the will of God. His faith remained unclouded to the last, and those who saw him through these latter days will not readily forget the radiance of his countenance as he joined in singing the hymns which had so often cheered his earthly pilgrimage, nor his fervid responses to our offered prayers. His sufferings were at times great, but no murmur escaped him. He waited for his Master's coming, and all was ready when at length, on April 14th he heard the call. His remains were laid to rest in the churchyard at Settle on the following Monday. A previous service held in our own chapel, which had been decorated with ivy and flowers, was conducted by the writer, and was bright and impressive throughout. The following ministers took part:—Revs. W. E. Quicke (Wesleyan), J. Goldthorpe

(representative of the Association for the Promotion of Scriptural Holiness), J. T. Barkby (Nelson Circuit), W. Sawyer, J. Swales, B. Senior (representative from Bradford and Halifax District Missionary Committee). Mr. R. Humphries (Bradford) also gave a brief address. At the grave-side we sang "All hail the power of Jesu's name." The writer again read the service, while the Revs. T. F. Brown (Congregationalist) and J. Goldthorpe offered prayer. So we laid to rest the remains of one whose memory will be always blessed, and not least so in the town where the last few months of his brave, heroic ministry were spent. We thank God for his holy, consecrated life. We had hoped to keep him with us a little longer, but God has taken him to the higher service of the upper sanctuary. We rest in hope of a re-union by-and-by, and meanwhile sing

"Servant of God, well done!
Praise be thy new employ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Master's joy."

ERNEST WARBURTON.

MR. GRICE ETHELL.

THE subject of this sketch was born at West Sutton, near Malton, on Oct. 25, 1836, and died on August 13, 1897, in his sixty-first year.

While he was quite young he removed with his parents to Glass Houghton, near Castleford, and with this place are associated his earliest recollections. Our late Brother had the unspeakable advantage of a pious mother, and to her prayers, instructions, and example, were due much of his quiet and humble piety and unostentatious Christian character. When but a child he was sent to our Glass Houghton Sunday School, and happily, the seed already sown in his heart by his mother, quickly came to fruit, the result being seen in his conversion to God, at the age of fourteen years. Like many others, however, who early rise into the sunlight of the Divine presence, he soon lapsed into darkness and sin. The impressions, nevertheless, of home and Sunday School life still survived, and as in so many other cases, produced eventually, in later years, a more abiding decision for Christ. This latter event took place in 1856 in his twentieth year. He had never strayed into paths of open and wilful sin, but he knew that he was a sinner, and so at some special revival services held in the United Methodist Free Church in Powell Street, Castleford, he once more gave himself fully and immediately to Christ, and joined our Society in the town which now meets in Bradley Street. He very soon gave full proof of his Christian profession, and in Sunday School, in the choir, and in Church work generally, he found ample scope for zealous and active service. After several years spent in useful work at Bradley Street, he was requested by the Leaders' Meeting to open his cottage in Beancroft Road for preaching services. The result was that he soon gathered a society and congregation, which grew and multiplied under his diligent and fostering care, and before long a larger place was needed. A temporary building was found in Temple Street, and to this place the Society migrated. In course of time the friends occupied a loft in connection with a joiner's shop in the same street. These were days of Pentecostal blessing, and the memory of the precious seasons which were enjoyed in what is yet called by old members the "Upper Room," is still green.

In 1878, the present chapel in Temple Street was erected, and Brother Ethell, besides becoming a leading trustee, was also made leader of the society class and superintendent of the Sunday School. In 1879 he removed to London, where he remained for nine years, but he maintained unbroken his membership at Temple Street. In 1888, returning to Castleford, he took up his old work in Temple Street again, and only relinquished it at his decease. In 1892 he had an accident while following his employment at the glass works, which deprived him of the sight of one of his eyes, and otherwise considerably impaired his health. Still, he diligently, though often with much weakness, continued to attend to his duties as leader and trustee.

Brother Ethell was a man of retiring habits, and whilst he never shrank from work, he preferred at all times to do it in the shade, rather than in the publicity which is seen of men. He was a true example of the "faithful servant" to whom the Master gives unstinted acknowledgment and a hearty "Well done!" His last illness, though brief, was extremely painful, but he passed through it without murmuring, and with exemplary Christian patience. We lingered near him, and held his hand during his last battle with death. He did not fear its victory, but looked beyond it with humble confidence and hope. His interment took place in the Castleford Cemetery on August 16, and some of the oldest inhabitants regard it as the largest funeral in the town during their time for a workman. The Aire and Calder, and two Primitive Methodist Brass Bands from Bradley Street and Temple Street, united and led the cortège to the strains of the "Dead March in Saul," and following these were the members of the Urban Council, with the town clerk, and immediately behind came the road labourers, employees of the Council, over whom the deceased held the position of foreman, accompanied by the surveyor. Thousands lined the streets through which the procession passed. As the mourners entered the chapel, Mr. S. Harrison played very effectively the Funeral March on the organ. The service was conducted by Rev. J. Jopling and Mr. H. Hide, assistant minister, the former giving a brief address. The scene at the cemetery, both for numbers and intensity of feeling, will not soon be forgotten. The funeral sermon was preached at Temple Street on Sunday evening, August 29, by the Rev. J. Jopling. Our brother leaves a widow, for whose guidance and support we would most earnestly pray.

There is no death ! what seems so is transition ;
This life of mortal breath

Is but a suburb of the life Elysian,
Whose portal we call death.

We will be patient, and assuage the feeling
We may not wholly stay ;
By silence sanctifying, not concealing,
The grief that must have way.

Studies of the Portrait of Christ. By the REV. GEORGE MATHESON, D.D. (6s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

As might have been expected from his previous works, Dr. Matheson has here given us a deeply devout and very suggestive book. "Studies of the Portrait of Christ" is more than a series of expositions or loosely-connected meditations on the Gospel narratives in their bearing on the character of Christ. It is a serious attempt to re-write the life of Christ; to trace His human development, and not less, to trace the development of His Kingdom by marking the steps He took in training the disciple-band—the "league of pity" as Dr. Matheson calls it—for its ultimately world-wide mission. It will be asked whether Dr. Matheson's attempt is a successful one. To a large extent it undoubtedly is. There is much that is original and true, and chastely beautiful in these "Studies," and, let us not forget to add, in the prayers, with one of which each study is gathered up and consecrated. The writer is, as we all know, a Mystic and poet, as well as theologian, and hence he makes us see what we never saw before. Were the several conclusions reached by Dr. Matheson to be stated in their tersest form, and to be prefixed to each study as a sort of thesis, we should in some cases be puzzled or doubtful. The thesis to be proved looks so much like a paradox. But Dr. Matheson's power is seen from the fact that, when we have reached the end of the study and its illuminative prayer, we feel, in a considerable number of these cases, that he has gone far in justifying his position—in making good his paradox. Not in all cases, however, are we convinced. Sometimes, as in what is said of the scene at the Samaritan well, and of the breaking of the bread to the multitude in the wilderness—which Dr. Matheson calls "The First Communion"—we have an uneasy feeling that more is read into the narrative than it will bear, and we remain unconvinced. Of course, in any attempt to trace the development of Christ's character and work much will depend upon the chronology of the events taken as marking the stages or transitions in such development. How far the order of events adopted by Dr. Matheson will stand the test of careful examination is a question that must be left to scholars to determine. All we need add now, is that, despite all abatements and criticisms, Dr. Matheson has given us a book that must be read again and again, and that cannot fail on each re-perusal to awaken fresh admiration and reverence for the Incomparable Figure of all history. Dr. Matheson holds out the hope that, if he meets with due encouragement, he will continue these "Studies." There can be no doubt as to the success of this work: that is already assured. So we shall, with as much patience as we can muster, await the second volume of "Studies of the Portrait of Christ."

The Four Gospels. By R. H. FISHER, B.D. (Little Books on Religion.) (1s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS book is valuable out of all proportion to its size or price. Perhaps the best way to show this will be to give some idea of its scope and contents.

False individualism is rebuked by the fact that we owe our knowledge of the facts of Christ's life to the co-ordinated reports of four. In regard to Matthew, though, as Renan says, "he wrote the most important book that has ever been written," yet he is the one who has least awakened the reverence and affection of the Church. Amongst the characteristics of Matthew may be named—the place he gives to preaching; the revelation he makes of our Lord's human nature; the relation in which he sets the Gospel to all that had gone before—in other words, the stress he lays on evolution. Incidentally Mr. Fisher expresses the opinion "that more has been learned in the Church about our Lord's human nature during the past thirty years than in all the previous centuries of the faith."

The influence of Mark has been very pervasive. In Venice his symbol looks out on the sea from its huge monolith. Our author thinks the Venetians must have found something congenial in Mark. At first, we do not find in his gospel the signs of that boldness and vigour which his symbol of the lion and his influence suggest. But later on we do find these signs, and especially in what Paul says of him and his association with Peter. He was drawn to Peter rather than to Paul, because he himself was energetic rather than thoughtful, daring and impulsive rather than deeply spiritual. He writes like an eye-witness. He shows us our Lord's career as an active rather than a contemplative life, and that miracle is a most precious part of revelation.

Luke was the "beloved physician," and evidences of this are not wanting in the Gospel that bears his name. We see in him the culture, the accurate observation, the interest taken in women and children and the poor, of the true physician. Above all the others, the Third Gospel may be called, "The Gospel of healing." An interesting excursus follows on the question, Why a doctor is so often a believer, and what there is in his professional life that helps to keep him near to faith.

St. John's is the intimate Gospel. The synop- tists may be guides in the struggles and business of life, bringing Christ before us as an example. In St. John, Christ is a presence. It is the Gospel of the communion-table. Of all the books in the Bible it is the one which most shows religion as Mysticism, and it is the most pervaded with the sacramental idea. His symbol, appropriately enough, is the eagle. Art depicts him as a youth. Love keeps the heart young. He was επισκοπος —the man who was close to the breast of Jesus.

O hearts of love, O souls that turn
Like sunflowers to the pure and best,
To you the truth is manifest,
For they the mind of Christ discern
Who lean, like John, upon His breast.

Said we not truly that this "little book on religion" is indeed worth having?

The Quiver for 1899. (7s. 6d.) Cassell and Co., Ludgate Hill, E.C.

To say that the present volume of the "Quiver" equals, if it does not even surpass, previous volumes is praise high enough for any magazine. There is nothing shoddy about the "Quiver." It is not only worth reading, but it is worth keeping for future reference. The illustrations are all that could be desired; the fiction is pure and bright, without sensationalism, while more serious articles bear such well-known names as those of the Bishop of Ripon, the Dean of Windsor, Dr. Hugh Macmillan, and many others too numerous to mention. The "Quiver" has always done much to further the cause of Christian philanthropy. The numerous interests which cluster round it, all go to prove what has often been said, that the "Quiver" is not only a magazine, but an institution. Each month a silver medal has been presented to the oldest Sunday School teacher in each county. While any deed of heroism which comes under the notice of the "Quiver" has also awarded a silver medal, and the doer enrolled among the list of "Quiver" heroes.

Who Will Win? A Story of the Crisis of To-day. By ZUINGLIUS, JUNIOR. Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS is a story which presents some unusual features. It is an octavo of some 379 pages, and though it runs to that length, and has a bewildering number of characters, there is no plot in it worth speaking of. The characters are chiefly occupied with talking, and their talking turns exclusively on the great "Church crisis" of to-day. In fact, the book represents very vividly the ferment which is going on within the pale of the Established Church, and might very appropriately have borne the title of "Yeast," which Kingsley gave to one of his novels. There is a little mild love-making, which is carried on quite on ecclesiastical lines, and ends properly, and a little colour is given by the villain of the piece, Father Montmorency, the Jesuit, "who plays many parts," and has the knack of turning up in most unlikely places. Now, he figures as a curate in charge, then as a supply in a Methodist pulpit(!); now he breaks stones on the road, and anon, we find him busy at an election, or acting as secretary to an Austrian statesman. There is also a female villain, who gives lectures to Girton girls, or takes situations in families that she may the more readily infect the minds of the young with her pernicious ideas. All the characters of the book have fine-sounding, aristocratic names. This villainess of the piece is no exception, for Miss Orbilliere is her name. We could have spared the episode of the Methodist local preacher and his sermon and verse on the Balm of Gilead: for it is lugged in a propos of nothing, and is rather vulgar withal. With this exception, we have enjoyed the volume, and can recommend it to others. Much can be learned from it, and it puts the arguments pro and con very fairly.

Unfamiliar Texts. By DINSDALE T. YOUNG. (3s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

MR. YOUNG has given us one of the freshest volumes of sermons we have seen for many a day. It is quite worthy to stand side by side with Henry Melvill's "Sermons on Certain of the Less Prominent Facts and References in Sacred Story." It is quite right that we should continually be hearing and reading sermons on the great texts of Scripture; but none the less, it is refreshing to be guided occasionally to unexpected stores of truth and comfort that are laid up for us in unfamiliar texts. Some of the titles of Mr. Young's sermons are striking, and are seen at once to be involved in the text and suggested by it: e.g., "The Duty of Praising People" is enforced from Paul's words to the Corinthians (1. xi. 2), "I praise you"; the theme of "Sceptical Questioning in Religion" rises out of another of Paul's sentences, "But some man will say how." There is a fine sermon, preached before the Wesleyan Missionary Society at City Road a few years ago, on "The Missionary Allegiance of Youth," based on the words: "Thou hast the dew of thy youth," (Ps. cx. 3).

Sermon Outlines. By REV. H. WOODCOCK. (3s.) Thomas Mitchell, Primitive Methodist Book Depot, 48-50, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

THESE seventy sermon outlines are clear, concise, and suggestive. The topics chosen are mainly out of the beaten track, and show marked originality and clearness of thought and design. It should prove a boon to lay preachers, who, immersed in the cares of business all day, have little time to expend in thought on the discourse they are expected to deliver on Sunday with all the grace of a finished orator. Not only the local preacher, but the busy pastor will also find this book a boon. It may suggest many a new train of thought which he may follow up and develop according to the bent of his mind. There are also many capital illustrations to each outline.

The Tabernacle and Its Priests and Services. Described and Considered in Relation to the Church. By WILLIAM BROWN. With numerous illustrations. Sixth edition, revised and enlarged. Edinburgh and London: Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier.

THE fact that this book has reached its sixth edition is evidence conclusive that it possesses solid merits which time makes only more apparent. In fact, it is the standard work on all that relates to the Tabernacle, and the thoroughness and soberness with which the subject is treated make it a model of what such works should be. The present edition is not a mere reprint. The work has been almost entirely re-written, and much fresh matter has been added. The many excellent illustrations supplied add value to the book and throw light on the text. We cordially recommend this most painstaking and valuable monograph.

The Romance of Evangelism. By REV. J. FLANAGAN. (1s. 6d.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE records of this evangelism read, indeed, like a romance—a romance coloured with the strong personality of the Evangelist who wrote it. Every evangelist, in his close contact with human nature, must necessarily come across many remarkable incidents and facts; but power is given to few to narrate the incidents in such a powerful manner that the reader feels that he also was an eye-witness of these things. Mr. Flanagan blends humour and pathos in that happy manner which is the special endowment of genius. Our only regret when reading the book was that it had not been issued from our own publishing house.

The Heavenly Bridegroom. By ROBERT THOMPSON. Elliot Stock and Co., 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

IN this long poem the relations which exist between Christ and His Church are described as those existing between a bride and bridegroom. It seems a pity that Mr. Thompson has not chosen another theme on which to expend his undoubted talents, for he has the true poetic gift. Of course, the author holds, as we think wrongly, that "In the heart of the Bible we find that exquisite nuptial ode (Solomon's Song) wherein the love betwixt Christ and His Church is expressed in terms borrowed from the language of conjugal affection." For ourselves, we confess we do not care for erotic religious poetry.

Strength and Beauty. By J. R. MILLER, D.D. (3s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

WELCOME is always given to another of Dr. Miller's cheerful and inspiring volumes, in their dainty covers, this time in blue and white. There is much in this volume that is stimulative. It aims not at making life easy for its readers, but to make them brave and strong enough ever to strive for the highest.

For Love's Sake. By MRS. CHARLOTTE SKINNER. (1s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

A BRIGHT little book on the greatest of all subjects—love, containing ten love-studies from the Book which above all others is the Handbook of love. Mrs. Skinner's heart must have been full of love to her Saviour and to her fellow-men to have treated the subject in such a tenderly sympathetic manner.

BOOKS FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

For these, Messrs. S. W. Partridge have well provided. Large books with bright-coloured pictorial backs, pictures on every page, with amusing little stories printed in large type, may be had for all prices.

Pussies and Puppies, with Louis Wain illustrations, (1s.) is especially comical and should afford amusement for a child for hours.

There is also—

Skipping Time. A strong book in prose and rhyme. (1s.)

Dapple and Dobbin's Picture-Book. (1s.)

Under the Oak Tree. Pictures and Stories for the Little Ones. (6d.) And Tibby's Tales. A Picture-Book for Little People. (6d.)

The Connexional Outlook.

BY PROXY.

THE WAR AND OUR ALI WAL NORTH MISSION.

—The war in South Africa, which is causing anxiety and sorrow in so many homes in the United Kingdom, has naturally created grave fears in the minds of Primitive Methodists for the safety of our missionaries in Aliwal North. At the time we write no news of misadventure has reached the Missionary Committee, and although nothing certain can be predicted, the authorities hope and believe that no disaster will happen to our agents. There is one circumstance that makes for their safety. In Aliwal North is a very large Boer population, many of them men of wealth and influence, and the bombardment of the place would necessarily involve much loss of Dutch life and property. The Boers are well aware of this fact, and will hesitate before they make any attack upon the place. Meanwhile we bespeak the prayers of our people in behalf of our South African missionaries, and also that this unhappy war may be brought to a speedy termination. At the best it is to be feared it will leave a great harvest of troubles for the nation as a whole, and for the Aliwal North Mission, evils that will require many years to remedy. Primitive Methodists have reason to be proud of the magnificent success realised on that station. The rate of progress has been both rapid and remarkably steady, but it will be strange indeed if the war does not bring a check to the progress that will stretch over a very long period. We can but leave the cause of God in His own hands in such circumstances, and trust that He may overrule even evil things for the accomplishment of good ends. Meanwhile, the last quarter's reports were of the encouraging kind which we have been accustomed to receive from Aliwal North. There had been some deaths, a few lapses, and many removals, but when all vacancies were filled up there remained a nett gain to the membership of thirty-seven for the quarter—a most admirable result.

THE HOME MISSIONS.

—The numerical state of the Home Missions, as reported to the last General Missionary Quarterly Committee, is not so satisfactory. Three stations reported increases amounting in the aggregate to ten; thirteen had a decrease amounting in all to forty-eight; and twenty-six were stationary. Those who follow the reports of the mission work in the Connexion with interest and care will not overlook the fact that these figures set forth the state of the stations at the end of the second summer quarter, the period when it is the most difficult to avoid a decrease. Still, when this has been taken account of, and allowance made for the special difficulties of the work in agricultural districts, perhaps a little more enthusiasm might produce different results. It is pleasing to note the activity in many stations where the conditions are not the most favourable for aggressive work. School building at Chelmsford, and chapel building at Aberavon, show that the churches are vigorous, if rather small. At Dover, where, of course, there is a town population, the Church is energetic, and it is expected, at no distant date, will have premises in which to carry on the work, of a useful and convenient character.

NEED OF AGGRESSIVE WORK.

—Quarter by quarter appeals are made to the Missionary Committee for financial help in connection with some needy work. Never in the history of the denomination were there so many open doors set before it, and, as a consequence, so much need for workmen and money in order to seize and make the best possible use of the occasions that are arising. The openings are mainly of two kinds. First of all there are the large centres of population, regarding which it is absolutely a certainty to say that the Connexion is not keeping pace with the extensions that are being made. The Missionary Secretary has published some remarkable figures. Among other matters, he calls attention to a letter Rev. R. S. Blair has sent to the newspapers, in which he states that the locality in which his church is situated in 1881 had a population of 10,000; in 1891, of 30,000; whilst to-day there are not fewer than 80,000 in that neighbourhood. A similar story could be told of most of the London suburbs, and to do our duty by that great world-city would require more money than the Missionary Committee has at its disposal for all purposes. Chapels are needed in ten or twelve places to-day in the London Circuits, all of which should receive substantial help from the Home Mission funds, but, with the present income it is not possible to do much, if anything whatever, for these interests. And a similar story could be told about the great cities of the provinces. There is a second class of cases that should appeal strongly to the imagination and heart of the Connexion. The nation to-day, as at no previous period, seeks once a year, at least, a little rest and relaxation. The whole coast-line is studded with summer resorts, and in addition, the people seek the air of the mountainous districts of inland districts where they may spend a few weeks in the summer time. Many of them want to attend a place of worship on the Sabbath, but are hardly in a mood to go to a small badly built chapel situated in a back lane. Other Churches see the necessity of providing comfortable places of worship in these holiday resorts, and are doing something to meet the need. Perhaps they are wealthier than Primitive Methodists, but even our denomination should do something to meet the religious requirements of these localities.

A NEW MISSION VAN.

—Judging by the additions that are being made to their number, it is reasonable to conclude that the work done by the men in the mission vans is of a useful character. Probably they will prove most advantageous to the village societies. There will be plenty of scope of this kind for the new van that has been started for the Hull and Leeds Districts. In both these Districts are considerable areas that are purely agricultural, and the village societies of these Districts will doubtless reap substantial advantage by this new departure.

WHITECHAPEL.

—The trustees of the Working Lads' Institute, Whitechapel, have recently sold part of their back premises to the Whitechapel and Bow Railway Company. The loss of this section of their building will in no sense interfere with their work, because by the expenditure of a little money on the reconstruction of what still remains in the hands of the Connexion, all the essential features of Mr. Jackson's mission work will be provided for. The purchase-price paid by the railway company is £20,500, and this sum will enable the trustees to pay off their debt, to repay the Missionary Committee all it has advanced for the work there, and to make satisfactory arrangements for the future working of the mission. If an old adage may be quoted here, it may be said that "fortune favours the brave." No more heroic man than Thomas Jackson is in the ranks of the ministry. He has attempted many daring things, and carried them through successfully. And none of them have been more daring than the launching of the Whitechapel scheme. It is interesting at this time to recall its history. When the Working Lads' Institute was started on undenominational lines by its benevolent founder, it commanded royal and other distinguished patronage. But despite this, it did not succeed, and after being carried on in a feeble manner for a little time, it became necessary to close the doors. That was the position of affairs when Mr. Jackson took possession of the building. From the first he made it succeed, and it is because a successful missionary and philanthropic work was actually being carried on in it when the railway company bought the back part that the trustees were able to command such a high price, whilst the fact of its being closed at the time Mr. Jackson bought it on behalf of the Connexion enabled him to secure it at a very moderate price indeed.

SOUTHWARK.

—Mr. Flanagan's new mission hall is now about complete, and a very splendid suite of premises, well situated, they are. But they have cost an enormous amount of money. Up to the present time the actual cost has been £12,072. The debt on the place at the present is £2,374. The Hall will be opened at the beginning of 1900, by which time Mr. Flanagan hopes to have the money needed to free the place from debt in hand. The Missionary Committee, freed from liability in connection with Whitechapel, was able to promise another £1,000 towards the fund, and W. P. Hartley, Esq., with his accustomed liberality, added another £250. The freehold still remains to be purchased, however, and that will cost not less than £3,500. Mr. Flanagan will, no doubt, be able to raise the whole amount in the course of a few years, but meanwhile it is most desirable to get the place opened for public worship and all the work of the mission at the earliest possible period. It would be a mistake to keep so magnificent a building closed. Both Mr. Flanagan, Mr. Gledhill, the indefatigable secretary to the trustees, and all who have had to do with the erection, are to be congratulated on the business-like manner in which they have carried the work through. To mention only one fact, it is certainly remarkable that there have been no "extras" to the contract price, save two, which have been caused by work specially required by the Corporation. By the time the freehold is secured we shall have the costliest chapel in the Connexion situated in one of the most poverty-stricken parishes in all England.

MASHUKULUMBWELAND.

—The news from the mission north of the Zambesi is not over plentiful, but all that has come to hand is of an encouraging character. The people are evidently beginning to acquire confidence in our agents. The lack of confidence, and any sense of loyalty and devotion to the missionaries on the part of the natives in Mashukulumbweland has been a most remarkable circumstance. The difficulty of getting carriers when Mr. Buckenham had to return will be recalled by many. This very undesirable quality, it may be supposed, will be accounted for by the fact that the people north of the Zambesi, having hitherto had no intercourse with Europeans, are naturally very suspicious. Gradually this habit of mind is being overcome. The natives are gathering around the mission-house to live instead of occupying huts at a considerable distance as heretofore. This may be counted as the first important step in the progress of the work. Another station is greatly needed on the banks of the Zambesi, if for no other purpose than as a store for goods and provisions on transit to Mashukulumbweland. It is highly inconvenient, and might at times involve serious loss, that the goods delivered at the Zambesi have to wait till carriers can be sent down from Mashukulumbweland. Nothing has yet been decided, but the missionary authorities are considering whether it will be possible to establish a new mission in some suitable place on the banks of the river. If eventually it is resolved to take this step, a man singularly suitable for the post is available. The Quarterly Missionary Committee, at its last meeting, gave instructions for the engagement of Mr. Hogg, the devoted Scotsman who has rendered such valuable service at some of the outlying stations on the Aliwal North mission. His special experience fits him eminently for such a post as is contemplated. For he is a mechanic, and has been both a trader and a grower of coffee. It seems providential that he should be available just when the need of a mission close to the Zambesi River has become apparent.

THE PROPOSED TRAINING HOME FOR WOMEN.

—A month ago reference was made in this column to a proposal for a training home for women, and since then the question has been brought before the Missionary Committee. To what was stated in the last issue of this Magazine, it may now be added that according to careful calculation, it is supposed a site might be bought for £1,000, the building would cost not less than £3,000, and the furnishings an additional £1,000. From £5,000 to £6,000 therefore would be needed to complete the home, and we judge, not much less than £1,000 per annum would be required for maintenance. The project is an excellent one, but prudent people will think the time is not yet.

THE WORK OF GOD.

—From several circuits news has come to hand of revival effort and success. At Accrington, a week's mission has recently been held. Prayer meetings and street processions were followed by earnest preaching of the word, with the result that some twenty souls were converted. Naturally, with such results from a week's effort, the friends were not inclined to discontinue the services. At Hartlepool, a thirteen days' mission has been held, with the result that over eighty persons have been led into the Kingdom of God. At Victoria Road, in the Gateshead Second Circuit, during a fortnight's mission, thirty-three adults and 119 young people belonging to the Sunday School have entered into fellowship with Jesus Christ. The revival at Middlesbrough continues. No Sunday evening passes without converts. From other places the pleasing message of prosperity comes. Why not from all? The matter is in the hands of the churches themselves. If all the members are religiously alive and active, and not simply the minister and one or two leading lights, nothing will prevent success. How serious, then, the responsibility under which the members are resting!

THE JUBILEE FUND.

—District Missionary Secretaries throughout the Connexion are busy gathering in what they are able for the Jubilee Fund. The Fund closes at the end of December, and it behoves those who have made promises to seize this, the last, opportunity of honouring their obligations. The Fund is already proving of immense value to various Connexional interests. Regarding the amount apportioned to the District Missionary Committees to be used for the establishment of new causes, it is not unlikely that the Districts which have resolved to make their portion the nucleus of a Chapel Loan Fund, will be found to have acted, on the whole, in the wisest way. Much has been said about erecting two or three great buildings in large towns with the money—buildings to which it would be possible to point in the future as one result of the first great Connexional Fund raised by Primitive Methodists. At least, a District Chapel Loan Fund will be an enduring monument, and will be immensely useful. At no distant date something should be done to increase the amount of money available by the Chapel Loan Fund.

SURREY CHAPEL.

—Not always have Primitive Methodists received full credit for the work they have done, and the success they have secured. Often it has been their lot to work in obscurity, and, truth to tell, they have been content generally to do their duty, glad if it was the means of blessing men, even though they might receive no recognition. It is well, however, to correct false statements made by those who are not friendly to Nonconformists. At the Church Congress it was confidently asserted that Nonconformity was making no progress in South London. Surrey Chapel is only one centre, and if it stood alone perhaps the Canon's remarks would be justified. But there are many such centres in that populous district—a district which, perhaps, needs evangelisation, and for that matter, civilisation, as much as any of the worst parts of the metropolis. Sixty-eight per cent. of the people are below the poverty line. The statistics of the work of the Church at Surrey Chapel in these circumstances are especially encouraging. Twenty years ago, Primitive Methodism was entirely unrepresented in the district. To-day it has a property worth £17,000, with a debt of only £300; it employs two ministers and a Sister of the people. There are church members numbering 300, and a regular congregation of 500; and, what is perhaps the most promising of all, there are 1,100 children in the Sunday School. Mr. Parr has many friends, won by his ability and devotion. He has not only done well in building up a fairly strong church, but also in the reduction of the debt. At present he is working hard to raise £400, and will certainly succeed. Ministers usually have enough to do for their own churches, but one minister of another denomination has promised Mr. Parr £100 towards the amount required. It is a very beautiful act.

REV. H. PRICE HUGHES ON LONDON PRIMITIVE METHODISM.

—Whilst ready to resent the carping criticisms of biassed churchmen regarding the work and position of Primitive Methodism, loyal members of our Church will keep an open mind to the criticisms of friends who are in sympathy with our work, and anxious for the spread of the religion of Jesus by all possible agencies. This being so, it may be hoped that the wise words of Mr. Price Hughes at the London Primitive Methodist Council Meeting will not be forgotten, either by London Primitives or by friends in the provinces, who are in a position to render practical assistance in connection with this work. It does not follow, of course, that none of Mr. Price Hughes' words were a little beside the mark. Some of them were. Our Church might have made greater progress in these recent years, even with the means actually at its disposal, but probably not a great deal better. Mr. Hughes' argument was, that apart from the actual progress made, there is what he called strategic value in making a Church strong in the large towns, and especially in London. For a long time the Wesleyan Methodists were oblivious of this fact, but in recent years, thanks mainly to the far-sightedness of William Arthur and the munificence of Sir Francis Lycett, they had risen to the occasion, and given the denomination a position in London worthy of its influence in the nation as a whole. And Primitive Methodism, which represented at least a million of the people of this country, had hardly acquired a position commensurate with its national status. Whilst appreciating the motives of the speaker, and recognising the value of his words, it will occur to many that he was in this case making too close a comparison between things that differ very widely. Sir Francis Lycett was a man in ten thousand, but there were, and still are, a large number of other wealthy Wesleyans, loyal to their Church, who have assisted in this work to an extent that Primitive Methodists could not do. On the whole, it may be questioned whether, with the means at their disposal, London Primitive Methodists could have done much more than has been done during the last fifteen or twenty years. It should do more in the future. It is something to have gained 'a footing. And the wealth in the Connexion is increasing. Mr. Flanagan's work, as well as Mr. Jackson's and Mr. Parr's, shows that when there is evidence of real need and hard toil, the people in the provinces are prepared to respond. And we trust that the words of Mr. Price Hughes will prove of value, both in guiding and stimulating the efforts of the workers.

The Wider Outlook.

A WEEK OF UNITED AND UNIVERSAL PRAYER.

—An exceedingly interesting document has been issued by the Evangelical Alliance, inviting Christians of all persuasions throughout the world to unite in a week of special prayer, January 7-14, 1900. This document can be obtained from the Secretary, Evangelical Alliance, 7, Adam Street, Strand. It is signed by influential ministers and laymen, including bishops, in all parts of the world—Africa, Argentina, England, Scotland, Ireland, Canada, Brazil, Egypt, Germany, Gibraltar, Greece, Hungary, India, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Persia, Russia, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, and America. Subjects for prayer on each day are provided in the programme which are worthy of a careful study. And if, even in prayer only, there could be some exchange of thought on these matters between members of different denominations, it could not fail to prove advantageous, whereas, if in addition to prayer there could be "meditations" given by wise Christians, the advantage would be greatly increased. We venture to transcribe two of them. "Tuesday, January 9.—The Church Universal. Prayer: For the subordination of human dogmas, practices, and judgments in the Churches, and the more full acceptance and confession of the truth of God: for the holiness of all authorities in the Churches: for the ministry and those who are preparing for it; and for loyal recognition in all Christian communities of the one Holy Catholic Church—the body of true believers, of which the Lord Jesus is the Head—the fulness of Him who filleth all in all. Matthew xv. 9; Colossians ii. 22; 2 Timothy iii. 10; Galatians iii. 16; 1 Corinthians xi. 29; Ephesians iv. 3-6. Wednesday, January 10.—Nations and their rulers. Prayer: That rulers may be a terror, not to the good, but to the evil only; that they may confess themselves the ministers of God; bearing sway by His will, and serving Him—the Supreme King—with loyal diligence; that the wonderful extension of the power of nominal Christian nations in the non-Christian world may work for righteousness; that the desolating drink traffic may be crippled, slavery abolished, cannibalism suppressed, and cruelty condemned; that wherever Christian flags float there may be seen the Bible, the Lord's Day, liberty of worship, family purity, and individual holiness. Psalm ii; Romans xiii. 1-7; 1 Timothy ii. 1-6; Proverbs viii. 15.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

—At the Congress of the Free Church of Scotland recently held in Edinburgh, Professor Marcus Dods spoke some words that the leaders of religious thought and all active Christian workers would do well to ponder. For twenty years, at least, thoughtful Christian people have been congratulating themselves on the fact that the black night of Atheism and Agnosticism following the publication of the "Origin of Species," has passed away, and that it had been succeeded by a revival of faith. And the new faith is far more tolerant and broad-minded than that which existed before. No doubt this is true, and to a certain extent, satisfactory. But, it may be inferred from the address of Professor Dods, the tolerance and broad-mindedness so-called, may be neither more nor less than indefiniteness in the conception of religious truth, and a spirit of indifference to religious observance. He evidently fears that there is a lack of the strenuous virile religious life that was not a rare thing in other days. This is a world of compensations, and if our fathers were narrow, dogmatic, and bigoted, they at least knew their own minds, and held convictions which they valued sufficiently to defend with all their might. In this respect there was real advantage derived from their bitter wranglings and controversies, as well as some disadvantages. But to-day, when it is a decent thing to go to church, there is little eagerness to arrive at an accurate conception of the truth of God, and men are so tolerant that it is counted "bad form" to discuss theological questions at all. There are those who think that an occasional war is absolutely necessary to save a nation from feebleness and decay. We do not hold this view. At the same time, we are inclined to believe that a little intellectual conflict and religious controversy might make for definiteness of thought and strength of conviction.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION AND THE WAR.

—The Congregational Union has this year held its meetings in Bristol. The gathering has been full of interest; the sermons, speeches, and papers revealing great ability, and the discussions that took place showing that the subjects submitted for consideration were of living interest. In addition to the matters pertaining purely to Congregationalism and the work of the Union, discussions took place on the war in South Africa; the Lord's Day; Sport; the Reports of the Licensing Commission; the Rating of Tithes; Authority in Religion; Priestism; Religious Indifference; Bible Reading; and many other questions immediately connected with the life of the Churches. On the various occasions in which reference was made to the war it became evident that there was considerable difference of opinion on the subject. Rev. William Dower, who had lived thirty-four years in South Africa, took occasion to express his views regarding the real cause of the war. And whilst it is evident he carried with him not all who heard him, but at least the majority of them, it may be questioned whether those who accepted his view at the time, will be prepared to do so in cold blood. In cold print his reasoning seems strangely inconsequent and unconvincing. Briefly stated, his view is that the war is being waged because the Boer is resolved never to admit coloured people to social and political equality. And, forsooth, the English political party who have opposed social, political, and religious equality amongst the people of the United Kingdom, and would deprive the majority of them to-day of the rights they enjoy, has entered into a great war to secure the negro equal rights with the European. Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell held a different conviction on the subject, and did not hesitate to express it. Still, the majority of the Union seems to have been under the influence of the jingo spirit. By this time, possibly, their eyes may have been opened.

THE DECLINE OF ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

—A body so strongly Protestant as the English Congregationalists were not likely to gather in council without giving some expression of opinion on a subject so much canvassed as Roman Catholicism and the Romanising tendencies of the clergy of the Church of England. Several of the speakers dealt with the subject in its various aspects, Mr. Jowett, at the young people's meeting, treating it in a very exhaustive manner. In the course of his speech he had occasion to refer to the problem put before the attention of the editor of the Church Times, to the effect that if a half-intoxicated man is baptised by a sceptical priest, is the Holy Spirit thereby conveyed? The editor has answered the question in the affirmative, as, indeed, he was bound to do if he would hold logically by the doctrine of "holy orders" and "apostolical succession" as held by the High Church party, and Protestants will feel as grateful to him as to Mr. Hay Aitken, who propounded the question, for an admission that will prove to people with any conception of the nature of religion, and any claim to common sense, how untenable is the position the High Anglican party hold. It must be gratifying to earnest Protestants to note not only the failure of that party to Romanise the Established Church, but to find that in no country in the world, barring Spain, and possibly Austria, is the Roman Catholic religion holding its own. Even Austria is doubtful, for there are not wanting there evidences of a revolt against the tyranny of the priests. In the towns of Italy the revolt is very manifest, and the intelligent men of France for long have refused to bow their necks to the yoke. A few years ago, much was heard about the large number of converts to the "Old Faith" that were being made in England. It has transpired, however, that to-day, with all our increase of population, there are only a million and a half of Catholics in England, of whom one million are Irish immigrants. If no converts had been made, and the Catholic Church had simply retained the immigrants and those born into families already Catholic, there should have been a much larger number of members of that communion. Turning to America, by the same laws, there should have been at the present time 25,000,000 Catholics, whereas there are only 9,000,000, and the tendency is downwards rather than upwards, in spite of the growth of the population. In truth, our Catholic friends will have to open their eyes to the fact that we are approaching the twentieth century of the Christian era, and that with all the light that is coming to men, more especially in view of the failure of the Catholic nations to hold their own in the march of progress, it is not to be expected that priestism will survive. Quietly, without any blare of trumpets, the power of popery is being sapped in the places that were once its strongholds. As an illustration of how this work is being done, one or two facts may be cited regarding what was once called the Free Church of Italy, but is now known as the Evangelical Church in Italy. This is not in any sense a foreign missionary society like the Wesleyan and Presbyterian Churches in Italy. Its ministers and members have been obtained from the Catholic population of Italy. A Protestant Church drawing its members from a Catholic population, it is in the best sense of the word, evangelistic. As an organisation it has been in existence about thirty-five years, having held its first general assembly in Bologna in 1865. To-day it is a very powerful Protestant influence in the country, and has thirty-three congregations with ordained pastors, besides twelve more about to be similarly constituted. The pastors visit and hold meetings in 133 villages outside the place of their pastorates, and there are an additional forty-nine smaller groups of Protestants connected with the denomination. In all there are 2,231 communicants and 20,000 adherents. Making this agency in conjunction with other Protestant missions, it may be concluded that there is hope for Italy.

WESTMINSTER COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

—Four years ago the Presbyterian Church of England determined to remove its theological college from London to Cambridge, and on October 19th, the new buildings were formally opened. The conception was bold, and it has been carried out in a manner worthy of the sons of a Church which for centuries has been distinguished by its loyalty to the faith and by the high value it places on an educated ministry. For it is safe to say that the Presbyterian ministers of the United Kingdom are the best educated ministers in the world. The College has cost £40,000, and has been opened free of debt. Two ladies resident in Cambridge, and both deeply interested in Biblical learning, Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, gave the site, and contributed £5,000 to the building fund, and "Ian Maclaren" raised £10,000 within the last month of the opening. Of course, by the character of its foundation, the college cannot, any more than Mansfield at Oxford, be affiliated with the University. It is a theological hall, open to students who have taken their Arts' degree. The question arises why it should have been removed from London. That is a question not easily answered to those who hold the popular idea of education, which briefly stated, is that it consists in the acquirement of information. But to those whose ideas are larger and more accurate, the advantage of the change of location will be quite apparent. Residence at a seat of learning counts for much, and in addition to the lectures at their own college, the students will have many opportunities of attending University lectures treating of their special studies.

SECONDARY EDUCATION AND THE HIGHER GRADE BOARD SCHOOLS.

—The present Government is eminently reactionary—in its views of the land laws, the Church, finance, and indeed all questions of politics, but perhaps, despite the Duke of Devonshire's good intentions, and Sir John Gorst's well-known convictions, most of all on the subject of education. At the present time the country is being threatened with a step that may prove nothing short of disastrous, it is in danger to a large extent of losing its Higher Grade Schools. Indeed, it has become clear that these Higher Grade Schools exist mainly by the good will of the Department, and not through any Act of Parliament. Hitherto, the Department has encouraged them with the most satisfactory results, but it was not likely that a Government that has made itself so amenable to the wishes of the clergy would allow such a traditional policy to continue. Recently there has been a revolution in the aims of the Department. What formerly it encouraged, it now discourages. An effort is being made to confine the School Boards to the mere elements of education, leaving the rest to take care of itself, unassisted by any State grants. The consequence is some Higher Grade Schools have been closed. In other places where there are Higher Grade Schools, they have been forbidden to open a school of science section. The Tottenham School Board has been warned that it is illegal to use the rates in supporting a school of science. The state of secondary education in the country is notoriously inefficient, and the provision for it shamefully inadequate. This inadequacy has only partly been met by the establishment of Higher Grade Schools, and if these are to be destroyed, or crippled, a large number of the boys and girls of England will be absolutely prevented from pursuing their educational course beyond the sixth standard of an elementary school. It is strange, indeed, to what lengths of reaction a priest-ridden Government will go.

THE WESLEYAN MILLION GUINEAS' FUND.

—When the Wesleyan Methodists a year ago resolved to raise a million guineas as a Centenary Fund, the other Christian Churches of England were filled with admiration. Bold as was the proposal, when their friends recalled their wealth and liberality, it was believed the task they had placed before them would be accomplished. We still believe this, although just for the moment the signs are not propitious. One half of the time has elapsed, but only a small proportion of the money is in hand. In less than six months two-thirds of the million was promised, but up to the present less than 700,000 guineas have been promised, and this only by about one-fourth of the Wesleyans in the country. The other three-fourths have been satisfied to look on from without. Perhaps the least satisfactory feature of the movement is that since last June only about twelve hundred guineas have been added to the promises. The amount paid in is £130,000, rather a small proportion of what has been promised. But we shall confess our views of the loyalty and liberality of Wesleyan Methodists have been wholly mistaken if, notwithstanding all, the million is not contributed even yet. The other Connexional Funds have not been allowed to suffer, and we are especially pleased to note that for foreign missions alone, no less than £130,000 has been contributed.

THE GEORGE WHITEFIELD MEMORIAL CHURCH.

—Every London Methodist, and most of those who have visited London, have visited the Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, where George Whitefield in his day delivered his message to those who assembled there for worship. The church and the building have had a chequered history, and once, in the fifties, was actually in danger of passing into the hands of purchasers with little or no regard for religion. But for the timely intervention of that great Christian philanthropist, Mr. Samuel Morley, it would in all probability to-day have been a music hall! When the Rev. J. Jackson Wray became the pastor of the tabernacle it was discovered that it would be necessary to rebuild, and steps were taken to erect a structure to cost £25,000, but Mr. Jackson's illness and death prevented the carrying out of this scheme. The church was without a pastor seven years, but eventually the Rev. George A. Suttle accepted a call, and in October, 1898, the foundation-stone of the new tabernacle was laid. It has cost £14,000, and of this one half remains as debt, a burden much too heavy for the church to deal with successfully. The opening services began on November 14, and it may be hoped that Nonconformists of all denominations will make use of the opportunities afforded them of doing honour to the memory of a great man, and helping a people who have undertaken great things for the cause of God.
